MOTIFS DU JUGE SCHRAGER

[13] L'appelant se pourvoit, avec l'autorisation d'un juge de la Cour[1], contre un jugement[2] rendu le 4 juillet 2022 par la Cour supérieure, district de Montréal (l'honorable Thomas M. Davis), lequel rejette sa demande d'approbation d'une entente de règlement et d'honoraires professionnels intervenue dans le cadre d'une action collective intentée au nom de certaines victimes d'agressions sexuelles qui, depuis 1935, auraient été commises au Québec par des membres de la communauté religieuse des Clercs de Saint-Viateur du Canada (« CSV ») ou par des employés de divers établissements relevant de celle-ci.

[14] Dans le cadre du pourvoi, la Cour est appelée à décider si le juge a erré en refusant d'approuver l'entente au motif que les honoraires (8 048 250 $) y prévus pour les avocats des membres, représentant 25 % du fonds de règlement (28 000 000 $) plus les taxes, sont déraisonnables. La Cour doit aussi déterminer quelle partie doit supporter les honoraires de l'amicus curiae nommé en appel.

[15] En 2017, l'appelant dépose une demande d'autorisation d'exercer une action collective contre CSV. Cette demande est accueillie le 25 avril 2019 par une juge de la Cour supérieure[3]. Dans ce contexte, l'appelant mandate M^e^ Virginie Dufresne-Lemire du cabinet Dufresne Wee avocats, devenu depuis Arsenault Dufresne Wee avocats (« ADW »), pour agir en son nom et en celui des membres. La convention d'honoraires signée par l'appelant prévoit entre autres que :

- L'appelant consent à ce qu'il soit retenu sur les sommes perçues par M^e^ Dufresne-Lemire pour lui et pour les membres du groupe, s'il y a lieu, « 25 % des sommes totales reçues soit par règlement ou suivant un jugement ».

- Advenant une révocation de mandat avant la fin des procédures, l'appelant s'engage à indemniser M^e^ Dufresne-Lemire « pour le temps investi dans le dossier […] au taux horaire de 250 $ pour le temps de chacun des avocats, plus tous les déboursés encourus et les taxes applicables ».

[16] À l'époque, M^e^ Dufresne-Lemire et son associé, M^e^ Justin Wee, n'ont respectivement que trois ans et un an d'expérience. Cela les incitera à s'adjoindre d'autres avocats, dont M^es^ Alain Arsenault et Julie Plante, pour les accompagner dans le dossier.

- Un fonds de règlement à titre de recouvrement collectif sera constitué à partir (1) d'un montant de 28 000 000$ « en capital, intérêts, indemnité additionnelle, frais et toutes taxes applicables » à être versé par CSV et les « parties impliquées » (Collège Bourget, CIUSSS de la Capitale-Nationale[4], Fonds d'entraide de l'ancien Séminaire de Joliette, Les Missions Saint-Viateur, Fonds Louis-Querbes, Travelers et Royal and Sun Alliance), ainsi que (2) du montant que CSV recevra des autorités fiscales, le cas échéant, à titre de remboursement de la TPS et de la TVQ relatives au compte d'honoraires des avocats des membres.

- Le fonds de règlement servira : (1) à indemniser les membres dont la réclamation sera acceptée à l'issue de la clôture du processus d'adjudication; (2) à payer les honoraires extrajudiciaires et judiciaires des avocats des membres; et (3) à payer et/ou rembourser les débours, frais et autres dépens encourus dans le cadre de l'action collective, ainsi que « tout montant découlant d'un recours subrogatoire aux droits des membres », s'il en est.

- Un compte pour les honoraires des avocats des membres, adressé à CSV, au montant de 8 048 250 $ (représentant 25 % du montant de 28 000 000 $, plus les taxes), couvrant les honoraires, ou « tout autre montant autorisé par la Cour », sera transmis dans les 10 jours après que le jugement approuvant l'Entente ait acquis force de chose jugée, « sous réserve de l'approbation du tribunal ».

- L'appelant donne aux parties défenderesses, « personnellement et au nom des membres du Groupe […] ainsi que de leurs successeurs, héritiers et ayants-droits [sic], une quittance complète, finale et définitive […] ».

- Les avocats des membres seront les seuls responsables de l'élaboration et de la détermination des modalités du processus d'adjudication, sous réserve des modalités prévues à l'Annexe 3 de l'Entente. Le processus d'adjudication sera présidé par l'honorable Claude Champagne, juge à la retraite de la Cour supérieure. Seul un nombre limité de personnes aura accès aux noms des réclamants, si nécessaire. Les parties défenderesses n'ont aucun droit de participer au processus de fixation des indemnisations individuelles par l'adjudicateur ni de le contester.

[4] La part du CIUSSS de la Capitale-Nationale est limitée au montant prévu à l'Annexe 4 de l'Entente.

- L'adjudicateur attribuera aux membres dont la réclamation est acceptée l'une des trois catégories suivantes d'indemnisation, prévues à l'Annexe 8 de l'Entente :

    - Catégorie A : Indemnisation de base équivalant à X $ et servant de base de calcul pour établir les catégories d'indemnisation extraordinaires;

    - Catégorie B : Indemnisation extraordinaire 1 équivalant à 1,5X $, soit une compensation supérieure de 50 % à la compensation de base.

    - Catégorie C : Indemnisation extraordinaire 2 équivalant à 2X $, soit une compensation équivalant au double de la compensation de base, pour un maximum de 200 000 $.

[20] L'Entente prévoit aussi la modification de la définition du groupe et des sous-groupes.

[25] Notant que les intimés n'ont pas l'intention de participer à un débat sur le quantum des honoraires et que le membre dissident ne pourra « participer de façon efficace au débat en appel sans les services d'un avocat », le juge de la Cour conclut à la nécessité de mettre en place un processus pour la nomination d'un amicus curiae pour faire contrepoids aux prétentions des parties. Il était impossible d'obtenir l'aval du membre dissident sur le choix d'un avocat pour agir à titre d'amicus curiae puisque le membre dissident croyait que la quasi-totalité des membres du Barreau était en conflits d'intérêts puisqu'il s'agit d'une question d'honoraires. Alors, le juge de la Cour a autorisé l'appelant à choisir, parmi une liste de trois avocats dont les noms avaient été préalablement communiqués à la Cour[6].

I. JUGEMENT ENTREPRIS

[26] Le juge passe en revue les critères développés par les tribunaux pour évaluer si une transaction intervenue dans le cadre d'une action collective devrait être approuvée. Il retient que, dans l'ensemble, ces facteurs (durée du litige; nature inclusive et avantages de l'Entente; expérience des avocats; témoignage des membres, à l'exception du membre dissident; dévouement des avocats envers les membres; et absence de collusion entre les parties) militent en faveur de l'approbation de l'Entente.

[28] Le juge rappelle que la convention d'honoraires est présumée valide et ne peut être écartée que s'il est démontré qu'elle n'est pas juste et raisonnable. En s'appuyant sur l'affaire Servites de Marie[9], dans laquelle la Cour supérieure a approuvé des honoraires représentant 30 % du fonds de règlement, le juge reconnaît que lorsqu'un cabinet d'avocats entreprend une action collective visant à indemniser des victimes d'agressions sexuelles, « il se lance dans un voyage plein d'incertitude »[10]. Le juge note que le cas d'espèce est d'ailleurs comparable en certains points avec cette affaire, notamment en ce qui concerne le nombre d'heures de travail consacré au dossier par les avocats. Il conclut toutefois que lorsque l'on considère la valeur des heures travaillées en relation avec la somme réclamée en vertu de la convention d'honoraires, les deux affaires doivent être distinguées[11]. En l'occurrence, les avocats ont consacré 3 479 heures au dossier et estiment qu'il reste encore au moins 800 heures de travail à faire. Selon les estimations du juge, ce travail correspond à des honoraires d'environ 1 509 686 $ selon la formule du taux horaire (si l'on retient les taux horaires divulgués par les avocats)[12]. Le juge s'avoue cependant préoccupé quant à la manière dont ces taux lui ont été communiqués :

> [53] Le 12 avril, [le Tribunal] reçoit un fichier Excel présentant les heures de chacun des avocats et le descriptif des tâches effectuées. Le Tribunal ne remet ni le temps ni le descriptif en question. Cependant, ce fichier n'indique pas le taux horaire de chaque avocat. Les avocats du groupe confirment qu'ils ont oublié de les inclure après une demande du Tribunal et les fournissent par la suite.
> [54] Cette nouvelle information amène le Tribunal à écrire de nouveau aux avocats, compte tenu des observations écrites du membre dissident au sujet du taux horaire que maître Dufresne-Lemire lui avait annoncé :
>
> > Maitre Dufresne-Lemire
> >
> > J'aimerais vous donner l'occasion de commenter le document joint. En particulier, je suis perplexe face à l'affirmation [du membre dissident] que vous lui avez dit que votre taux horaire est de 200 $, alors que Me Wee me dit ce matin qu'il est de 400 $? Est-ce que les taux qu'on m'a fournis sont en vigueur depuis le début du dossier? […]
>
> [55] L'avocate explique que pour des dossiers individuels son tarif horaire peut être de 200 $ l'heure, mais qu'il peut être plus élevé dans les dossiers à pourcentage.
> [56] Son courriel ne parle pas des taux de ses collègues.

Selon le juge, « [o]n peut avoir l'impression que les taux communiqués [ont été] établis en fonction du présent dossier »[13], d'autant que l'appelant n'a fourni aucune information « sur la discussion qu'il a pu avoir avec les avocats sur les honoraires anticipés ou sur les taux horaires »[14]. Dans les circonstances, il est donc impossible de savoir quels étaient les honoraires envisagés quand le dossier a débuté. Le juge constate cependant que le taux horaire (250 $) prévu dans la convention d'honoraires advenant la révocation du mandat est loin de ceux qui lui ont été communiqués[15]. Or, les art. 99 et 100 du Code de déontologie des avocats[16] (« Code de déontologie ») imposent à l'avocat un devoir de renseignement quant au montant de ses honoraires. Ce devoir demeure important même dans un cas où il y a une convention d'honoraires à pourcentage, ajoute le juge.

élevé et se situe nettement au-dessus de la norme, soit un multiplicateur se situant entre 2 et 3. Le juge évalue la raisonnabilité des honoraires réclamés au regard des facteurs énoncés à l'art. 102 du Code de déontologie. Il retient que leurs principaux avocats au dossier, M^es^ Dufresne-Lemire et Wee, n'avaient pas une très grande expérience. De plus, une bonne partie de leur travail consistait à discuter avec les victimes, un travail certes difficile sur le plan émotionnel, mais non sur le plan juridique. La principale difficulté au plan juridique concernait la question de la prescription, car au moment où la demande d'autorisation d'exercer l'action collective a été déposée, la Cour suprême n'avait pas encore rendu l'arrêt J.J.[17]. Cependant, la Cour d'appel avait déjà statué que l'action collective était le véhicule approprié pour ce type de dossier. Le juge reconnaît malgré tout qu'il « pouvait y avoir des défis au niveau de l'administration de la preuve et des dommages subis »[18]. Il concède également que les avocats ont assumé un énorme risque en prenant le dossier, au regard, notamment, de la capacité des intimés à payer une éventuelle condamnation et de l'incertitude du droit applicable avant l'arrêt J.J. En définitive, le juge considère toutefois que le dossier « représentait une difficulté et un risque global moyens lorsque la demande d'autorisation fut produite »[19]. Or, les honoraires réclamés contiennent « une prime prévisible lorsque le risque est très élevé »[20]. En effet, « [à] un taux horaire de 250 $, leur investissement dans le dossier représenterait 869 772 $ jusqu'à maintenant et 1 069 772 $ avec les 800 heures additionnelles et leur demande se traduirait par une prime de presque 6 000 000 $ »[21]. Même en retenant les taux horaires proposés par les avocats, la prime serait de plus de 5 000 000 $. Le juge conclut que ces honoraires sont excessifs et, surtout, contraires à l'intérêt des membres.

[30] Le juge détermine que cette conclusion constitue un obstacle dirimant à la demande d'approbation de l'Entente, dont l'art. 28 prévoit que si le tribunal refuse d'approuver l'Entente dans son intégralité, celle-ci « sera dès lors considérée comme nulle et sans effet »[22]. Il se dit cependant confiant « que les parties se réuniront afin de convenir des honoraires raisonnables et de les soumettre au Tribunal, permettant ainsi aux membres de recevoir les sommes qui leur reviennent »[23].

II. QUESTIONS EN LITIGE

[31] Les questions en litige peuvent être formulées ainsi :

a) Le juge a-t-il erré en concluant qu'il ne pouvait approuver l'Entente?

b) Le juge a-t-il erré en concluant que les honoraires réclamés pour les avocats des membres sont déraisonnables? La Cour devrait-elle fixer elle-même les honoraires?

c) Qui doit assumer les honoraires de l'amicus curiae?

III. DISCUSSION

a) Le juge a-t-il erré en concluant qu'il ne pouvait approuver l'Entente?

[32] Dans l'ensemble, les parties s'entendent pour dire que le juge a commis une erreur révisable en concluant qu'il devait rejeter l'Entente parce qu'il considérait que les honoraires des avocats des membres étaient déraisonnables.

[34] Avant d'approuver une transaction, le juge doit être convaincu que celle-ci est « juste, équitable et qu'elle répond aux meilleurs intérêts des membres »[24]. Dans le cadre de son analyse, il doit « garder à l'esprit les grands principes et objectifs sous-jacents aux actions collectives, soupeser les avantages et inconvénients du règlement, de même que les concessions réciproques, les risques d'un procès et les coûts à encourir »[25]. En pratique, l'évaluation du caractère juste et raisonnable de la transaction s'articule souvent autour des critères suivants, importés du droit américain :

- Les probabilités de succès du recours;
- L'importance et la nature de la preuve administrée;
- Les modalités, termes et conditions de la transaction;
- La recommandation des avocats et leur expérience;
- Le coût anticipé et la durée probable du litige;
- Le cas échéant, la recommandation d'une tierce personne neutre;
- La nature et le nombre d'objections à la transaction;
- La bonne foi des parties et l'absence de collusion.[26]

593. Le tribunal peut accorder une indemnité au représentant pour le paiement de ses débours de même qu'un montant pour le paiement des frais de justice et des honoraires de son avocat, le tout payable à même le montant du recouvrement collectif ou avant le paiement des réclamations individuelles.	593. The court may award the representative plaintiff an indemnity for disbursements and an amount to cover legal costs and the lawyer's professional fee. Both are payable out of the amount recovered collectively or before payment of individual claims.
Il s'assure, en tenant compte de l'intérêt des membres du groupe, que les honoraires de l'avocat du représentant sont raisonnables; autrement, il peut les fixer au montant qu'il indique.	In the interests of the class members, the court assesses whether the fee charged by the representative plaintiff's lawyer is reasonable; if the fee is not reasonable, the court may determine it.
Il entend, avant de se prononcer sur les frais de justice et les honoraires, le Fonds d'aide aux actions collectives que celui-ci ait ou non attribué une aide au représentant. Le tribunal prend en compte le fait que le Fonds ait garanti le paiement de tout ou partie des frais de justice ou des honoraires.	Regardless of whether the Class Action Assistance Fund provided assistance to the representative plaintiff, the court hears the Fund before ruling on the legal costs and the fee. The court considers whether or not the Fund guaranteed payment of all or any portion of the legal costs or the fee.

[37] Il est ainsi établi qu'en vertu de l'art. 593 C.p.c., « aucune convention d'honoraires intervenue entre le représentant et son avocat ni aucune entente d'honoraires conclue entre le représentant, son avocat et les parties adverses dans le cadre d'une transaction présentée pour approbation ne lient le juge »[28]. Dans la mesure où les parties prévoient que l'approbation de l'entente dépend de l'approbation des honoraires convenus, c'est-à-dire que ceux-ci constituent une « partie non détachable » de l'entente, le refus d'approuver les honoraires entraîne donc nécessairement le rejet de l'entente dans son entier[29]. En revanche, lorsque l'approbation de l'entente n'est pas conditionnelle à l'approbation du montant d'honoraires réclamé, le juge peut approuver l'entente[30] tout en modifiant le quantum des honoraires s'il considère que celui réclamé est déraisonnable[31].

> Si le tribunal refuse d'approuver l'intégralité de la présente Entente de règlement, les parties conviennent que celle-ci sera dès lors considérée nulle et sans effet dans son entièreté, et que les parties seront remises dans la même situation juridique que celle prévalant antérieurement à sa conclusion; elles ne pourront aucunement invoquer l'Entente de règlement dans la poursuite du litige qui continuera alors à les opposer.

Cette disposition est complétée par l'art. 31, qui stipule que « l'Entente de règlement, incluant son préambule et ses annexes, est indivisible et constitue une transaction au sens des articles 2631 et suivants du Code civil du Québec ». Ensemble, les art. 28 et 31 confirment en termes non équivoques que l'Entente est un « tout » qui ne peut être modifié ou approuvé en partie. À la seule lecture des art. 28 et 31, il peut donc être tentant de conclure, comme l'a fait le juge, que l'approbation du montant des honoraires fixé par les parties est nécessaire à l'approbation de l'Entente. Les art. 28 et 31 doivent toutefois être lus en conjonction avec les autres dispositions de l'Entente (cf. art. 1427 C.c.Q.).

[40] En l'occurrence, une lecture attentive des autres dispositions de l'Entente fait obstacle à la conclusion du juge. L'art. 8 de l'Entente prévoit en effet expressément que le juge peut modifier le montant des honoraires réclamé :

> Un compte pour les Honoraires des avocats du Demandeur et des membres adressé à la Défenderesse CSV au montant de 8 048 250 $, représentant 25 % du montant de 28 000 000 $ prévu au paragraphe 3 de la présente Entente de règlement, plus les taxes applicables, le tout tel que prévu à la Convention

29 Id., paragr. 74.

30 La pratique consistant à prévoir les honoraires des avocats dans l'entente visant à régler le litige suscite en outre des enjeux éthiques. Cette pratique est donc à éviter. > d'honoraires signée par le Demandeur, couvrant les Honoraires ou tout autre montant autorisé par la Cour, sera transmis par les avocats du Demandeur et des membres dans les dix (10) jours après que le jugement approuvant l'Entente de règlement ait acquis force de chose jugée, sous réserve de l'approbation du tribunal.[…]

[41] Dans le même ordre d'idées, l'art. 9 édicte que :

> Dans les dix (10) jours ouvrables de la réception de la somme prévue aux paragraphes 3 et 6 de la présente Entente de règlement, les avocats du Demandeur et des membres retireront de leur compte en fidéicommis le montant des Honoraires qui aura été approuvé par le tribunal, comme prévu au paragraphe 8 de la présente Entente de règlement.

[42] Ces dispositions reconnaissent ainsi en toutes lettres le pouvoir du juge de fixer le montant des honoraires. En l'espèce, le juge pouvait donc modifier le montant des honoraires prévu par les parties tout en respectant l'Entente « dans son intégralité ». Il n'avait pas à rejeter l'Entente s'il jugeait que les honoraires réclamés étaient excessifs. Dans la mesure où le juge a déterminé que l'Entente était par ailleurs juste et dans l'intérêt des membres, ce que personne — pas même le membre dissident — ne remet en cause, il aurait dû l'approuver tout en révisant le montant des honoraires. En concluant comme il l'a fait, il a commis une erreur qui doit être corrigée par la Cour.

[43] Vu l'interprétation de l'Entente que je propose, il n'est pas nécessaire de répondre aux représentations du FAAC voulant que, dans la mesure où l'article 28 de l'Entente empêche l'homologation du règlement sans l'approbation des honoraires des avocats, il est contre l'ordre public.

b) Le juge a-t-il erré en concluant que les honoraires réclamés sont déraisonnables? La Cour devrait-elle fixer elle-même les honoraires?

Prétentions des parties

[44] Je résume en détail les prétentions des parties puisqu'elles évoquent de façon exhaustive les éléments à considérer en évaluant le montant des honoraires à payer.

[45] L'appelant soutient que le juge a erré en droit et a commis des erreurs manifestes et déterminantes en concluant que les honoraires réclamés étaient déraisonnables. Il rappelle que la convention d'honoraires est présumée valide. De plus, une convention d'honoraires prévoyant un pourcentage entre 15-33 % est généralement jugée juste et raisonnable. Selon lui, une preuve convaincante « que la convention d'honoraires n'a pas été conclue dans l'intérêt des membres » est requise pour renverser ces présomptions. Or, l'intérêt de chaque membre consiste à s'assurer que les procureurs travaillent diligemment pour obtenir le meilleur résultat. Ce qui l'intéresse, c'est le résultat obtenu pour lui et que le pourcentage des honoraires applicable à son indemnité soit raisonnable et conforme au pourcentage appliqué aux indemnités des autres membres. Ainsi, dès que le pourcentage prévu dans la convention d'honoraires se situe entre 15-33 % et que les avocats ont travaillé diligemment pour générer le résultat obtenu, les honoraires devraient être approuvés. En l'occurrence, les honoraires réclamés auraient donc dû être approuvés. En effet, le pourcentage (25 %) prévu dans la convention d'honoraires se situe à l'intérieur de la fourchette établie et reçoit l'aval de l'appelant et de plusieurs autres membres. Le FAAC ne s'y oppose pas non plus. De plus, le juge a reconnu que les avocats ont accepté un risque énorme, travaillé fort, fait preuve d'un dévouement exemplaire envers les membres et négocié pour eux une excellente entente qui leur permettra de recevoir des indemnités significatives. Il aurait par conséquent dû conclure que les honoraires réclamés étaient raisonnables. Malgré tout, dans un geste de bonne foi, les avocats des membres offrent de réduire leurs honoraires de 25 % à 20 % du recouvrement plus débours et taxes.

[46] L'appelant reproche au juge d'avoir erré en appliquant le modèle du facteur multiplicateur (ou « approche-multiplicateur ») pour conclure que les honoraires réclamés étaient excessifs puisqu'ils étaient 4,64 fois plus élevés que ceux qui auraient été dus selon une convention à taux horaire. Selon l'appelant, le raisonnement du juge, qui repose sur une application rigide de cette approche, remet en doute la validité même d'une convention à pourcentage. Or, il s'agit du mode de rémunération le plus approprié en matière d'action collective. Qui plus est, en statuant que les honoraires ne devraient pas excéder le montant obtenu en multipliant le nombre d'heures travaillées aux taux horaires réguliers par un facteur arbitraire de 3, le juge a de facto légiféré un plafond des honoraires des avocats. L'appelant insiste sur les dangers d'un tel précédent. À son avis, le jugement entrepris « dénature à tel point les Conventions à pourcentage qu'il risque de décourager les cabinets en demande d'entreprendre des actions collectives, ce qui, ultimement, portera atteinte aux objectifs sociaux de ce véhicule procédural ». L'appelant fait par ailleurs valoir que l'application systématique de l'approche-multiplicateur n'est pas dans l'intérêt des membres, puisque celle-ci favorise l'inefficacité, voire l'incompétence, au lieu d'encourager un travail stratégique et efficace des avocats. L'application systématique de cette approche fausse en outre l'évaluation du caractère juste et raisonnable des honoraires en élevant le temps consacré au dossier par les avocats au rang de « super-facteur ». L'art. 102 du Code de déontologie précise pourtant que les honoraires sont justes et raisonnables s'ils sont justifiés par les circonstances. L'approche-multiplicateur n'est en fait que d'une utilité limitée, surtout lorsque comparée à la responsabilité assumée par les avocats et au résultat obtenu. Pour ces motifs, l'appelant demande à la Cour de déclarer les honoraires réclamés raisonnables, mais de prendre acte que les avocats acceptent de réduire ceux-ci à 20 % du fonds de règlement.

[47] Les intimés et le FAAC ne se prononcent pas sur la raisonnabilité des honoraires réclamés. Les intimés soutiennent toutefois que la Cour possède le pouvoir de fixer elle-même les honoraires sans qu'il soit nécessaire de renvoyer le dossier devant la Cour supérieure. Ils soulignent qu'il est dans l'intérêt des membres que l'Entente soit approuvée le plus rapidement possible et qu'une décision de la Cour « permettrait d'éviter l'incertitude reliée à une possible obligation pour les parties de transmettre un nouvel avis aux membres en vertu de l'article 590 C.p.c. ». Le FAAC, pour sa part, argue que la Cour devrait approuver les honoraires tels que réduits volontairement par les avocats des membres, sous réserve de l'engagement de ces derniers de lui rembourser 99 136,09 $, engagement « dont il doit être pris acte ».

[48] L'amicus curiae reconnaît que les avocats agissant en demande dans le cadre d'une action collective assument généralement un risque important qui justifie une prime conséquente. Il rappelle en outre que le pouvoir du tribunal de fixer les honoraires est assujetti à une condition préalable importante, soit la conclusion que les honoraires réclamés ne sont pas raisonnables, c'est-à-dire que leur quantum n'appartient pas aux « issues possibles acceptables ». À cet égard, les conventions d'honoraires qui ont typiquement été reconnues par les tribunaux peuvent servir de guide. La Cour devrait se garder de renverser la jurisprudence « ayant reconnu la validité des conventions d'honoraires à pourcentage, et ce, même lorsqu'elles donnent lieu à une compensation qui pourrait être jugée excessive par certains membres du public ». Quant à l'application de l'approche-multiplicateur à titre de mesure de contrôle, il ne s'agit pas d'une panacée. Celle-ci peut cependant s'avérer utile pour déterminer si les honoraires sont excessifs dans un cas donné, à la condition de ne pas « se transformer en plafond ». L'instauration d'un « multiplicateur plafond » aurait pour effet d'invalider les conventions d'honoraires à pourcentage et de les remplacer par des ententes à facteur multiplicateur. Cela dit, l'amicus curiae estime qu'un multiplicateur égal ou inférieur à 2 devrait être réservé aux dossiers assurés d'un succès rapide, ou encore à ceux où les honoraires sont inutiles, exagérés ou disproportionnés au regard de ce que les membres obtiennent du recours. En revanche, un multiplicateur supérieur à 2 sera généralement nécessaire pour créer un véritable incitatif à entreprendre des actions collectives. Un facteur multiplicateur de 2,5 ou 3 devrait ainsi se rapprocher de la norme ou même d'un plancher dans plusieurs dossiers. L'amicus curiae note par ailleurs qu'une convention d'honoraires prévoyant un pourcentage de 25 % n'est pas en soi déraisonnable, ce taux correspondant au contraire à une norme bien établie. Il rejette toutefois la thèse de l'appelant suggérant que la raisonnabilité des honoraires s'évalue en fonction du montant d'honoraires que chaque membre doit payer à même son indemnité. Ce qui importe selon lui est plutôt la raisonnabilité des honoraires qui seront collectivement payés.

[49] En l'espèce, l'amicus curiae estime que le juge s'est bien dirigé en utilisant l'approche-multiplicateur pour contrôler la raisonnabilité des honoraires. À son avis, le juge a cependant erré en laissant entendre qu'un multiplicateur de 4,64 est en soi excessif. Un tel multiplicateur n'est pas déraisonnable en lui-même, surtout dans le contexte d'une action collective comme celle en l'espèce, où les victimes bénéficieront d'une procédure de réclamation avantageuse et où les avocats ont assumé un énorme risque, ont fait preuve d'un grand dévouement et ont effectué un travail remarquable. L'amicus curiae juge toutefois que le multiplicateur applicable dans le présent dossier n'est pas réellement de 4,64. Comme l'a noté le juge, les taux horaires communiqués par les avocats des membres semblent avoir été établis en fonction du dossier. Il en va notamment ainsi de M^e^ Dufresne-Lemire, qui revendique un taux de 400 $/heure dans le présent dossier, alors que son tarif horaire usuel est de 200 $, et alors que la convention d'honoraires prévoit un taux de 250 $/heure en cas de révocation du mandat. L'amicus curiae partage les préoccupations du juge à ce sujet et considère que l'appelant fait fausse route en affirmant que les taux horaires facturés à d'autres clients dans d'autres dossiers sont sans pertinence. Selon lui, le taux horaire appliqué selon le modèle du facteur multiplicateur ne devrait pas être exclusif aux dossiers d'actions collectives, sans quoi le calcul et la notion même de multiplicateur seraient faussés. En effet, cela reviendrait à prendre le risque en compte deux fois (une fois dans le taux horaire et une fois dans le multiplicateur). Le taux horaire « ordinaire » de l'avocat devrait servir de base au calcul, celui-ci permettant de tenir compte du véritable coût d'opportunité de l'avocat et étant déterminé par une logique de marché. En l'occurrence, l'application d'un multiplicateur de 4,64 à un taux horaire de 400 $ pour M^e^ Dufresne-Lemire équivaut à un facteur de 7,4 pour un taux horaire de 250 $ et de 9,3 pour un taux horaire de 200 $. Si la Cour présume que les taux horaires des autres avocats ont eux aussi été ajustés à la hausse en fonction du dossier, « elle pourrait conclure que les honoraires réclamés en appel (20 % plutôt que 25 %) donnent un facteur multiplicateur entre 5,9 et 7,4 ». La Cour pourrait tirer cette présomption puisque les avocats des membres n'ont pas indiqué si le taux horaire de M^e^ Dufresne-Lemire était le seul à avoir été ajusté à la hausse, alors qu'il leur incombait « de donner l'heure juste à ce sujet ». Dans les circonstances, l'amicus curiae suggère à la Cour d'appliquer un multiplicateur de 4,64 à des honoraires de 754 843 $, pour une somme totale de 3 502 472 $. Une autre alternative serait d'appliquer ce multiplicateur à un taux horaire de 250 $ pour le temps de chacun des avocats (889 991,50 $) et un taux horaire de 75 $ pour les autres employés (77 049 $), pour un total de 4 129 560,56 $.

Analyse

[50] La convention d'honoraires conclue par le représentant lie les membres de l'action collective. Son exécution demeure néanmoins sujette à l'approbation du tribunal[32]. En vertu de l'art. 593 al. 2 C.p.c., le juge se voit en effet confier le rôle de s'assurer que les honoraires réclamés sont raisonnables et, en cas contraire, il l'autorise à les fixer « au montant qu'il indique ».

raisonnables[34]. Le juge ne doit pas hésiter, en cas de besoin, « à réviser ces honoraires en fonction de leur valeur réelle, à les arbitrer et à les réduire s'ils sont inutiles, exagérés, ou hors de proportion » au regard de ce que les membres retirent de l'action collective[35]. La tâche du juge est complexe, car il « recherche un équilibre idéal dans la rémunération : octroyer [aux] avocat[s] une somme nécessaire et suffisante pour [les] inciter à entreprendre le prochain dossier, tout en gardant en tête que les membres doivent être les premiers bénéficiaires des sommes payées par les défenderesses »[36].

[52] Le Code de procédure civile n'identifie pas les critères permettant de juger de la justesse et de la raisonnabilité des honoraires. L'art. 102 du Code de déontologie fournit toutefois des indications utiles à cet égard, en précisant que[37] :

102. Les honoraires sont justes et raisonnables s'ils sont justifiés par les circonstances et proportionnés aux services professionnels rendus. L'avocat tient notamment compte des facteurs suivants pour la fixation de ses honoraires:	102. The fees are fair and reasonable if they are warranted by the circumstances and proportionate to the professional services rendered. In determining his fees, the lawyer must in particular take the following factors into account:
1° l'expérience;	(1) experience;
2° le temps et l'effort requis et consacrés à l'affaire;	(2) the time and effort required and devoted to the matter;
3° la difficulté de l'affaire;	(3) the difficulty of the matter;
4° l'importance de l'affaire pour le client;	(4) the importance of the matter to the client;
5° la responsabilité assumée;	(5) the responsibility assumed;
6° la prestation de services professionnels inhabituels ou exigeant une compétence particulière ou une célérité exceptionnelle;	(6) the performance of unusual professional services or professional services requiring special skills or exceptional speed;
7° le résultat obtenu;	(7) the result obtained;

8° les honoraires prévus par la loi ou les règlements;	(8) the fees prescribed by statute or regulation; and
9° les débours, honoraires, commissions, ristournes, frais ou autres avantages qui sont ou seront payés par un tiers relativement au mandat que lui a confié le client.	(9) the disbursements, fees, commissions, rebates, costs or other benefits that are or will be paid by a third party with respect to the mandate the client gave him.

[54] Il est ainsi généralement admis que pour apprécier le caractère juste et raisonnable des honoraires, le juge doit aussi considérer le risque couru par les avocats. Dans le contexte d'une convention d'honoraires à pourcentage, la Cour supérieure a reconnu que ce facteur pourrait même primer sur le temps consacré au dossier par les avocats[39]. Dans tous les cas, le risque doit s'apprécier au moment où les avocats ont reçu le mandat du représentant, et non au moment de la demande d'approbation[40].

[58] L'appelant et l'amicus curiae ont par ailleurs raison d'affirmer que la « fourchette » des pourcentages jugés raisonnables par les tribunaux se situe normalement entre 15 % à 33 % (ou même de 20 % à 33,33 %) du fonds de règlement[45]. Il ne s'agit toutefois pas d'un automatisme. Comme le mentionne la Cour dans l'arrêt Skarstedt, « c'est à la lumière de chaque réclamation qu'un juge doit déterminer le caractère raisonnable des honoraires en vue de leur approbation »[46]. C'est ainsi que les juges ont révisé à la baisse le pourcentage établi par les parties lorsque celui-ci paraissait exagéré par rapport au travail effectué par les avocats, au règlement relativement modeste du litige et aux honoraires professionnels qui auraient été facturés selon le modèle du taux horaire[47]. La possibilité prévoit des pourcentages progressifs qui augmentent avec l'avancement du dossier peut être équitable en fonction du travail consacré au dossier. Par contre, une telle formule peut dissuader les avocats à régler tôt dans le processus, même lorsqu'un règlement rapide est dans le meilleur intérêt des membres. Des pourcentages peuvent aussi être dégressifs à partir de l'obtention d'un certain montant à titre de règlement, mais cela aussi peut aussi avoir une influence dissuasive sur les efforts des avocats. Bref, chaque cas en est un d'espèce. Il n'y a pas de formule magique qui peut en tout temps et en toute situation garantir que les honoraires seront raisonnables au final. Surtout, l'analyse ne peut se borner à vérifier si la convention d'honoraires prévoit un pourcentage se situant à l'intérieur d'une fourchette généralement appliquée[48].

[60] Le modèle du facteur multiplicateur présente certains inconvénients et compte son lot de détracteurs. Dans Pellemans, le juge Prévost de la Cour supérieure souligne notamment que celui-ci :

> encourage peu l'efficacité du travail des avocats puisque le facteur multiplicateur ne vient qu'augmenter la valeur du temps inscrit par l'avocat au dossier. De plus, comme l'évaluation du facteur multiplicateur applicable à un dossier s'effectue au moment du règlement ou du jugement, il est plus susceptible de sous-évaluer le «risque» assumé par l'avocat au moment où le mandat est reçu.[50]

C'est également ce que soutient l'appelant dans son argumentation.

[61] Au sujet du facteur multiplicateur, la Cour a dit ceci :

Prévost a approuvé une convention d'honoraires à pourcentage correspondant à un multiplicateur de 4,58 dans l'affaire Pellemans[52].

[64] Comme mentionné ci-avant, une convention d'honoraires bénéficie d'une présomption de validité. Devant une telle présomption, l'analyse de la raisonnabilité des honoraires fixés par une convention à pourcentage devrait commencer avec l'application des critères autres que le temps consacré à l'affaire par les avocats. L'expérience nous enseigne que le montant d'honoraires payable en vertu d'une convention à pourcentage va souvent, sinon presque toujours, excéder le montant d'honoraires calculé sur la base du temps consacré à l'affaire multiplié par le ou les taux horaires applicables. Par conséquent, si l'analyse est axée sur les heures travaillées, le montant d'honoraires à payer risque toujours d'apparaître comme excessif ou déraisonnable. Ainsi, débuter l'analyse en prenant en compte les facteurs du temps et du taux horaire relève d'un raisonnement circulaire ou tautologique. En mettant de côté l'entente qui prévoit que les honoraires sont calculés sur la base d'un pourcentage et non en fonction du temps consacré au dossier, la conclusion que les honoraires sont déraisonnables est presque inévitable. Pour éviter cet écueil, le processus d'analyse devrait débuter par l'évaluation de tous les autres critères prévus dans le Code de déontologie et la prise en compte du risque assumé par les avocats. Si on en arrive à la conclusion que le montant (pas le pourcentage) d'honoraires payable est raisonnable, l'analyse peut s'arrêter dans l'exercice de la discrétion du juge. Par contre, si le montant d'honoraires semble déraisonnable, il convient dès lors de prendre en compte les heures consacrées au dossier et d'appliquer un facteur multiplicateur pour ajuster le montant des honoraires pour que celui-ci devienne raisonnable.

secondaire dans l'analyse de la raisonnabilité des honoraires[53]. Le risque assumé et le résultat obtenu devront normalement avoir préséance sachant que le poids à accorder à chaque facteur peut varier d'un cas à l'autre, selon les circonstances.

> [163] L'évaluation des honoraires par la voie du multiplicateur a toutefois ses limites.
>
> [168] Comme le Tribunal n'a déjà mentionné dans Servites de Marie, appliquée sans discernement, l'analyse par facteur multiplicatif peut mener à récompenser l'inefficacité, l'inexpérience ou, pire encore, l'incompétence. Des procédures mal rédigées, des inefficacités administratives ou une méconnaissance du droit peuvent mener en soi à des contestations par des parties défenderesses. En l'instance, on n'a qu'à penser quels retards et coûts auraient été causés si les actions en garantie des centres de service scolaires et du PGQ dans le dossier F. n'avaient pas été disjointes, si tous les membres B à G ou #1 à #5 auraient dû fournir tous les dossiers médicaux requis ou si plus de membres avaient été interrogés au préalable. Or, plus le nombre d'heures est élevé, plus le facteur multiplicatif est réduit.
> [169] Par ailleurs, le règlement rapide d'un dossier sera au bénéfice des membres, mais amplifiera nécessairement le facteur multiplicatif. Dans un dossier comme celui-ci, où nombre de membres sont sexagénaires, tout report du règlement est dévastateur.[54]

[68] L'approche que je préconise ne contredit pas les propos de la Cour au sujet du facteur multiplicateur. Dans Skarstedt[55], la Cour décrit le multiplicateur comme une manière de « corroborer » la conclusion obtenue par la considération des autres critères. Dans l'arrêt Banque Amex, précité, la Cour indique que le facteur multiplicateur « constitue un outil de mesure ou de contrôle du caractère raisonnable des honoraires ». Je propose simplement une manière saine et logique d'utiliser cet outil.

[69] En l'espèce, l'Entente prévoit des honoraires de 7 000 000 $ (plus débours et taxes applicables), représentant 25 % du fonds de règlement de 28 000 000 $. Le juge a conclu que ces honoraires étaient déraisonnables. Jugeant qu'il s'agissait d'un obstacle insurmontable à l'approbation de l'Entente, il a refusé d'approuver celle-ci et omis de fixer le montant des honoraires.

[71] Comme expliqué ci-avant, le juge a erré de manière manifeste et déterminante en refusant d'approuver l'Entente et de fixer le montant des honoraires vu, notamment, la rédaction de l'article 8 de l'Entente et de l'article 593 C.p.c. Même si je m'interroge quant à la manière dont le juge a appliqué le modèle du facteur multiplicateur, et donc sur l'exercice de sa discrétion en concluant que le montant des honoraires est déraisonnable, il n'est pas nécessaire d'infirmer sa conclusion à cet égard vu la disposition que je propose ci-dessous. Le juge n'a pas déclaré ce qui serait un montant raisonnable pour les honoraires; il n'a pas fait de détermination à cet égard. Donc, il n'y a pas de déférence due au juge pour la détermination par la Cour du montant des honoraires inférieur à 7 000 000 $ qui devra être payé aux avocats de l'appelant. La Cour a toute la latitude pour fixer elle-même le montant des honoraires raisonnable inférieur à 7 000 000 $.

[72] Le juge a reconnu l'expertise des avocats (en partie acquise durant l'action)[58] dans la représentation de victimes d'agressions sexuelles. Il a également reconnu qu'ils ont fait preuve d'un « grand engagement » envers les membres[59], ont effectué un « travail remarquable »[60] et ont obtenu un règlement avantageux pour les membres. Il a par ailleurs retenu que les avocats ont consacré un temps considérable au dossier, soit 3 479 heures, et qu'ils devront y dédier encore au moins 800 heures[61]. Il a tenu compte du risque assumé par les avocats, mais il a conclu que les honoraires réclamés comportaient une « prime au risque » trop élevée pour le niveau de responsabilité et de risque applicable en l'espèce, soit « une difficulté et un risque global moyens »[62]. La détermination du juge selon laquelle le niveau de risque assumé était moyen a de quoi surprendre, dans la mesure où il écrit, au paragr. 73 de son jugement, que « les avocats ont assumé un énorme risque en prenant ce dossier »[63].

[74] En première instance, toutes les parties étaient d'accord avec le montant des honoraires prévu par la convention, ou ne l'ont pas contesté, soit 7 000 000 $ (25 % du fonds de règlement). Seul le membre dissident s'opposait aux honoraires réclamés. Or, le juge écrit à son sujet :

Comme les membres étaient majoritairement d'accord en première instance avec des honoraires représentant 25 % du fonds de règlement, on peut présumer de leur accord avec des honoraires correspondant à 20 % du fonds de règlement.

[77] L'application du modèle du facteur multiplicateur confirme la raisonnabilité des honoraires désormais réclamés par les avocats des membres. En appliquant un taux horaire de 250 $ (qui était le taux indiqué dans la convention d'honoraires en cas de révocation du mandat) aux heures de travail effectuées (3 479) et à venir (800), le montant des honoraires serait de 1 069 750 $. La prime de 4 530 250 $ que représente le quantum des honoraires réclamés (5 600 000 $) en appel est moindre que les 5 ou 6 millions de dollars que le juge considère excessifs. Les honoraires réclamés (5 600 000 $) correspondent à un multiplicateur de 5,23 des honoraires estimés (1 069 750 $) selon la formule précédemment énoncée. En appliquant plutôt un multiplicateur de 4,5 aux honoraires estimés – un tel multiplicateur ayant été jugé valable dans Pellemans[66] – , le montant des honoraires serait de 4 813 875 $. Si on applique le multiplicateur de 4,64 suggéré par l'appelant et par l'amicus curiae, les honoraires se chiffreraient à 4 963 640 $.

[79] Je propose donc que la Cour prenne acte de l'offre des avocats de l'appelant de réduire le montant de leurs honoraires à 20 % du fonds de règlement. En conséquence, le montant des honoraires accordé sera de 5 600 000 $ plus taxes et débours.

c) Les honoraires de l'amicus curiae

[81] Je propose que les honoraires de l'amicus curiae soient payés par les membres, et donc déduits du montant du fonds de règlement.

67 Jugement entrepris, supra, note 2, paragr. 77.

MARK SCHRAGER, J.C.A.

[68] À l'audience, l'amicus curiae informe la Cour qu'au 28 février 2023, le temps consacré au dossier indique une facture de 60 000 $ approximativement.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

I. Nature of the Matter

[1] This is a judicial review brought by the Applicant, the Attorney General of Canada representing the Minister of Indigenous Services Canada [Canada]. The Applicant requests that various decisions of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal [Tribunal], all of which are listed below, be set aside and remitted to a different panel. The applications for judicial review, as amended, relate to the following Tribunal decisions:

(1) The September 6, 2019 decision in First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2019 CHRT 39 [Compensation Decision]. This is the decision at issue in the Federal Court File T-1621-19. The following Tribunal Decisions modified the Compensation Decision:

(i) The April 16, 2020 decision in First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2020 CHRT 7 [Additional Compensation Decision];

(ii) The May 28, 2020 decision in First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2020 CHRT 15 [Definitions Decision];

(iii) The February 11, 2021 decision in First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2021 CHRT 6 [Trust Decision]; and

(iv) The February 12, 2021 decision in First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2021 CHRT 7 [Framework Decision].

(2) The July 17, 2020 decision in First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2020 CHRT 20 [Eligibility Decision]. This is the decision at issue in the Federal Court File T-1559-20. The following Tribunal decisions modified and confirmed the Eligibility Decision:

(i) The November 25, 2020 decision in First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2020 CHRT 36 [2020 CHRT 36], as incorporated into the Framework Decision.

[2] The Compensation and Eligibility Decisions originate from a January 26, 2016 Tribunal decision (First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2016 CHRT 2 [Merit Decision]). The Merit Decision dealt with a February 23, 2007 human rights complaint [Complaint] made by the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada [Caring Society] and the Assembly of First Nations [AFN]. The Tribunal found sufficient evidence to establish a prima facie case of discrimination under section 5 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, RSC, 1985, c H-6 [CHRA]. In the Merit Decision, the Caring Society and the AFN established that First Nations children and families living on reserve and in the Yukon were denied equal child and family services under section 5(a) of the CHRA and/or were adversely differentiated under section 5(b) of the CHRA. The Tribunal's finding of discrimination pertains to Canada's funding of the First Nations Child and Family Services Program [FNCFS Program] and the funding of Jordan's Principle for related health services to First Nations children.

[3] Section 5 of the CHRA states that "it is a discriminatory practice in the provision of goods, services, facilities or accommodation customarily available to the general public (a) to deny, or to deny access to, any such good, service, facility or accommodation to any individual, or (b) to differentiate adversely in relation to any individual, on a prohibited ground of discrimination."

[4] The application for review of the Compensation Decision is dismissed.

[5] The application for judicial review of the Eligibility Decision is dismissed.

II. Background and Context

[6] The background context and procedural history leading to these applications for judicial review is complex to say the least. The underlying matters in this application have been ongoing for over a decade. The submissions and the record in these applications were extensive. While only two sets of decisions are the subject of this judicial review, it is useful to provide an overview of some key concepts and related Tribunal decisions to establish the proper context.

A. The Complaint

[7] In 2007, the Caring Society and the AFN filed the Complaint with the Canadian Human Rights Commission [Commission]. They alleged that Canada was violating the CHRA by discriminating against First Nations children and families who live on reserve by underfunding the delivery of child and family services. They argued that this discrimination was based on race and national or ethic origin. The Complaint noted the dramatic overrepresentation of First Nations children in foster care, the need for the proper implementation of Jordan's Principle (discussed in more detail below), and the systemic and ongoing nature of the discrimination. The Complaint also described past efforts by the Caring Society, AFN, and others to advocate for program reform and additional funding. The Commission exercised its discretion and referred the Complaint to the Tribunal for a hearing.

[8] Canada filed a judicial review application requesting that this Court quash the Commission's referral decision and prohibit the Tribunal from hearing the Complaint. In November 2009, the application was stayed (Canada (AG) v First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada (24 Nov 2009), Ottawa T-1753-08 (FC)). Canada sought judicial review of the stay decision and this Court dismissed the application (Canada (AG) v First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada, 2010 FC 343).

B. FNCFS Program

[9] In Canada, each province and territory has its own legislation that governs the delivery of services to children and families in need. However, First Nations children living on reserve and in the Yukon receive child and family services from the federal government through the FNCFS Program. This is because the federal government has "legislative authority" over "Indians, and lands reserved for the Indians" under section 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867, (UK), 30 & 31 Vict, c 3, reprinted in RSC 1985, Appendix II, No 5. The separation of powers are the driving force behind the types of jurisdictional disputes discussed in this decision.

[10] At the time the Complaint was filed, FNCFS agencies were funded by Canada according to a funding formula known as Directive 20-1 or as the Enhanced Prevention Focused Approach. In Ontario, funding is provided to FNCFS agencies under the 1965 Child Welfare Agreement. Where there are no FNCFS agencies within a province, provinces provide the service and may be reimbursed by Canada.

[11] The purpose of the FNCFS Program is to ensure that on reserve and Yukon-based First Nations children and families receive culturally appropriate assistance or benefits that are reasonably comparable to services provided to residents in other provinces. On reserve and Yukon-based First Nations children and families also receive other kinds of social services and products from the federal government.

C. Jordan's Principle

[12] Jordan's Principle is named after Jordan River Anderson, who was from Norway House Cree Nation in Manitoba. Jordan had complex medical needs. His parents surrendered him to provincial care so that he could receive the necessary treatment. Jordan could have gone to a specialized foster home but Canada and Manitoba disagreed over who should pay the foster care costs. Jordan died at age five having never lived outside the hospital. Based on these circumstances, Jordan's Principle was established. Jordan's Principle is described in the Merit Decision as follows:

> Jordan's Principle is a child-first principle and provides that where a government service is available to all other children and a jurisdictional dispute arises between Canada and a province/territory, or between departments in the same government regarding services to a First Nations child, the government department of first contact pays for the service and can seek reimbursement from the other government/department after the child has received the service. It is meant to prevent First Nations children from being denied essential public services or experiencing delays in receiving them (at para 351).

[13] The House of Commons unanimously passed Jordan's Principle on December 12, 2007 in House of Commons Motion 296:

> That, in the opinion of the House, the government should immediately adopt a child first principle, based on Jordan's Principle, to resolve jurisdictional disputes involving the care of First Nations children.

[14] A Memorandum of Understanding on Jordan's Principle [MOU] was signed between Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada [AANDC] and Health Canada in 2009. The MOU indicated that AANDC's role in responding to Jordan's Principle was by virtue of the range of social programs it provides to First Nations people, including: special education, assisted living, income assistance, and the FNCFS Program. The MOU was renewed in 2013.

D. Parties before the Tribunal

[15] The Caring Society and the AFN were co-complainants before the Tribunal. The Caring Society is a non-profit organization committed to research, policy development, and advocacy on behalf of First Nations agencies serving the well-being of children, youth, and families. The AFN is a national advocacy organization working on behalf of over 600 First Nations. The Commission represented the public interest. Canada was the Respondent. After the Tribunal requested an inquiry into the Complaint, the Tribunal granted interested party status to the Chiefs of Ontario [COO], who advocates on behalf of 133 First Nations in Ontario, and Amnesty International [Amnesty], an international non-governmental organization committed to the advancement of human rights across the globe. Nishnawbe Aski Nation [NAN], representing 49 First Nations' interests in Northern Ontario, and the Congress of the Aboriginal Peoples [CAP], representing off-reserve First Nations, Métis, and Inuit, were added after the Merit Decision.

III. Procedural History

[16] While it is not possible to summarize every legal argument or submission relied on by the parties in every proceeding, I will summarize the Tribunal's main decisions or rulings and the main submissions that are relevant to disposing of the applications before this Court.

A. Canada's motion to strike the Complaint

[17] In December 2009, the Applicant brought a preliminary motion at the Tribunal to strike the Complaint. It argued that its responsibility to fund the FNCFS Program and Jordan's Principle did not constitute a "service" within the meaning of the CHRA. It also characterized the Complaint as a cross-jurisdictional comparison of services and argued that such comparisons cannot establish discrimination.

[18] In March 2011, the Tribunal granted the Applicant's motion to strike based on the comparison issue. However, in April 2012, this Court quashed that decision and reinstated the Complaint (Canadian Human Rights Commission v Canada (AG), 2012 FC 445). In March 2013, the Federal Court of Appeal dismissed the Applicant's appeal of that decision (Canada (AG) v Canadian Human Rights Commission, 2013 FCA 75).

B. Retaliation

[19] In 2013, the Tribunal held a hearing into the allegations that the Applicant had retaliated against the Caring Society's executive director, Dr. Blackstock. The Tribunal found that the Applicant had retaliated against Dr. Blackstock by prohibiting her participation in a COO meeting held at the Minister's Office. The Tribunal ordered the Applicant to pay $10,000 for retaliation and $10,000 for pain and suffering (First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2016 CHRT 2). The Applicant did not seek judicial review of that decision.

C. The Merit Decision

[20] The Complaint hearing took approximately 70 days from February to October 2013. There were 25 witnesses and 500 documentary exhibits. Partway through the hearing, there was a three-month delay when the Caring Society discovered that the Applicant had knowingly failed to disclose 100,000 documents (Merit Decision at paras 14-16). Many of these documents were later held to be "prejudicial to Canada's case and highly relevant" (First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2019 CHRT 1 at para 13 [2019 CHRT 1]). The Tribunal issued a consent order, requiring the Applicant to compensate the Caring Society, the AFN, and the COO for "lack of transparency and blatant disregard" for the Tribunal process and because of "the serious impacts it had on the proceedings" (2019 CHRT 1 at para 30).

[21] The Applicant's submissions before the Tribunal included an overview of its commitment to the funding of the FNCFS Program, Jordan's Principle, and other programs. It submitted that there was insufficient evidence to substantiate the Complaint and that the documentary evidence should be given little, if any weight. The documentary evidence included Auditor General Reports, provincial Children's Advocates reports, the Blue Hills Report, and the Wen:De Reports. It also submitted that the Tribunal lacked jurisdiction to assess violations of international law or to provide remedies for any such alleged breaches. The Tribunal was also exceeding its jurisdiction by intruding into the role of the Executive branch of the government and formulating policy and funding decisions.

[22] The Applicant also submitted that Jordan's Principle was not a child welfare concept. Therefore, it was beyond the scope of the Complaint. Canada's response to Jordan's Principle did not demonstrate a prima facie case of discrimination.

[23] The Applicant did not argue that the Tribunal lacked jurisdiction to grant financial awards. Rather, Canada argued that there was insufficient evidence brought by the Complainants to support the requested monetary award for "victims" or "[children] being removed from their home."

[24] The Tribunal found that the Applicant had violated section 5 of the CHRA in two ways. First, the FNCFS Program discriminated against First Nations children and families on reserve and in the Yukon. The FNCFS Program resulted in inadequate fixed funding that hindered the delivery of culturally appropriate child welfare services, created incentives for its agencies to take First Nations children into care, and failed to consider the unique needs of First Nations children and families.

[25] Second, the Applicant discriminated by taking an overly narrow approach to Jordan's Principle. This resulted in service gaps, delays, and denials. The Tribunal stated the following about the connection between the FNCFS Program and Jordan's Principle:

> In the Panel's view, while not strictly a child welfare concept, Jordan's Principle is relevant and often intertwined with the > provision of child and family services to First Nations, including under the FNCFS Program. Wen:De Report Three specifically recommended the implementation of Jordan's Principle on the following basis, at page 16:

> > Jurisdictional disputes between federal government departments and between federal government departments and provinces have a significant and negative effect on the safety and well-being of Status Indian children […] the number of disputes that agencies experience each year is significant. In Phase 2, where this issue was explored in more depth, the 12 FNCFSA in the sample experienced a total of 393 jurisdictional disputes in the past year alone. Each one took about 50.25 person hours to resolve resulting in a significant tax on the already limited human resources (at para 362).

[26] The Tribunal found that the Applicant was aware that the FNCFS Program was creating inequalities and disparities for First Nations children trying to access essential services. It also noted that there were evidence-based solutions, as referenced in the National Policy Review reports of 2000 and the three Wen:De Reports, which Canada participated in. Despite having awareness of the problem and potential solutions, the Applicant had failed to make any substantive changes to address the issues (Merit Decision at paras 150-185). This decision also referred to the 2008 Auditor General Report, the 2008 and 2010 Report on the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, the 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General, and various other reports and testimonies (Merit Decision at paras 186-216).

[27] The Merit Decision recognized that the Applicant's discriminatory funding practices caused First Nations children and families living on reserves and in the Yukon to suffer. It found that "these adverse impacts perpetuate the historical disadvantage and trauma suffered by Aboriginal people, in particular as a result of the Residential Schools system" (Merit Decision at para 459). The Tribunal ordered that the Applicant immediately cease its discriminatory practices and engage in any reforms needed to bring itself into compliance with the Merit Decision. It also ordered the immediate implementation of Jordan's Principle's full meaning and scope. Finally, the Tribunal sought submissions on remedies.

[28] The Tribunal remained seized of the Complaint in order to oversee the Applicant's efforts to bring itself into compliance with the Merit Decision. It also remained seized to resolve outstanding issues related to victims' financial compensation. The Applicant did not seek judicial review of the Merit Decision.

D. Decisions following the Merit Decision

[29] After the Merit Decision, the Tribunal held several times that it retained jurisdiction to monitor matters to ensure discrimination ceased. The complexity of this proceeding is reflected in the summaries of certain other decisions, the most pertinent of which are below.

(1) First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2016 CHRT 10 [2016 CHRT 10]

[30] In April 2016, the Tribunal ordered the Applicant to take immediate action on certain findings in the Merit Decision and to provide a comprehensive report on actions taken. While it acknowledged that the Applicant was taking immediate steps to consult on ways to remedy the discrimination, it reminded the Applicant that it had ordered the immediate cessation of the discrimination. The Tribunal also explained that there is an increased need to retain jurisdiction because remedial orders responding to systemic discrimination can be difficult to implement.

[31] The Tribunal advised that it would address the outstanding questions of remedies in three steps:

> First, the panel will address requests for immediate reforms to the FNCFS Program, the 1965 Agreement and Jordan's Principle. This is the subject of the present ruling.
> Other mid to long-term reforms to the FNCFS Program and the 1965 Agreement, along with other requests for training and ongoing monitoring will be dealt with as a second step. Finally, the Parties will address the requests for compensation under ss. 53(2)(e) and 53(3) of the CHRA (2016 CHRT 10 at paras 4-5).

[32] The Applicant did not seek judicial review of this decision.

(2) First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2016 CHRT 16 [2016 CHRT 16]

[33] In September 2016, the Tribunal found that the Applicant was restricting the application of Jordan's Principle to First Nations children on reserve, as opposed to all First Nations children. The Tribunal also found that the Applicant was similarly restricting its application to First Nations children with "disabilities and those who present with a discrete, short-term issue for which there is a critical need for health and social supports" (2016 CHRT 16 at para 119). The Tribunal clarified that Jordan's Principle extends to all First Nations children, whether they live on or off reserve (2016 CHRT 16 at paras 118-119).

[34] The Tribunal requested that the Applicant provide further information on its consultations regarding Jordan's Principle and the process for dealing with claims. It ordered Canada to provide the names and contact information of all Jordan's Principle focal points to each FNCFS agency. The Tribunal noted that the Applicant's new formulation of Jordan's Principle once again appeared to be more restrictive than that created by the unanimous House of Commons motion and ordered Canada to address this (2016 CHRT 16 at paras 118-119, 160). Canada did not seek judicial review of this ruling.

(3) First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2017 CHRT 14 [2017 CHRT 14]

[35] In May 2017, the Tribunal found that the Applicant had still not brought itself into compliance with the prior rulings on Jordan's Principle. This decision also addressed NAN's submissions concerning a tragic situation in Wapekeka First Nation [Wapekeka], located in northern Ontario.

[36] In July 2016, Wapekeka made a proposal to Health Canada seeking funding for an in-community mental health team. In the proposal, Wapekeka alerted Health Canada to concerns about a suicide pact amongst a group of young girls. In January 2017, two twelve-year-old children tragically took their own lives.

[37] NAN amended its notice of motion seeking remedies with respect to the loss of these children. NAN filed two affidavits to support its amended motion. One affidavit was from Dr. Michael Kirlew, a community and family physician for Wapekeka, and an Investigating Coroner for Ontario's northwest region. Dr. Kirlew's evidence was that a Health Canada official had told him that Health Canada delayed responding to the Wapekeka proposal because it came at an "awkward time" in the federal funding cycle.

[38] The Applicant filed an affidavit of Robin Buckland, then Executive Director of the Office of Primary Health Care within Health Canada's First Nations Inuit Health Branch [FNIHB] and national lead for Jordan's Principle. In cross-examination, Ms. Buckland agreed that the Wapekeka proposal identified an example of a 'service gap' for children. She could not explain why Canada was not meeting the needs identified in the proposal.

[39] NAN submitted that there is a need to define what constitutes a 'service gap' under Jordan's Principle. Doing so will help ensure First Nations children properly receive sufficient government services. NAN also argued that a claimant should not automatically be denied compensation eligibility if they are unable to demonstrate a specific request for a service or support. NAN's submissions informed the definition of 'service gap' included in the Tribunal's ordered compensation framework [Compensation Framework].

[40] The Tribunal gave precise directions on how to process Jordan's Principle claims, reiterating two of its key purposes. First, an important goal of Jordan's Principle is to ensure that First Nations children do not experience gaps in services due to jurisdictional disputes. Second, because First Nations children may have additional needs, the delivery of services can go beyond what is otherwise not available to other persons. The Tribunal noted that a key concept of Jordan's Principle is that it is a child-first principle that applies equally to all First Nations children, whether resident on or off reserve.

(4) First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2017 CHRT 35 [2017 CHRT 35]

[41] The Applicant sought judicial review of 2017 CHRT 14 with respect to certain details about case conferences and timelines but discontinued this application after the Tribunal issued a consent order in November 2017. The Tribunal found that the Applicant was in substantial compliance with its directions regarding Jordan's Principle.

[42] The Tribunal set out key points to inform the Applicant's definition and application of Jordan's Principle. First, the Applicant must eliminate service gaps and engage a child-first approach that applies equally to all First Nations children, whether on or off reserve. Additionally, if a government service is available to all other children, the department of first contact must pay for the service without first engaging in any administrative procedure for funding and approval. Further, the Applicant should only engage in clinical case conferencing with professionals who have the relevant competencies and training. These consultations are only required as reasonably necessary to determine the requestor's clinical needs. The department of first contact can seek reimbursement after the recommended service is approved and funding is provided.

[43] The Tribunal further stated that where a government service is not necessarily available to all other children or is beyond the normative standard of care, the department of first contact must still evaluate whether a requested service should be provided. The department of first contact must pay for the service the First Nations child requests, without engaging in any administrative procedure before the recommended service is approved and funding is provided. The Applicant may also consult with the family, First Nation community, or service providers to fund services within set timeframes.

[44] Lastly, while Jordan's Principle can apply to jurisdictional disputes between governments and within the same government, such disputes are not a requirement for the application of Jordan's Principle.

(5) First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2018 CHRT 4 [2018 CHRT 4]

[45] In February 2018, the Tribunal again dealt with issues of noncompliance by the Applicant. It found that discrimination was continuing to occur on a national scale and the lack of prevention programs was leading to a disproportionate apprehension of First Nations children. The Applicant was ordered to pay FNCFS agencies' actual costs for certain matters and create a consultation committee where all the parties would meet to discuss the implementation of the Tribunal's orders.

[46] The Applicant raised concerns about the fairness of the Tribunal's approach to remedial jurisdiction. However, the Tribunal found no unfairness and stated that it would remain seized to ensure discrimination is eliminated. Specifically, the Tribunal found that "any potential procedural fairness to Canada is outweighed by the prejudice borne by the First Nations children and their families who suffered and, continue to suffer, unfairness and discrimination" (2018 CHRT 4 at para 389).

[47] The Tribunal reiterated its intent to move forward to the issue of compensation (2018 CHRT 4 at para 385). The Applicant did not seek judicial review of this ruling.

[48] While not part of the ruling, I pause to note that on March 2, 2018 the parties signed a Consultation Protocol that covered significant principles governing the parties' discussions. It also acknowledged the Tribunal's three-stage approach to remedies.

(6) First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada v Attorney General of Canada, 2019 CHRT 7 [Interim Eligibility Decision]

[49] The Caring Society brought a motion for relief to ensure that the definition of "First Nations child" as articulated in 2016 CHRT 2, 2016 CHRT 10, 2016 CHRT 16, and 2017 CHRT 14 was defined. The proposed motion read:

> An order that, pending adjudication of the compliance with the Tribunal's orders of Canada's definition of "First Nations Child" for the purposes of implementing Jordan's Principle, and in order to ensure that the Tribunal's orders are effective, Canada shall provide First Nations children living off-reserve who have urgent service needs, but do not have (and are not eligible for) Indian Act status, with the services required to meet those urgent service needs, pursuant to Jordan's Principle (Interim Eligibility Decision at para 27).

[50] The Caring Society brought this motion because the Caring Society had recently paid for the medical services of a First Nations child [SJ]. SJ did not have status under the Indian Act, RCS, 1985, c I-5 [Indian Act] but had one parent with section 6(2) Indian Act status. In other words, SJ lacked status because of the second generation cut-off rule. For this reason, and because of SJ's off-reserve residence, Canada refused to pay for the medical expenses (Interim Eligibility Decision at para 80).

[51] The Tribunal ordered the following:

> The Panel, in light of its findings and reasons, its approach to remedies and its previous orders in this case, above mentioned and, pursuant to section 53(2) a and b of the CHRA, orders that, pending the adjudication of the compliance with this Tribunal's orders and of Canada's definition of "First Nations child" for the purposes of implementing Jordan's Principle, and in order to ensure that the Tribunal's orders are effective, Canada shall provide First Nations children living off-reserve who have urgent and/or life threatening needs, but do not have (and are not eligible for) Indian Act status, with the services required to meet those urgent and/or life threatening service needs, pursuant to Jordan's Principle (Interim Eligibility Decision at para 87).

(1) The Compensation Decision: T-1621-19

[52] On March 15, 2019, prior to the hearing on compensation, the Tribunal sent the parties written questions about their respective positions on the topic. In short, the combined submissions of the Caring Society and AFN were that Canada should pay compensation for every child affected by the FNCFS Program that was taken into out-of-home care and that the compensation should be paid to First Nations children and their parents or grandparents. Further, the compensation should be retroactive to 2006 until such time that the Tribunal deemed the Applicant compliant with the Merit Decision. The other respondents echoed these submissions. In response, the Applicant opposed the claims made for individual financial compensation on the basis that the Tribunal lacked jurisdiction to grant such awards in cases about systemic discrimination.

[53] The Tribunal found that there are victims of Canada's discriminatory practices who are entitled to compensation. At paragraph 11 of the Framework Decision, the Tribunal provided a succinct summary of the Tribunal's ruling in the Compensation Decision:

> In the Compensation Decision, the Tribunal ordered compensation for children who were apprehended from their homes to start as of January 1, 2006. In this decision, the Tribunal determined that children who were apprehended from their home prior to January 1, 2006 but remained in care as of January 1, 2006 were within the scope of the Compensation Decision and eligible for compensation (paras. 37-76). Finally, the Tribunal determined that compensation should be paid to the estates of beneficiaries who experienced Canada's discriminatory conduct but passed away before being able to receive compensation (paras. 77-151).

[54] The Tribunal found that Canada's approach to funding was based on financial considerations. Further, Canada's practices resulted in First Nations children being removed from their homes, families, and communities, which led to "trauma and harm to the highest degree causing pain and suffering" (Compensation Decision at para 193). According to the Tribunal, Canada acted with little to no regard for the consequences of removal of First Nations children from their families. As a result, the Tribunal awarded First Nations children, parents, or grandparents $40,000 each. Pursuant to section 53(2)(e) of the CHRA, the first $20,000 was for pain and suffering. Pursuant to section 53(3) of the CHRA, the remaining $20,000 was awarded as special compensation for the discriminatory practices under the FNCFS Program and Jordan's Principle.

[55] The Tribunal did not order that Canada immediately pay compensation. Instead, the Tribunal ordered Canada to define eligibility for victims, create an appropriate methodology to govern distribution, and consult with the other parties who could provide comments and suggestions about the orders. The Tribunal directed that the consultations should generate procedures that would allow, but not obligate, First Nations to identify children for the purposes of Jordan's Principle. This interim ruling would remain in effect until a final order. The Tribunal retained jurisdiction.

[56] The Applicant judicially reviewed the Compensation Decision and requested a stay pending a decision on the Merit. In response, the Caring Society sought to stay the application for judicial review. Both motions were dismissed (Canada (AG) v First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada, 2019 FC 1529).

(2) Additional Compensation Decision

[57] Notwithstanding the Applicant's pending judicial review application, in February 2020 the Applicant, the AFN, and the Caring Society provided the Tribunal with a draft Compensation Framework. The parties also asked the Tribunal for guidance and clarification regarding compensation. In April 2020, the Tribunal clarified that:

(a) Child beneficiaries should gain unrestricted access to their compensation upon reaching their province's age of majority;

(b) Compensation should be paid to eligible First Nations children (and to the parents or grandparents) who entered into care before and remained in care until at least January 1, 2006; and

(c) Compensation should be paid to the estates of deceased individuals who otherwise would have been eligible for compensation (Additional Compensation Decision at paras 36, 75, 76, 152).

[58] There remained some elements of the draft Compensation Framework that were not agreed upon.

(3) The Definitions Decision

[59] On May 28, 2020, the Tribunal clarified the terms used in the Compensation Decision including ‘essential service’, ‘service gap’, and ‘unreasonable delay’. The decision also affirmed that eligible family caregivers did not extend beyond parents or grandparents. The Tribunal directed the parties to adopt three definitions to reflect its reasons in the finalization of the draft Compensation Framework.

(4) The Trusts Decision

[60] The Tribunal held that compensation payable to minors and individuals lacking capacity is to be paid into a trust. The Tribunal again retained jurisdiction and was empowered to resolve any individual disputes over compensation entitlements.

(5) The Framework Decision

[61] In this decision, the Tribunal addressed the process for compensation to First Nations children and beneficiaries as well as their parents or grandparents. The Tribunal approved the parties’ revised Compensation Framework and its accompanying schedules. The Compensation

Framework was consistent with, and subordinate to, the Tribunal's orders. One of the features of this decision was that victims could opt out of the compensation process. Within the present judicial review, this decision is being challenged under the Eligibility Decision.

F. Jordan's Principle Eligibility Decisions

[62] The rulings from 2016 to 2018, including the Merit Decision, did not expressly define the term 'all First Nations children' in connection with eligibility under Jordan's Principle. In February 2017, one of Canada's witnesses said that status under the Indian Act was not a mandatory requirement for receipt of services under Jordan's Principle. The following decisions contemplated whether non-status First Nations children are eligible for Jordan's Principle.

(1) Interim Eligibility Decision

[63] In February 2019, the Tribunal issued an interim ruling. The Applicant was ordered to provide non-status First Nations children living off reserve who had urgent and/or life threatening needs with the services required to meet those needs, pursuant to Jordan's Principle. The Tribunal ordered that this interim relief applied to (1) First Nations children without Indian Act status who live off reserve but are recognized as members by their Nation, and (2) those who have urgent and/or life-threatening needs. This interim relief order applied until a full hearing decided the definition of a 'First Nations child' under Jordan's Principle.

(2) Eligibility Decision: T-1559-20

[64] In May 2019, contrary to what was stated by one of Canada's officials in February 2017 (see paragraph 62 above), the then Associate Deputy Minister Mr. Perron said that "since the beginning" Canada understood the Tribunal's orders as applying only to children registered under the Indian Act. Canada ultimately broadened its approach to include non-status First Nations children who ordinarily reside on reserve. However, the Caring Society remained concerned that this approach was still too narrow and did not comply with 2017 CHRT 14, as it excludes children living off reserve. Accordingly, the Caring Society brought a motion for clarification and interim relief.

[65] At the Eligibility Decision hearing the Caring Society noted that there were three categories of children that Canada agreed were within the scope of the 2017 CHRT 14 Order:

> (a) A child, whether resident on or off reserve, with Indian Act status;
> (b) A child, whether resident on or off reserve, who is eligible for Indian Act status; and
> (c) A child, residing on or off reserve, covered by a First Nations self-government agreement or arrangement (Eligibility Decision at para 25).

[66] The Caring Society also argued that Canada was improperly excluding the following categories:

> (a) Children, residing on or off reserve whom a First Nations group, community or people recognizes as belonging to that group, community or people, in accordance with the customs or traditions of that First Nations group, community or people;

(b) First Nations children, residing on or off reserve, who have lost their connection to their First Nations communities due to the operation of the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop, or discrimination within the FNCFS Program; and

(c) First Nations children, residing on or off reserve, who do not have Indian Act status and who are not eligible for Indian Act status, but have a parent/guardian with, or who is eligible for, Indian Act status (Eligibility Decision at para 26).

[67] The Applicant argued that it was not appropriate to expand the scope of Jordan's Principle as requested by the Caring Society. The Caring Society's request extended beyond the Complaint, the particulars, the evidence, and the Tribunal's jurisdiction, as evidenced by the lack of consensus amongst the complainants. It also submitted that it was complying with the orders by providing Jordan's Principle eligibility to: registered First Nations children on or off reserve; First Nations children who are entitled to be registered; and Indigenous children, including non-status Indigenous children who are ordinarily resident on reserve (Eligibility Decision at para 73).

[68] After reviewing submissions on self-government and self-determination, treaties, international obligations, and constitutional principles, the Tribunal found that it was not determining citizenship or membership of First Nations but only eligibility for Jordan's Principle. In so doing, it confirmed that the categories currently used by Canada were appropriate for the purposes of Jordan's Principle. The Tribunal did find, however, that two new categories proposed by the Caring Society were within the scope of the Complaint and the evidence and thus eligible for Jordan's Principle:

(a) First Nations children, without Indian status, who are recognized as citizens or members of their respective First Nations; and

(b) First Nations children, residing on or off reserve, who do not have Indian Act status and who are not eligible for Indian Act status, but have a parent/guardian with, or who is eligible for Indian Act status.

[69] The Tribunal refused to admit the third category (those who lost their connection to their First Nations communities due to the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop, discrimination within the FNCFS Program, or other reasons). The Tribunal further stated that the Applicant should let the admitted categories of First Nations children "through the door" (including those who were already being admitted by virtue of Canada's expanded definition) and then assess case-by-case whether the actual provision of services would be consistent with substantive equality principles (Eligibility Decision at para 215). At this point, Canada sought judicial review of this decision.

[70] The parties made joint submissions on a proposed eligibility process for Jordan's Principle and asked the Tribunal to approve the eligibility criteria. Accordingly, the Tribunal ordered that cases meeting any one of four following criteria are eligible for consideration under Jordan's Principle:

(a) The child is registered or eligible to be registered under the Indian Act, as amended from time to time;

(b) The child has one parent/guardian who is registered or eligible to be registered under the Indian Act;

(c) The child is recognized by their Nation for the purposes of Jordan's Principle; or

(d) The child is ordinarily resident on reserve.

[71] The Tribunal reconfirmed it would retain jurisdiction for the time being. The Tribunal committed that it would cede its jurisdiction once the parties confirm eligibility criteria and a mechanism for implementation is developed and effective.

(4) The Framework Decision

[72] On February 12, 2021, the Tribunal approved the parties' revised Compensation Framework and its accompanying schedules. This Compensation Framework is consistent with, and subordinate to, the Tribunal's Orders. Under the Compensation Framework, an Administrator will oversee the compensation process and victims can opt out.

IV. Issues and Standard of Review

[73] Having reviewed the parties' submissions and arguments, the issues in this matter are:

(1) Was the Compensation Decision reasonable?

(2) Was the Eligibility Decision reasonable?

(3) Was Canada denied procedural fairness?

[74] The parties agree that the appropriate standard of review is reasonableness (Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65 [Vavilov]), save for any submissions on procedural fairness.

[75] The Applicant submits that a reasonableness review is a "robust exercise" where both the reasoning process and the outcome must bear the hallmarks of reasonableness (Vavilov at paras 12-13, 67, 72, 86, 99-100, 104). It submits that a failure to respect the statutory context or binding jurisprudence renders a decision unreasonable as does the failure to follow a logical line of reasoning or to properly consider the evidence (Vavilov at paras 102, 122-124).

[76] The Caring Society submits that the Applicant is actually proposing a correctness review. It submits that the Tribunal's findings of fact are not open to review in the absence of special circumstances. The Caring Society submits that the "robust exercise" referred to by the Applicant finds "its starting point in the principle of judicial restraint and demonstrates a respect for the distinct role of administrative decision makers." The Caring Society cites Vavilov at paragraphs 5 and 74 in support of this position. Accordingly, this Court should take a position of restraint and pay attention to the Tribunal's expertise in light of a lengthy, complex case comprised of mostly uncontested rulings (O'Grady v Bell Canada, 2020 FC 535 at para 31).

[77] The AFN states that the Court should accord respectful deference to the factual and legal determinations of the Tribunal given the lengthy process and numerous rulings and orders. The AFN also asks this Court to accept the Tribunal's interpretation of the broad remedial provisions of the CHRA. It submits that an administrative decision-maker has a large permissible space for acceptable decision-making where: the evidence before that decision-maker permits a number of outcomes; the decision-maker relies on its expertise and knowledge; and where there is little in the way of constraining legislative language (Vavilov at paras 31, 111-114, 125-126; Canada (Attorney General) v Zalys, 2020 FCA 81 at para 79).

[78] The Commission also submits that a reasonableness review starts from a position of judicial restraint. Accordingly, this Court must show respect for the distinct role of an administrative decision-maker such as the Tribunal. It submits that a reviewing Court is not to ask itself what decision it would have made, but only whether the party challenging the decision has met its burden of showing that an impugned decision was unreasonable (Vavilov at paras 83, 100).

[80] In light of Vavilov, I agree with the parties that reasonableness is the applicable standard for both the first and second issue. This means that a Court should not ask itself what decision it would have made if seized of the matter. Instead, a Court should only consider whether the moving party has met the burden of showing that the impugned decision was unreasonable in its rationale and outcome (Vavilov at paras 15, 75).

[81] I also agree that, absent exceptional circumstances, a reviewing Court is to leave a decision-maker's factual findings undisturbed. If a decision is internally coherent and based on a rational chain of analysis, a Court should defer to it (Vavilov at paras 125, 85). When reviewing for reasonableness, a Court does not assess the decision-maker's written reasons against a standard of perfection (Vavilov at paras 91-92). Minor flaws or missteps in a decision-maker's decision will not be sufficient to establish a reversible lack of justification, intelligibility and transparency – "sufficiently serious shortcomings" are required (Vavilov at para 100).

[82] On the issue of procedural fairness, no deference is owed to the Tribunal. The Federal Court of Appeal recently stated in Canada (AG) v Ennis, 2021 FCA 95:

> In this regard, it is well settled that administrative decision-makers are not afforded deference in respect of procedural fairness issues: Canadian Pacific Railway Company v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 FCA 69, [2019] 1 F.C.R. 121 at paras. 34-56; Wong v. Canada (Public Works and Government Services), 2018 FCA 101, 2018 C.L.L.C. 230-038 at para. 19 [Wong]; Ritchie v. Canada (Attorney General), 2017 FCA 114, 19 Admin. L.R. (6th) 177 at para. 16 [Ritchie] (at para 45).

[83] As such, the issue of procedural fairness is reviewable on the correctness standard.

V. Parties' Positions

[84] As stated above, the parties' submissions and the record is extensive. Below is a brief overview of the parties' respective positions in the matters before this Court.

A. Compensation Decision

(1) Applicant's Position

[85] The Applicant does not dispute that the FNCFS Program was broken and needed fixing. The Applicant also recognizes a need to compensate the children affected. The essence of the Applicant's submissions are that the Tribunal exceeded its authority under the CHRA in making the Orders in question. It submits that a reasonable exercise of remedial jurisdiction must be consistent with the nature of the Complaint, the evidence, and the statutory framework. It submits that both decisions fail on these points.

[86] It also submits that the Tribunal did not have jurisdiction to provide compensation similar to a class action, particularly when the Complaint dealt with systemic discrimination. The Applicant notes that no individuals entitled to compensation were party to the proceeding or provided evidence before the Tribunal.

[87] The Applicant's specific challenges to the reasonableness of the Compensation Decision can be summarized as follows:

(a) It was inconsistent with the nature of the Complaint;

(b) It turned the case into a class action;

(c) It failed to respect the principles of damage law;

(d) The reasons are inadequate;

(e) It erred in providing compensation under Jordan's Principle;

(f) The definitions in the Definitions Decision are unreasonable;

(g) It erred in finding that Canada's conduct was wilful and reckless; and

(h) It erred in giving compensation to caregivers.

[88] The Applicant submits that the Compensation Decision, in whole or in part, is unreasonable and that it should be remitted to a newly constituted panel of the Tribunal.

(2) Caring Society's Position

[89] The Caring Society submits that the Compensation Decision is reasonable and the Court should not set it aside for the following reasons:

(a) Victims of systemic discrimination are entitled to individual remedies;

(b) Canada's arguments about class actions are a red herring;

(c) Principles of tort law have no application to human rights remedies;

(d) The estates and trusts orders are reasonable;

(e) The evidence was clear that First Nations children have endured pain and suffering;

(f) Canada's knowledge of the harms being caused warrants a finding of wilful and reckless discrimination; and

(g) The finding of ongoing discrimination under the FNCFS Program is reasonable and supported by the evidence.

[90] The Caring Society also states that the Applicant raises arguments about several decisions that are not at issue in this judicial review. Accordingly, the Applicant is making an improper collateral attack on them and on the Merit Decision. Alternatively, if the Court finds any part of the Compensation Decision unreasonable, then it should only remit that part of the decision to the same panel of the Tribunal.

(3) The AFN's Position

[91] The AFN echoes the Caring Society's position. The AFN submits that the Tribunal has broad remedial discretion to make victims of discrimination whole again. Further, the Tribunal may address the perpetrator's wilful or reckless conduct. It submits that the Applicant mischaracterizes the individual compensation award as a class action by comparing it with the type of damages one may obtain in that type of court proceeding.

[92] Additionally, the AFN argues that the Tribunal properly assessed the evidence. Namely, there was evidence that children suffered harm because they were removed from their families due to the Applicant's underfunding of the FNCFS Program. The AFN points out that witnesses testified at the Tribunal about the harms families face when a child is removed from the family unit. Additionally, Canada was aware that underfunding caused harm because Canada has been party to various reports on the topic for the past 20 years. The Tribunal reasonably found that this constitutes wilful and reckless discrimination.

(4) The Commission's Position

[93] The Commission adopts the same position on reasonableness as the Caring Society and the AFN. The Commission states that the Court should approach the Compensation Decision from a position of judicial restraint. It points to the fact that the Tribunal has been seized with this matter for nine years, it has heard from many witnesses, and has received voluminous documentary evidence substantiating both systemic and individual discrimination due to the underfunding of the FNCFS Program. It also points to the many rulings, including the Merit Decision, which Canada has not challenged.

[94] The Commission notes that while aspects of the Compensation Decision may be bold, extraordinary violations of the CHRA appropriately call for extraordinary remedies. The Commission focuses on general principles of the CHRA and leaves the issues of victims and compensation to the Respondents.

(5) The COO's Position

[95] The COO focuses on the Eligibility Decision. As such, its submissions are set out below.

(6) NAN's Position

[96] NAN adopts the same position as the Caring Society, the AFN, and the Commission. The focus of NAN's submissions relate to the definition of certain terms found in the Definitions Decision, particularly the term 'service gap'. It drew the Court's attention, as it did before the Tribunal, to the tragic events in Wapekeka. These events illustrate that systemic and individual discrimination exists, contrary to what Canada claims. It submits that Canada's conduct was wilful and reckless and the financial awards are reasonable.

(7) Amnesty's Position

[97] Amnesty's interest in these proceedings is to ensure that the Compensation Decision and the Eligibility Decision are reviewed in light of Canada's international legal obligations. It submits that the Tribunal properly addressed Canada's international legal obligations.

(1) CAP's Position

[98] The Court granted CAP intervener status with the parties' consent but only with respect to the Eligibility Decision. Therefore, CAP's submissions are set out below.

B. Eligibility Decision

[99] The Applicant referred to this Decision as the 'First Nations child Definition decision' and the other parties referred to it as the 'Eligibility Decision'. In looking at the context, I have chosen to refer to it as the Eligibility Decision. As the Compensation Decision and the Eligibility Decision are connected, many of the parties' submissions about these two decisions overlap. Below I summarize the submissions directly related to the Eligibility Decision.

(1) The Applicant's Position

[100] The Applicant submits that the Eligibility Decision is unreasonable because the Tribunal exceeded its jurisdiction under the CHRA.

[101] The Applicant submits that the Complaint dealt with discrimination on reserve and in the Yukon. Further, there was no evidence related to the two additional classes of First Nations children which the Tribunal ruled were eligible for consideration:

> (a) Non-status children who are recognized by a First Nation as being a member of their community; and
> (b) Non-status children of parents who are eligible for Indian Act status.

[102] The Applicant submits that the first additional category imposes a burden to determine who is eligible within First Nations when these First Nations were not parties to the litigation and not consulted. The second category decides a complex question of identity that was not before the Tribunal and on which there is no consensus among First Nations.

(2) The Caring Society's Position

[103] The Caring Society submits that 'all First Nations children' does not mean 'children with Indian Act status'. The Tribunal modified the definition of 'First Nations child' to ensure that its Jordan's Principle Orders did not create further discrimination or result in additional complaints.

[104] The Caring Society disagrees with the Applicant's characterization of the Eligibility Decision. First, the definition adopted by the Tribunal is limited to the threshold question of whose service requests the Applicant must consider. Second, there is no obligation on First Nations to render any determinations on recognition of the children. Third, no First Nation has intervened to support Canada's position that consultation should have occurred or that this definition is too expansive or creates any obligations on them.

[105] It states that the Tribunal properly considered issues of First Nations identity, self-determination, international legal obligations, federal legislation, section 35 rights, and the scope of the Complaint. Alternatively, if any part of the Eligibility Decision is found to be unreasonable then only that part should be remitted to the same panel of the Tribunal.

(3) The AFN's Position

[106] The AFN submits that the Tribunal properly considered the colonial aspect of the Indian Act's status provisions and assimilationist policies within the context of Treaties and inherent rights. It states that the Tribunal reasonably found that the status provisions in the Indian Act did not meet human rights standards. In so doing, the Tribunal was not challenging the Indian Act status provisions. Rather, the Tribunal recognized that certain members of First Nations continued to experience discrimination when trying to access health services because of Canada's reliance on the Indian Act's definition of 'Indian'.

[107] In light of this entrenched systemic discrimination, it was open to the Tribunal to take a purposive approach in interpreting the CHRA. The Tribunal acted reasonably in extending eligibility for Jordan's Principle to individuals without Indian status who are recognized by their First Nations as citizens and members.

[108] The AFN requests that if the Court finds any part of the decision to be unreasonable, the Court should remit only that part for re-determination to the same panel of the Tribunal.

(4) The Commission's Position

[109] The Commission echoes the Caring Society and AFN's submissions. The Commission also submits that its interest was to urge the Tribunal to apply a human rights framework while taking into account principles of self-governance and self-determination. It notes that the Tribunal was not delving into First Nations' jurisdiction over citizenship or membership but was merely looking at eligibility under Jordan's Principle. The Tribunal, looking at the context of the Indian Act's history, properly noted that the Indian Act does not correspond with First Nations' own traditions and that it continues to have a discriminatory impact.

(5) The COO's Position

[110] The COO adopts the same position as the Caring Society, the AFN, and the Commission concerning the reasonableness of the Eligibility Decision. The COO focuses on the Tribunal's respect for First Nations' rights to self-determination. It also rejects the Applicant's submission that consultation and consensus with First Nations was required before the Eligibility Decision could be rendered. Canada cites no authority for its position that consultation with Frist Nations is required prior to the decision being rendered on this issue. It submits that the Court should endorse the approach taken by the Tribunal in constructing a remedy that accounts for the jurisdiction of First Nations.

(6) NAN's Position

[111] NAN adopts the same position as the Caring Society, the AFN, and the Commission concerning the reasonableness of the Eligibility Decision. It states that the overarching objective was to prevent further discrimination by exercising its remedial jurisdiction while also recognizing First Nations' jurisdiction over citizenship and membership. It states that the Tribunal properly considered eligibility under Jordan's Principle within the context of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, GA Res, UNGAOR, 61st Sess, Supp No 49, UN Doc A/RES/61/295 (2007) [UNDRIP].

(7) Amnesty's Position

[112] Amnesty's interest in these proceedings is to ensure that the Court reviews the Eligibility Decision in light of the Applicant's international legal obligations.

(8) CAP's Position

[113] CAP notes that the Applicant accepts the eligibility of non-status children who are ordinarily resident on reserve for Jordan's Principle. CAP submits that the additional two classes of eligibility added by the Tribunal were reasonable in light of the evidence and prior proceedings.

C. Procedural Fairness

(1) Applicant's Position

[114] The Applicant submits that the Tribunal denied it procedural fairness by:

(a) changing the nature of the Complaint in the remedial phase;

(b) failing to provide notice that it was assessing the ongoing nature of the discrimination;

(c) failing to provide sufficient reasons concerning the individual remedies;

(d) requiring the parties to create a new process to identify beneficiaries of the compensation order; and

(e) inviting the parties to request new beneficiaries in the same decision that it determined who qualifies for compensation.

(2) Position of the Respondents and Intervener

[115] The Respondents and Intervener generally submit that the Applicant was not denied procedural fairness. The Tribunal had not yet completed the remedies stage. Therefore, it was reasonable for the Tribunal to find that discrimination had not ceased. They also submit that the Tribunal provided notice of the issues it was considering to all parties. In particular, the Merit Decision identified various issues that the Tribunal would consider in the future. Further, the Applicant did not seek judicial review of that decision.

VI. Analysis

A. Preliminary Matter – Motion

[116] The Applicant's written submissions included a reference to two Parliamentary Budget Office Reports [PBO Reports] dated March 10, 2021 and February 23, 2021. Prior to finalizing the submissions, the Applicant sought agreement from the parties for their inclusion by way of email with a request of three days for reply. The parties did not respond to the Applicant's request and its written submissions included references to the two PBO Reports.

[117] The AFN objected to the inclusion of the PBO Reports and stated that their non-response was not an agreement for their acceptance. The AFN states that the Applicant did not bring forward a motion seeking to adduce fresh evidence on the matter. Therefore, the inclusion of the reports is improper and the Court should exclude them.

[118] The Applicant and the AFN agreed that the Court could dispense with this matter on the materials filed rather than devoting any time to this issue at the judicial review hearing. The Court agreed with this approach.

[119] Generally, an application for judicial review proceeds on the evidence before the decision-maker (Assn of Architects (Ontario) v Assn of Architectural Technologists (Ontario), 2002 FCA 218). The scenarios where the Court can consider new evidence are limited and include such issues as procedural fairness and jurisdiction (Gitxsan Treaty Society v HEU (1999), [2000] 1 FC 135; Reid v Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2020 FC 222 at para 33). The Applicant has raised the issue of the Tribunal rendering a decision without proper jurisdiction. In certain circumstances, this position can only succeed by bringing new evidence before the Court (Gitxsan Treaty Society v Hospital Employees' Union (1999), 177 DLR (4th) 687 at para 13 citing R v Nat Bell Liquors Ltd (1922), 65 DLR 1). I do not find that these circumstances arise here.

[120] I find that the inclusion of the PBO Reports has no bearing on the issues before this Court. The AFN is correct that the PBO Reports were not before the Tribunal in either of the applications for judicial review. As such, to the extent that they are relevant, I will rely on them solely for background purposes.

B. The Compensation Decision

(1) Reasonableness

[121] After considering the parties' submissions and the record before me, I find that the Tribunal has exercised its broad discretion in accordance with the CHRA and the jurisprudence. As a result, the Court defers to the Tribunal's approach and methodology concerning the Compensation Decision, which, when read as a whole, meets the Vavilov standard of reasonableness.

[122] The broad, remedial discretion of the CHRA must be considered in light of the context of this extraordinary proceeding, which involves a vulnerable segment of our society impacted by funding decisions within a complex jurisdictional scheme. It is not in dispute that First Nations occupy a unique position within Canada's constitutional legal structure. Further, no one can seriously doubt that First Nations people are amongst the most disadvantaged and marginalized members of Canadian society (Canada (Human Rights Commission) v Canada (AG), 2012 FC 445 at paras 332, 334). The Tribunal was aware of this and reasonably attempted to remedy the discrimination while being attentive to the very different positions of the parties. The Tribunal's overview of the parties' respective positions at every stage of the proceedings highlighted the fundamentally different perspectives of the Applicant and the Respondents. These differences were once again illustrated in the submissions on these judicial reviews.

[123] On one hand, the Applicant sought clarification and made submissions to focus on the requirement for individualistic proof of harms and the fact that it was attempting to remedy any shortcoming in funding with more funding. On the other hand, the Respondents and Interveners submit that the Tribunal was taking a holistic view of this matter. According to the Respondents, the Tribunal focused on the collective harms to children, families, and communities, from the residential school era through to the impacts caused by the funding of the FNCFS Program and Jordan's Principle.

[124] My reasons concerning the Tribunal's jurisdiction generally, as well as the eight specific challenges submitted by the Applicant, are set forth below.

(a) The Scope of the Tribunal's Jurisdiction

[125] There is no dispute amongst the parties concerning the principles governing human rights law and, in particular, the scope of the Tribunal's jurisdiction pursuant to the CHRA. However, the parties do disagree on whether the Tribunal exercised its powers within the parameters of the CHRA.

[126] The Supreme Court of Canada has previously held that the CHRA provides the Tribunal with broad statutory discretion to fashion appropriate remedies. These remedies attempt to make victims whole and prevent the recurrence of the same or similar discriminatory practices (Robichaud v Canada (Treasury Board), [1987] 2 SCR 84 at paras 13-15; Canada (Human Rights Commission) v Canada (AG), 2011 SCC 53 at para 62 [Mowat]).

[127] Similarly, the Federal Court of Appeal has held that the appropriate remedies in any given case is a question of mixed fact and law that is squarely within the Tribunal's expertise (Canada (Social Development) v Canada (Human Rights Commission), 2011 FCA 202 at para 17 [Walden 2011]; Collins v Attorney General of Canada, 2013 FCA 105 at para 4).

[128] It is also clear that human rights legislation is fundamental or quasi-constitutional and should be interpreted in a broad and purposive manner (Battlefords and District Co-operative Ltd v Gibbs, [1996] 3 SCR 566 at para 18). In other words, human rights legislation is to be construed liberally and purposively so that protected rights are given full recognition and effect (Jane Doe v Attorney General of Canada, 2018 FCA 183 at para 23 [Jane Doe]).

[129] The Applicant argues that the Tribunal only had authority to deal with the Complaint, which was in relation to an allegation of systemic underfunding. It also submits that there was insufficient evidence of individual harms before the Tribunal. The Applicant made similar arguments before the Tribunal as set out in the Compensation Decision at paragraphs 49-58. A brief summary of the Merit Decision, highlighted above at paragraphs 20-28, also set out some of the Applicant's arguments.

[130] The Respondents state that the Tribunal canvassed the nature of its jurisdiction at paragraph 94 of the Compensation Decision. The Tribunal wrote, "[t]he Tribunal's authority to award remedies such as compensation for pain and suffering and special damages for wilful and reckless conduct is found in the CHRA characterized by the Supreme Court of Canada on numerous occasions, to be quasi-constitutional legislation." In that same paragraph the Tribunal also referenced passages it wrote on its authority to grant remedies in 2018 CHRT 4, which was unchallenged. 2018 CHRT 4 states:

> [30] It is through the lens of the CHRA and Parliament's intent that remedies must be considered, rather than through the lens of the Treasury board authorities and/or the Financial Administration Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. F-11. The separation of powers argument is usually brought up in the context of remedies ordered under section 24 of the Charter (see for example Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Department of Education), 2003 SCC 62, which distracts from the proper interpretation of the CHRA. Moreover, the AGC did not demonstrate that the separation of powers is part of the CHRA interpretation analysis. None of the case law put forward by Canada and considered by the Panel changes the Panel's views on remedies under the CHRA.

[131] The Applicant also argues that the Tribunal improperly exercised its authority by retaining jurisdiction over its subsequent rulings. According to the Applicant, the Tribunal effectively abdicated its adjudicative responsibilities by directing the parties to try to reach agreements and by remaining seized to oversee implementation.

[132] I disagree with the Applicant. I am persuaded by the Respondents' submissions that the Tribunal's approach to the retention of jurisdiction has precedent. In Hughes v Elections Canada, 2010 CHRT 4 [Hughes 2010], Elections Canada was deemed to have engaged in discriminatory practice by failing to provide a barrier-free polling location. In that case, the Tribunal awarded broad public interest remedies and remained seized until the order in question and any subsequent implementation orders were carried out. The Tribunal also ordered the parties to consult with one another about various aspects of the Order, including their implementation (Hughes 2010 at para 100).

[133] Tribunals have also adopted this approach in various cases involving financial remedies for a single victim and large groups of victims (Grant v Manitoba Telecom Services Inc, 2012 CHRT 20 at paras 15, 23; Public Service Alliance of Canada v Canada (Treasury Board), 32 CHRR 349 at para 507, Order #9). The Tribunal also referenced that there was precedent for remaining seized with a case for up to ten years to ensure discrimination was remedied, mindsets had the opportunity to change, and settlement discussions occurred (Compensation Decision at para 10. See also 2018 CHRT 4 at para 388; McKinnon v Ontario (Ministry of Correctional Services), 1998 CarswellOnt 5895).

[134] Additionally, the Tribunal pointed out that there is nothing in the language of the CHRA that prevents awards of multiple remedies (Compensation Decision at para 130). I agree. The large, liberal approach to human rights legislation permits this method.

[135] The fact that the Tribunal has remained seized of this matter has allowed the Tribunal to foster dialogue between the parties. The Commission states that the leading commentators in this area support the use of a dialogic approach in cases of systemic discrimination involving government respondents (Gwen Brodsky, Shelagh Day & Frances M Kelly, “The Authority of Human Rights Tribunals to Grant Systemic Remedies”, (2017) 6:1 Can J of Human Rights 1). The Commission described this approach as bold considering the nature of the Complaint and the complexity of the proceedings.

[136] The dialogic approach contributes to the goal of reconciliation between Indigenous people and the Crown. It gives the parties opportunities to provide input, seek further direction from the Tribunal if necessary, and access information about Canada's efforts to bring itself in compliance with the decisions. As discussed later in my analysis of the Eligibility Decision, this approach allowed the Tribunal to set parameters on what it is able to address based on its jurisdiction under the CHRA, the Complaint, and its remedial jurisdiction.

[137] The Commission states that the dialogic approach was first adopted in this proceeding in 2016 and has been repeatedly affirmed since then. It submits that the application of the dialogic approach is relevant to the reasonableness considerations in that Canada has not sought judicial review of these prior rulings.

[138] I agree with the Tribunal's reliance on Grover v Canada (National Research Council) (1994), 24 CHRR 390 [Grover] where the task of determining "effective" remedies was characterized as demanding "innovation and flexibility on the part of the Tribunal…" (2016 CHRT 10 at para 15). Furthermore, I agree that "the [CHRA] is structured so as to encourage this flexibility" (2016 CHRT 10 at para 15). The Court in Grover stated that flexibility is required because the Tribunal has a difficult statutory mandate to fulfill (at para 40). The approach in Grover, in my view, supports the basis for the dialogic approach. This approach also allowed the parties to address key issues on how to address the discrimination, as my summary in the Procedural History section pointed out.

[139] Finally, given that Parliament tasked the Tribunal with the primary responsibility for remedying discrimination, I agree that the Court should show deference to the Tribunal in light of its statutory jurisdiction outlined above.

(b) Scope of the Complaint

[140] I am not persuaded by the Applicant's argument that the Tribunal transformed the Complaint from systemic discrimination to individual discrimination and, therefore, unreasonably awarded damages to individuals. The Applicant is correct that the Complaint was brought by two organizations rather than individuals. However, when one reviews the proceedings and rulings in their entirety, it is evident that from the outset, First Nations children and their families were identified as the subject matter of the Complaint or, alternatively, as victims.

[141] More importantly, the Merit Decision addressed all of the Applicant's submissions on this as well as the remaining issues. The Applicant did not challenge the Merit Decision. It cannot do so now. Nevertheless, I will review each of its submissions.

[142] The opening sentence of the Complaint reads as follows:

> On behalf of the Assembly of First Nations and the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada, we are writing to file a complaint pursuant to the Human Rights Act regarding the inequitable levels of child welfare funding provided to First Nations children and families on reserve pursuant to the Indian and Northern Affairs Canada (INAC) funding formula…

[143] The Applicant states that the Tribunal's Rules of Procedure require that the nature of a complaint be spelled out in the Statement of Particulars, to allow the Respondent awareness of the case to be met. It states that in this case there were no victims identified at the outset. The Applicant relies on Re CNR and Canadian Human Rights Commission (1985), 20 DLR (4th) 668 (FCA), which states:

> [10] This is not to say that such restitution is in every case impossible. On the contrary, paras. (b), (c) and (d) provide specifically for compensation, in kind or in money. Such compensation is limited to "the victim" of the discriminatory practice, which makes it impossible, or in any event inappropriate, to apply it in cases of group or systemic discrimination where, by the nature of things, individual victims are not always readily identifiable.

[144] The Applicant also cites Moore v British Columbia (Education), 2012 SCC 61 [Moore] where the Supreme Court of Canada emphasized that remedies must flow from the claim as framed by the complainants. The Applicant also cites Moore for the proposition that the Tribunal is not, in the words of the Applicant, a "roving commission of inquiry" (Moore at paras 64, 68-70).

[145] I agree with the principle that remedies must flow from the Complaint. However, I also note that the Court in Moore was still cognizant of the need for evidence in order to consider whether an individual or systemic claim of discrimination was established:

> [64] …the remedy must flow from the claim. In this case, the claim was made on behalf of Jeffrey, and the evidence giving concrete support to the claim all centered on him. While the Tribunal was certainly entitled to consider systemic evidence in order to determine whether Jeffrey had suffered discrimination, it was unnecessary for it to hold an extensive inquiry into the precise format of the provincial funding mechanism or the entire provincial administration of special education in order to determine > if Jeffrey was discriminated against. The Tribunal, with great respect, is an adjudicator of the particular claim that is before it, not a Royal Commission.

[146] Clearly, the Court in Moore focused on the absence of evidence related to systemic discrimination and noted that the evidence related to individual discrimination. In the present matter, there was evidence of both systemic and individual discrimination and evidence of harms entitling the Tribunal to award remedies for both.

[147] It is also important to note that at paragraph 58 of Moore the Court stated that discrimination is not to be understood in a binary way, or to be an "either or" proposition:

> It was, however, neither necessary nor conceptually helpful to divide discrimination into these two discrete categories. A practice is discriminatory whether it has an unjustifiably adverse impact on a single individual or systematically on several.

[148] Regarding the statement of particulars, the Commission clearly identified who the Complaint sought to benefit. At paragraph 16 of its updated/amended statement of particulars, the Commission stated numerous times that the Complaint concerned "First Nations children and families normally resident on reserve." Similarly, at paragraph 17 of its updated/amended statement of particulars, the Commission described the issue as follows:

> Has the Respondent discriminated against Aboriginal children in the provision of a service, namely either the lack of funding and/or the effect of the funding formula used for the funding of child welfare services to First Nations children and families, or adversely affected them, the whole contrary to s.5 of the Act on the grounds of race and national or ethnic origin?

[149] The Commission also clarified that that the Caring Society and the AFN were seeking compensation for those removed from their communities and the full and proper implementation of Jordan's Principle, pursuant to House of Commons Motion 296.

[150] In the Eligibility Decision, the Tribunal also noted at paragraph 200 that it had "already addressed the scope of the claim (complaint, Statement of Particulars, evidence, argument etc.) as opposed to the scope of the complaint in previous rulings and what forms part of the claim (see 2019 CHRT 39 at paras 99-102)." The Tribunal went further at paragraph 201 to state that "[t]his question was already asked and answered. The only other question to be answered on the Tribunal's jurisdiction here is if this motion goes beyond the claim or not. The Panel's response is that for issues I and II of this ruling it does not." The reference to "issues I and II" relate to the two additional categories of First Nations children.

[151] The Applicant, having been provided with the statements of particulars, responded with its own particulars. The Respondent also provided an updated statement of particulars in February 2013, which responded to the same issues it is now raising in this application.

[152] In addition, paragraphs 486, 487 and 489 of the Merit Decision set forth the positions of the Caring Society, the AFN, and the Applicant concerning compensation. There is no question that compensation was being sought for First Nations children and their families.

[153] I find that the Tribunal properly assessed the inter-relationship between the Complaint and the parties' statements of particulars. The Tribunal stated that the complaint form is just one aspect of the Complaint and that it is does not serve the purposes of a pleading (Polhill v Keeseekoowenin, 2017 CHRT 34 at para 13 [Polhill CHRT]). This would appear to be consistent with the overall objective of the CHRA, where proceedings before the Tribunal are "intended to be as expeditious and informal as possible" (Polhill CHRT at para 19).

[154] The Applicant's argument that the Respondents did not identify the victim in the Complaint is technical in nature. It is inappropriate to read quasi-constitutional legislation in a way that denies victims resolution of their complaint because of a technicality. Furthermore, a complaint form only provides a synopsis of the complaint, which will become clearer during the course of the process, and as the conditions for the hearing are defined in the statement of particulars (Polhill CHRT at para 36). If the Applicant is suggesting it was prejudiced by this alleged transformation of the Complaint, I do not see it on the face of the record before me.

[155] I agree with the Respondents that the Applicant's arguments concerning individual versus systemic remedies could have been made earlier. For example, this argument could have been raised when the Merit Decision was released. At paragraphs 383-394, the Merit Decision includes various findings made in relation to First Nations children and their families. These findings are in reference to the First Nations children and families identified in the Complaint and the statements of particulars filed by the parties themselves. The Merit Decision's 'summary of findings' section analyzes, in detail, the findings in relation to the FNCFS Program and Jordan's Principle and it gave advance warning that damages would be addressed in the future. All of the Tribunal's findings in the Merit Decision are tied to First Nations children and their families. These findings are reflected in virtually every subsequent decision, whether challenged or not.

[156] I agree with the Caring Society and the AFN that the Applicant cannot contest the compensatory consequences of systemic harm when the Applicant appears to accept the Tribunal's finding that widespread discrimination occurred. I note that, although the Applicant disagrees with the Tribunal's reasoning process and outcome, it recognized "a need to compensate the children affected" in its opening statement at the hearing for this judicial review. I also agree that the quantum of compensation awards for harm to dignity are tied to seriousness of the psychological impacts and discriminatory practices upon the victim, which does not require medical or other type of evidence to be proven.

[157] The Tribunal reviewed the Complaint and Statement of Particulars and noted that the Caring Society and AFN requested compensation for pain and suffering and special compensation remedies. At paragraphs 6-10 of the Compensation Decision the Tribunal reproduced its three-stage approach to remedies from 2016 CHRT 10 and its prior rulings to indicate that compensation was going to be addressed. Prior to the Compensation Decision, the Tribunal sent all the parties written questions concerning compensation and it invited submissions. That document also indicated the positions of the Caring Society and the AFN on damages. The Applicant's memorandum of law at paragraph 54 acknowledges that the Caring Society's request for a trust fund was to provide some compensation to removed children. The Applicant went on to suggest that the Caring Society did not request compensation be paid directly to individuals. Both of these statements indicate awareness that individual remedies were being contemplated.

[158] Compensation awarded pursuant to section 53(2)(a) of the CHRA is, of course, to compensate individuals for the loss of their right to be free from discrimination and the experience of victimization (Panacci v Attorney General of Canada, 2014 FC 368 at para 34). It is also intended to compensate for harm to dignity (Jane Doe at paras 13, 28). At paragraph 467 of the Merit Decision, the Tribunal acknowledged that the harm in question is the removal of First Nations children on the children and their families. At paragraphs 485-490 of the Merit Decision, the Tribunal summarized the parties' positions on compensation. It was clearly set forth that individual compensation was being sought. The Tribunal concluded by indicating it would send the parties some questions prior to determining compensation.

[159] Canada did not challenge the rulings prior to the Compensation Decision. Rather, Canada responded to the questions posed by the Tribunal on March 15, 2019. It is particularly important to note the third question posed by the Tribunal and its associated issues:

> 3. The Panel notices the co-complainants have requested different ways to award remedies in regards to compensation of victims under the CHRA.
> The Caring Society requested the compensation amounts awarded should be placed into an independent trust that will fund healing activities for the benefit of First Nations children who have suffered discrimination in the provision of child and family services. The Caring Society submits that an in-trust remedy that will lead to the establishment of a program of healing measures directed at persons who have been subjected to substandard child and family services is better suited to offering the children who have been taken into care since 2006 a meaningful remedy than awards of individual compensation could ever be. In this regard, the Caring Society specified that an analogy may be drawn to the > component of the Indian Residential Schools Settlement that provided for the payment of amounts to a healing foundation for the purpose of setting up healing programs for the benefit of survivors.

> The Panel is aware of the IAP process for residential schools' survivors and also knows there were both a healing foundation established and a fund for individual compensations for people that attended residential schools and then, there was an adjudication process for victims of abuse in the residential schools.
>
> The AFN requested the financial compensation be awarded to the victims and their families directly with its assistance to distribute the funds rather than placed in a healing fund.
>
> Why not do both instead of one or the other?
>
> The Panel would not want to adopt a paternalistic approach to awarding remedies in deciding what to do with the compensation funds in the event a compensation is awarded to the victims.
>
> Some children are now adults and may prefer financial compensation to healing activities. Some may want to start a business or do something else with their compensation. This raises the question of who should decide for the victims? The victims' rights belong to the victims do they not?

[160] At the Tribunal, the Applicant asserted that individual compensation must be predicated on individual victims being a party to the Complaint. The Tribunal addressed this argument by pointing out that section 40(1) of the CHRA allows a group to advance a complaint. The Tribunal also noted that pursuant to AFN resolution 85/201 the AFN is empowered to speak on behalf of First Nations children that have been discriminated against by Canada. This was a reasonable finding.

[161] The above passage indicates that the Tribunal considered systemic reforms and individual compensation at the heart of the Complaint. Further, over the course of many hearings the Applicant never adduced evidence in response to this proposition. The Applicant only ever stated that they disagreed with it or that the evidence was lacking. The Tribunal gave abundant consideration to the evidence before awarding relief, and was entitled to receive and accept any evidence it saw fit pursuant to section 50(3)(c) of the CHRA.

[162] I disagree with the Applicant's characterization of the decisions following the Merit Decision as an "open-ended series of proceedings." Rather, the subsequent proceedings reflect the Tribunal's management of the proceedings utilizing the dialogic approach. The Tribunal sought to enable negotiation and practical solutions to implementing its order and to give full recognition of human rights. As well, significant portions of the proceedings following the Merit Decision were a result of motions to ensure Canada's compliance with the various Tribunal orders and rulings.

[163] Additionally, I find that the Tribunal properly analyzed the CHRA and understood that victims and complainants can be different people (Compensation Decision at paras 112-115). The Tribunal has awarded non-complainant victims compensation before, in a pay equity case (Public Service Alliance of Canada v Canada Post Corporation, 2005 CHRT 39 at para 1023, Order #1 [PSAC CHRT]). It is also true that, in that same case, the Tribunal declined to award compensation for pain and suffering where no victims testified (PSAC CHRT at paras 991-992). However, these paragraphs emphasize that other evidence substantiating the claim of discrimination was lacking. As discussed below, this is unlike the present case because here, the Tribunal relied on extensive evidence. This evidence was referred to throughout the various decisions.

[164] Section 50(3)(c) of the CHRA gives the Tribunal broad discretion to accept any evidence it sees fit, even if that evidence would not be available in a court of law, including hearsay. In Canadian Human Rights Commission v Canada (Attorney General), 2010 FC 1135 aff'd Walden 2011 [Walden FC], this Court held that the Tribunal does not necessarily need to hear from all the alleged victims of discrimination in order to compensate all of them for pain and suffering (at para 73). There is nothing in the CHRA that requires testimony from a small group of representative victims either. The Tribunal has the discretion to rely on whatever evidence it wishes so long as its decision-making process is intelligible and reasonable.

[165] It is also important to clarify what pain and suffering the Tribunal was considering. The Applicant argues that individual complainants were required to provide evidence to particularize their harms. However, the Tribunal's overview of the evidence makes it clear that the harm in question includes harms to dignity stemming from the removal of children from their families (Compensation Decision at paras 13, 82-83, 86, 147-148, 161-162, 180, 182, 188, 223, 239A). As such, there was no need to particularize the specific harms flowing from the removal. It is the removal itself and the harm to dignity that the Tribunal was considering. The testimony of children and other victims was therefore unnecessary.

[166] I also find that the Tribunal did not err in finding that it had extensive evidence of both individual and systemic discrimination. At paragraphs 406-427 of the Merit Decision the Tribunal discussed the impact that removal of a child has on families through the lens of the residential school system. The Tribunal referred to the evidence of Dr. John Milloy, Elder Robert Joseph, and Dr. Amy Bombay.

[167] In the Compensation Decision, the Tribunal referred to the evidence it was relying on, which it fulsomely canvassed at paragraphs 156-197. I find that this treatment of the evidence is consistent with the principles regarding the sufficiency of evidence as found in Moore. In short, the Tribunal had a basis upon which to decide the way it did.

[168] I note that the Tribunal rejected Canada's individual versus systemic dichotomy as did the Court in Moore (Compensation Decision at para 146; Moore at para 58). The Applicant's argument that it is necessary to have proof of individual harm and the effect of removal of children from families and communities highlights this dichotomy. Clearly, the parties' different perspectives toward the nature of this dispute and the perspective of whether discrimination was being remedied resulted in the multiplicity of proceedings.

[169] I find that individual and systemic discrimination are not mutually exclusive for the purposes of such a compensation order. Furthermore, the idea that victims should be barred from individual remedies because of the systemic nature of the harm is unsupported by the language in the CHRA (Moore at para 58; Hughes 2010 at paras 64-74).

[170] The Commission submits that the Applicant relies heavily on a statement made by the Federal Court of Appeal that it would be impossible to award individual compensation to groups as they are not always readily available (Re CNR Co and Canadian Human Rights Commission (1985), 20 DLR (4th) 668 (FCA) at para 10). The Respondents note that the Supreme Court of Canada reversed this judgment (CN v Canada (Human Rights Commission), [1987] 1 SCR 1114). Therefore, they request that this Court disregard the Applicant's submission. Notwithstanding the Supreme Court's decision, I agree with the Commission that the statement relied on by the Applicant is distinguishable because, as already pointed out above, it is not necessary for individuals to be present and provide evidence.

[171] The Commission states that the Tribunal reasonably concluded that the CHRA allows it to compensate non-complainant victims of discrimination. The Commission submits that the Tribunal properly distinguished Menghani v Canada (Employment & Immigration Commission) (1993), 110 DLR (4th) 700 (FCTD) [Menghani]. The Applicant submits Menghani as an authority for not granting a remedy to a non-complainant. Having reviewed Menghani and the Tribunal's reasons, I find that the Tribunal properly distinguished the case in light of its review of the Applicant's argument that child victims testify. The issue in Menghani was the lack of standing under the CHRA for the non-complainant, which is not the case in the present matters.

> [108] It is clear from reviewing the Complainants' Statement of Particulars that they were seeking compensation from the beginning and also before the start of the hearing on the merits. The Tribunal requests parties to prepare statements of particulars in order to detail the claim given that the complaint form is short and cannot possibly contain all the elements of the claim. It also is > a fairness and natural justice instrument permitting parties to know their opponents' theory of the cause in advance in order to prepare their case. Sometimes, parties also present motions seeking to have allegations contained in the Statement of Particulars quashed in order to prevent the other party from presenting evidence on the issue.

> [109] The AGC responded to these compensation allegations and requests both in its updated Statement of Particulars of February 15, 2013 demonstrating it was well aware that the complainants the Caring Society and the AFN were seeking remedies for pain and suffering and for special compensation for individual children as part of their claim.
>
> [144] The Panel finds it is unreasonable to require vulnerable children to testify about the harms done to them as a result of the systemic racial discrimination especially when reliable hearsay evidence such as expert reports, reliable affidavits and testimonies of adults speaking on behalf of children and official government documents supports it. The AGC in making its submissions does not consider the Tribunal's findings in 2016 accepting numerous findings in reliable reports as its own. The AGC omits to consider the Tribunal's findings of the children's suffering in past and unchallenged decisions in this case.

[173] The Applicant also submits that the categories of people entitled to compensation as set out in paragraphs 245-251 of the Compensation Decision is quite different from what the Caring Society and AFN asked for. In those paragraphs, the Tribunal refers to the terms “necessarily removed” children, “unnecessarily removed” children, children affected by Jordan’s Principle as well as parents and caregiving grandparents. In my view, the Tribunal reasonably considered the various ways that underfunding of the FNCFS Program and Jordan’s Principle led to the removal of children from families and communities for the complex and multi-faceted reasons that the Applicant pointed out. It was reasonable to make finer distinctions between the reasons for removal, but regardless of the reason, the affected children were removed and were denied culturally appropriate services in their own communities. Again, this was the basis of the Complaint and the Orders are not so different than what the Caring Society and the AFN were asking for.

[174] For all of the above reasons, I find that the Tribunal did not go beyond the scope of the Complaint in arriving at its decision.

(c) Class Action

[175] The Applicant submits that the Order the Tribunal made was equivalent to a class action settlement without the proper representation of class members. As such, the Tribunal improperly extended its powers beyond what the legislation intended, which rendered the decision unreasonable (Vavilov at para 68). I disagree.

[176] The Applicant mischaracterizes the compensation award. Canada compares the award to the type of damages that one may obtain in a court proceeding. However, awards for pain and suffering under section 53 of the CHRA are compensation for the loss of one's right to be free from discrimination, from the experience of victimization, and the harm to their dignity. A victim is not required to prove loss (Lemire v Canada (Human Rights Commission), 2014 FCA 18 at para 85).

[177] It is clear that the Tribunal did not order compensation for tort-like damages or personal harm as is required in a class action proceeding. Rather, the Tribunal, as highlighted above, had a staged approach to remedies and specifically afforded the parties with an opportunity to present their positions on compensation. Once the submissions were received, the Tribunal considered the arguments and ordered compensation under section 53 of the CHRA.

[178] As seen above, the Tribunal can award both individual and systemic remedies, subject to the sufficiency of the evidence before it. A class action, however, focuses on the individual compensation award and there is no certainty that any systemic remedies will be awarded. The CHRA afforded the Caring Society and AFN with a process where both systemic and individual remedies can be sought and the Tribunal did not err when awarding both. The development of a Compensation Framework was consistent with the goals of determining the process for compensation to individuals.

[179] I also note that there is nothing in the CHRA that prohibits individuals from seeking remedies by way of class actions or separate legal actions. Other court processes can be pursued by the victims should they opt out of the Compensation Framework. As the Applicant pointed out, the AFN has commenced a class action for a class of people affected by removals. However, I find that the class action proceeding does not have a bearing on the issues at hand for the reasons just stated. The development of the Compensation Framework also does not suggest that a class action was the preferred way or the only way to proceed. I agree with the Caring Society that the option of a class action does not negate the Compensation Orders. Both remedies can be pursued simultaneously.

(d) Principles of Damages Law

[180] The Applicant also submits that the Compensation Decision breaches the principles of damages law. The Applicant argues that the Compensation Decision fails to distinguish between children removed for a short time versus children removed for a longer time and between children who experienced different circumstances. The Applicant cites many cases related to civil claims, which stand for the proposition that causation and proportionality must be considered when awarding damages (See e.g. Whiten v Pilot Insurance, 2002 SCC 118). However, I find that these cases are distinguishable due to the statutory framework at play in this case. The CHRA enables the Tribunal to award compensation for one's loss of dignity from discriminatory actions. As stated previously, no actual physical harm is required.

[181] Once again, the Applicant submits that the Tribunal should have required at least one individual to provide evidence about the harms they suffered (Walden FC at para 72). It states that it is unreasonable to assume that all removed children, regardless of their unique circumstances, meet the statutory criteria for compensation without evidence thereof.

[182] I disagree. Paragraph 73 of Walden FC is a direct answer to the Applicant's submission:

> The tribunal held that it could not award pain and suffering damages without evidence that spoke to the pain and suffering of individual claimants. This does not, however, mean that it necessarily required direct evidence from each individual. As the Commission noted, the Tribunal is empowered to accept evidence of various forms, including hearsay. Therefore the Tribunal could find that evidence from some individuals could be used to determine suffering of a group.

[183] The Respondents' position has consistently been that they seek to remedy the harms arising from the removal of First Nations children from their families and their communities.

They were not seeking individual tort-like loss suffered by each child or their families. The Tribunal reviewed the evidence related to harm in the Merit Decision, the Compensation Decision, and throughout numerous other rulings.

[184] The Applicant also cites Hughes v Canada (AG), 2019 FC 1026 at paras 42, 64 [Hughes 2019], stating that there must be a causal link between the discriminatory practice and the loss claimed. It submits that the Tribunal did not engage in an analysis of the effects that underfunding had on any of the recipients of compensation or the harms they suffered. The Applicant also states that the Tribunal did not differentiate between the circumstances of the recipients. The Applicant also refers to Youmbi Eken v Netrium Networks Inc, 2019 CHRT 44 [Netrium] for the proposition that the statutory maximum is awarded only in the most egregious of circumstances (at para 70).

[185] I agree with the principles of Hughes 2019 as pointed out by the Applicant. However, unlike the present case, the damages in that case were lost wages and the issue was the cut-off date for the damages. This matter involves an award of compensation for pain and suffering caused by discriminatory conduct resulting in the removal of children from their homes and communities. This is clearly distinguishable from a wage loss complaint. In Hughes 2019 the Court also noted that causation findings are intensive fact-finding inquiries which attract a high degree of deference (Hughes 2019 at para 72). I agree.

[186] The circumstances in Netrium are also unlike the circumstances of this matter. The complainant was an adult who suffered a job loss and she was awarded $7,000. In this matter, we are dealing with the harmful effects of removal on children over a considerable period of time. The awarding of the statutory maximum is within the discretion of the Tribunal to award based on the facts before it.

[187] The Applicant states that where the jurisdiction to consider group claims exists in human rights legislation, it is because legislatures have clearly provided it, such as the jurisdiction for Tribunals to deal with costs (Mowat at paras 57, 60). In Mowat the appellant argued that the broad, liberal, and purposive approach could lead to a finding that costs or expenses are compensable. That is not the case here. Neither the Caring Society nor the AFN are seeking anything more than what is contained in the CHRA and within the scope of the Tribunal's jurisdiction under the CHRA.

[188] I agree with the Respondents that tort law principles do not apply. The harm in this case, as determined by the Tribunal, was the removal of First Nations children from their families because of Canada's discriminatory funding model. As stated above, awards of compensation for pain and suffering are intended to compensate for an infringement of a person's dignity. The loss of dignity resulting from removal is a different harm that is not measured in the same manner as a tort or personal injury.

[189] The CHRA is not designed to address different levels of damages or engage in processes to assess fault-based personal harm. The Tribunal made human rights awards for pain and suffering because of the victim's loss of freedom from discrimination, experience of victimization, and harm to dignity. This falls squarely within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal.

[190] The quantum of compensation awards for harm to an individual's dignity is limited but is tied to the seriousness of psychological impacts upon the victim. The Tribunal considered the approach taken in the Residential Schools Settlement Agreement Common Experience Payment. However, the Tribunal only considered this for a Compensation Framework, not for the application of class action principles. The very purpose of the compensation award is to compensate a biological parent or grandparent for the loss of their child to a system that discriminated against them because they are First Nations.

[191] I agree with the Commission that it was open for the Tribunal to find that financial awards under the CHRA serve particular purposes that are unique to the human rights context. Namely, compensation for pain and suffering and special compensation for wilful and reckless discrimination, which are permitted within the quasi-constitutional CHRA.

[192] In this case, sections 53(2)(a), 53(2)(e), and 53(3) of the CHRA are relevant. They relate to a victim's dignity interests and the seriousness of psychological impacts. Vulnerability of the victim is relevant to the quantum of award, and the Commission submits that this is especially true when the victims are young (Opheim v Gill, 2016 CHRT 12 at para 43).

[193] The Caring Society submits that the quantum of damages awarded in the Compensation Decision is more than reasonable considering that Dr. Blackstock herself received two awards of $10,000. When this amount is viewed in relation to the category of victims and the harms they experienced, the Caring Society submits that the maximum award is reasonable. I agree with this submission.

[194] Ultimately, the unique context of the harms that were found in this case limits the application of damages law, contrary to the Applicant's submissions. In the unchallenged Merit Decision, it was clear that the harm was related to the removal of children from their families and the harm to the children's dignity as opposed to individualized tort-like harms that they suffered from the removal. The Tribunal has already determined what the harms were, who suffered those harms, and that the harms were caused by Canada's discriminatory funding regime (Merit Decision at para 349).

(e) Wilful and Reckless

[195] The Applicant submits that the Tribunal's finding of wilful and reckless discrimination was unreasonable and unprecedented because it had no regard to proportionality or the evidence. I disagree.

[196] Once again, the Applicant states that this cannot be determined without an inquiry into the facts and circumstances of individual cases. A reasonable decision would assess the causal relationship between the act of underfunding and the harm suffered and award compensation proportional to individual experiences. The Applicant states that the Tribunal did not do this. These arguments were already addressed in the previous section of this decision.

[197] The Applicant states that Canada did not discriminate wilfully and recklessly but rather made significant investments and changes to policies. For example, Canada commenced the funding of prevention activities. Furthermore, even if underfunding was a contributing factor to adverse outcomes for First Nations children, it was not the only factor in a complex situation.

The Applicant cites Canada (AG) v Johnstone, 2013 FC 113 [Johnstone] (aff'd 2014 FCA 110) where the Court set out the purpose of section 53(3) and defined "wilful and reckless" (Johnstone at para 155). Section 53(3) is a punitive provision, intended to provide a deterrent and to discourage those who deliberately discriminate. To be wilful, the discriminatory action must be intentional. Reckless discriminatory acts "disregard or show indifference for the consequences such that the conduct is done wantonly or heedlessly" (Johnstone at para 155).

[198] In this proceeding, the Applicant pointed to changes it was making when the Tribunal ruled. It also pointed out additional changes it made to specifically address matters identified by the Tribunal. The Applicant states that there was no deliberate attempt to ignore the needs of First Nations children.

[199] The Caring Society and AFN submit that extensive evidence was before the Tribunal showing that the Applicant was aware of the ongoing harm to First Nations children. Despite this, the Applicant chose not to take corrective action. The Tribunal pointed to the various Wen:De Reports, the National Policy Review reports, and the Auditor General Reports which were accepted by the parties in the Merit Decision (See paras 257-305). The Tribunal also heard evidence from many witnesses, all of which was canvassed in the Merit Decision (See paras 149-216) and the Compensation Decision (see paras 33, 90, 144-145, 152, 155-157, 162, 172, 174, 184).

[200] Based on its review of various internal, external, and parliamentary reports over the course of twenty years, the Tribunal had ample evidence to determine that Canada was aware of these issues. Therefore, it had a basis to award additional compensation up to $20,000 based on what it considered to be Canada's wilful and reckless discriminatory behaviour.

[201] When there is evidence that discriminatory practices caused pain and suffering, compensation should follow and be neither in excess of the $20,000 cap nor too low so as to trivialize the social importance of the CHRA. Special compensation for wilful and reckless conduct is a punitive provision intended to deter discrimination (Johnstone at para 155).

[202] As stated above, proof of loss by a victim is not required. The Commission submits that 'punitive' ought to be read in light of Lemire. In Lemire, the Federal Court of Appeal held that wilful and reckless conduct damages under CHRA are not penal in nature, but are to ensure compliance with statutory objectives of the CHRA (at para 90).

[203] The Tribunal properly considered the factual record in determining whether to award damages for wilful and reckless conduct. There was more than enough evidence in the form of reports, which Canada participated in, and which were independent, to ground this finding. The process and outcome of the Tribunal's decision amply reflects an internally coherent and rational chain of analysis.

(f) Definitions in the Definitions Decision

[204] The Applicant submits that the Compensation Decision and the subsequent decisions, particularly the Definitions Decision, produce unreasonable results. This is true even if the Court finds that some compensation to some children is appropriate for Jordan's Principle. More specifically, the Applicant submits that the combined effect of these decisions is that children and their caregivers are entitled to the maximum compensation even where no request is made; where the failure or delay to provide the service caused no harm; or the delay was not greater than what was experienced by a non-First Nations child. It again points to the lack of proportionality and a lack of evidence of individual harm. It submits that the Tribunal determined that every case is the worst case, which is the wrong way to consider the issue.

[205] As noted above, the Definitions Decision considered three terms used in the Compensation Decision: ‘essential services’, ‘service gaps’, and ‘unreasonable delay’. The parties could not agree on their meaning and had to ask the Tribunal to clarify these terms.

[206] The Applicant submits that the term ‘essential services’ was used multiple times in the Compensation Decision without being defined. Additionally, the Tribunal unreasonably rejected the Applicant’s submission that an ‘essential service’ was one that was necessary for the safety and security of the child. The Applicant takes issue with the Tribunal’s finding that any conduct that widens the gap between First Nations children and the rest of society is compensable, not only when it has an adverse impact on the health and safety of a First Nations child (Definitions Decision at para 147).

[207] The Caring Society submits that this Court should show deference to the Tribunal’s approach in developing a Compensation Framework for victims, which ultimately referenced these terms. The orders, read together, clearly define the class of victims who will receive compensation. I agree with the Caring Society’s submissions that the Tribunal also logically defined ‘essential services’ in its assessment of compensation, limiting compensation to situations “that widened the gap between First Nations children and the rest of Canadian society.” The Tribunal stated numerous times that the goal of the exercise of its remedial discretion was to remedy discrimination. Its findings in relation to ‘essential services’ are consistent with the goal of remedying discrimination against First Nation children.

[208] In comparison, the Applicant submits that the Tribunal’s definition of the term ‘service gap’ is unreasonable. It submits that the Tribunal unreasonably rejected Canada’s proposed criteria that would have given meaning to this term: the service should be requested; there should be a dispute between jurisdictions regarding who should pay; and the service should normally be publicly funded for any child in Canada (Definitions Decisions at para 107).

[209] NAN notes that Canada appears to take issue with the fact that the Compensation Framework permits compensation for unmet services absent a “request” being communicated to Canada. NAN agrees with the Caring Society’s position on the issue of ‘service gaps’ and submits that the Tribunal made a reasonable decision in accordance with the evidence and submissions before it. NAN made submissions before the Tribunal on the definition of ‘service gaps’ from the perspective of northern First Nations who routinely face systemic service gaps in essential services. NAN submits that it is clear from the Compensation Framework that the Tribunal carefully considered NAN’s perspective and incorporated its submissions in the ‘service gap’ definition. I find that the Tribunal had evidence and submissions before it to make this finding within the overarching jurisdiction of remedying discrimination.

[210] Regarding the term ‘unreasonable delay’, the Applicant submits that the Tribunal acknowledged that the Applicant must provide a much higher level of service in order to remedy past injustices and that it should not have to compensate where there are only minor deviations from those standards. However, it did not impose any reasonable limits (Definitions Decision at para 171, 174). In short, the Applicant submits that it is unreasonable to compensate everyone who experiences delay for any service at the levels ordered in the Compensation Decision.

[211] The Caring Society disagrees with the Applicant that compensation for any delay is inappropriate, as it is only unreasonable delay that factors into compensation. I agree with the Caring Society’s characterization of the Tribunal’s concept of delay. It is clear that not every delay is a factor. Further, the Caring Society takes issue with the Applicant’s characterization of the trust orders. Although the Applicant is not challenging them, the Caring Society argues that the Applicant is attempting to rely on them to raise doubts about the Tribunal’s overall analysis. The Caring Society states that these orders are reasonable and “anchored in sound legal principles.” I agree for the reasons stated above.

[212] The Commission submits that the Tribunal’s decision to compensate estates is justified and reasonable. The CHRA has broad remedial purposes and does not bar compensation to estates, as discussed in Stevenson v Canada (Human Rights Commission) (1983), 150 DLR (3d) 385. Canada has not actually pointed to any contrary decisions by a federal court interpreting the CHRA.

[213] The Applicant does rely on Canada (AG) v Hislop, 2007 SCC 10 [Hislop], but this case dealt with individuals who were deceased before the allegedly discriminatory laws were passed. Further, Hislop did not create a general rule that claims under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (UK), 1982, c 11 [Charter] always end upon death. The Tribunal also addressed Gregoire, wherein the British Columbia Court of Appeal found that an estate was not a "person" capable of making a claim under British Columbia's Human Rights Code (British Columbia v Gregoire, 2005 BCCA 585 [Gregoire] at para 14). The Tribunal distinguished the present matter from Gregoire and found that the claims for First Nations children and families were being pursued on behalf of "victims" – a term not used in British Columbia's Human Rights Code. As stated above, the Applicant was not necessarily challenging the finding with respect to estates, but argued it was yet another example of an unreasonable reasoning process.

[214] With respect to compelling public interest considerations, the Tribunal held that compensating estates would serve a dual purpose. It would compensate victims for pain and suffering caused by discrimination and would deter Canada from discriminating again. I agree with the Commission's submission that recent Tribunal rulings, which accept that financial remedies may be awarded to estates, suggests that the panel in this case was not rogue, but rather, reasonable.

[215] As stated throughout this judgment and reasons, the Applicant's insistence on individual harms misinterprets the nature of the Complaint advanced by the Caring Society and the AFN. Both were seeking remedies caused by the mass removal of children. As also noted above, the scope of the findings of the Tribunal were all an attempt to remedy discrimination, which it has jurisdiction to do. This is common as a proceeding moves through the process, but even more so considering the scope of the Complaint and the unprecedented nature of the claims and proceedings. The evolution of this case is not a departure from the essence of the Complaint. It is but a refinement due to the unique nature of this very complex and precedent-setting process.

[216] After considering the parties' submissions, I find that the Tribunal reasonably determined definitions for the terms 'essential services', 'service gaps', and 'unreasonable delay'. The Tribunal based its determinations on the Compensation Decision and with the overall goal of remedying and preventing discrimination. It reasonably exercised its jurisdiction as permitted under the CHRA.

(g) Inadequate Reasons

[217] The Applicant submits that the Tribunal's reasons were inadequate because they failed to explain its departure from the Menghani, Moore, and CNR decisions. Furthermore, the reasons were unresponsive to Canada's arguments. For example, the Applicant states that the Tribunal concluded that Gregoire does not apply because this is a complaint brought by organizations on behalf of victims and Gregoire involved a single representative of an individual complainant (Additional Compensation Decision at paras 133-134 distinguishing Gregoire at paras 7, 11-12). The Applicant submits that the Tribunal did not explain the significance of this difference.

[218] While the Applicant is not challenging the Tribunal's findings on compensation for estates, it nevertheless points out the Tribunal's failure to apply the rule in Hislop. Hislop stands for the proposition that an estate is not an individual and therefore it has no dignity than can be infringed. The Tribunal simply stated that the rule in that case is context-specific, and the human rights context justifies departing from the rule. The Applicant states that the Tribunal failed to explain why and that this is an example of lack of reasoning.

[219] The Applicant submits that the Tribunal also ignores relevant statutory authority, including sections 52 and 52.3 of the Indian Act. Section 52 of the Indian Act gives the Minister the authority to deal with the property of beneficiaries lacking competence. Section 52.3 contemplates the Minister working with Band Councils and parents to manage the property of minors within the relevant provincial schemes. Since the complainants did not challenge the constitutionality of the Indian Act the Tribunal was obliged to follow it.

[220] All of the above passages throughout this section of my reasons actually illustrate the scope of the Tribunal's analysis as well as the rationale for its findings. I find that the reasons are sufficient to show why it made its findings. The Applicant simply disagrees with those findings.

(h) Jordan's Principle Compensation

[221] The Applicant states that through a series of decisions the Tribunal has created a new government policy and awarded compensation for a failure to implement that policy. The Applicant states that by adopting Jordan's Principle, the House of Commons endorsed the principle that intergovernmental funding disputes should not delay the provision of necessary products and services to First Nations children.

[222] The Applicant submits that Jordan's Principle received only passing reference in the Complaint. Over the course of the litigation, the Tribunal transformed Jordan's Principle from a resolution aimed at addressing jurisdictional wrangling, to a "legal rule" that ensures substantive equality to a far greater group than First Nations children on reserve and in the Yukon. The Applicant says it "accepted" these rulings because they reflected progressive policy choices and that the results have been impressive.

[223] The Caring Society disagrees with the Applicant's assertion that Jordan's Principle never formed part of the Complaint. Rather, they submit that the Tribunal had previously addressed this claim and ruled that Jordan's Principle was intertwined with the FNCFS Program (see paragraph 25 above). Because the Applicant previously accepted these findings, they state that Canada cannot argue that they are unreasonable on judicial review. I agree. The Applicant has forgone its right to challenge the Merit Decision. Also, as pointed out in paragraph 14 above, the MOU between AANDC and Health Canada also referenced the link between the FNCFS Program and Jordan's Principle.

[224] I agree with the Commission that the issues pleaded are broad enough to encompass matters relating to Jordan's Principle. The Tribunal made rulings in 2016 and 2017 that expressly rejected the Applicant's argument that Jordan's Principle was beyond the scope of the Tribunal's inquiry. I agree with the Commission that if the Applicant truly believed that Jordan's Principle is beyond the Tribunal's scope, then it should have applied for judicial review of those earlier rulings.

(i) Compensation to Caregivers

[225] The Applicant states that there was no basis for awarding compensation to caregivers as there was no evidence of the impact of funding policies on that group. Additionally, family members must advance claims themselves and provide evidence of the harm they suffered, which they have not (Menghani at 29).

[226] The Applicant submits that the Complaint was silent regarding compensation. Furthermore, prior to the AFN's submissions that family members should be compensated, the Caring Society had only submitted that any compensation should be paid into a trust. Since there were no caregiver complainants and no evidence of the harms they suffered, the decision is unreasonable.

[227] In my view, the Tribunal reasonably found that the AFN is empowered via the mandate of the Chiefs-in-Assembly to speak on behalf of First Nations parents and caregiving grandparents as victims of Canada's discrimination. The Tribunal also interpreted the CHRA and found that complaints on behalf of victims made by representatives can occur. The Commission has the discretion to refuse to deal with a complaint if the victim does not consent.

[228] The record also confirms that the Tribunal always used the terms 'First Nations children and families' from the Merit Decision onwards. The Complaint, statement of particulars, and numerous passages of the Merit Decision confirm this. In fact, all parties' submissions referred to the victims in this manner.

[229] There was extensive evidence before the Tribunal at the hearing of the Compensation Decision. This evidence particularized the alleged harms and the impact of removal on children, families, and communities. There was extensive evidence from several experts as well as reports that Canada had endorsed, including the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, which explained the significance of family in First Nations culture. The Tribunal therefore had evidence before it to inform its ruling concerning families.

[230] The Tribunal received and accepted evidence it saw fit pursuant to section 50(3)(c) CHRA. It accepted evidence in relation to harms suffered by these victims, which was ample and sufficient to make its finding that each parent or grandparent who had a child unnecessarily removed has suffered. The evidence of the various reports showed that communities and extended families also suffered by the removal of children but the Tribunal did not extend the compensation to all family members. In my view, the Tribunal was sensitive to the kinship systems in First Nations communities (See e.g. Compensation Decision at para 255). At the same time, it was also cognisant of the limits to its jurisdiction and the evidence in restricting the compensation only to parents or caregivers despite the general submissions related to ‘families’. Ultimately, the Tribunal’s reasons were clearly alive to the issue of not only children, but families and caregivers as well (Compensation Decision at paras 11, 13, 32, 141, 153-155, 162, 166-167, 171, 187, 193, 255). The Tribunal’s finding with respect to compensating parents or caregiving grandparents is transparent, intelligible, and justified.

(2) Compensation Decision Conclusion

[231] Ultimately, the Compensation Decision is reasonable because the CHRA provides the Tribunal with broad discretion to fashion appropriate remedies to fit the circumstances. To receive an award, the victims did not need to testify to establish individual harm. The Tribunal already had extensive evidence of Canada's discrimination; the resulting harm experienced by First Nations children and their families (the removal of First Nations children from their homes); and Canada's knowledge of that harm. Further, the Tribunal did not turn the proceedings into a class action because the nature and rationale behind the awards are different from those ordered in a class action. From the outset, First Nations children and families were the subject matter of the complaint and Canada always knew that the Respondents were seeking compensation for the victims. If Canada wanted to challenge these aspects of the Complaint, it should have done so earlier. Canada may not collaterally attack the Merit Decision or other decisions in this proceeding.

C. The Eligibility Decision

[232] Before delving into the analysis of this issue, there are several things to note about the Eligibility Decision. First, in describing the context, the Tribunal pointed out that the Merit Decision confirmed that "the Complainants had substantiated their complaint that First Nations children and families living on reserve and in the Yukon are denied equal child and family services and/or differentiated adversely in the provision of services, pursuant to section 5 of the CHRA" (Eligibility Decision at para 2). Next, the Tribunal described the steps Canada would take to implement the Tribunal's order and additional findings in 2017 CHRT 14 regarding Canada's narrow interpretation of Jordan's Principle. This led to amended orders in 2017 CHRT 35 which were not challenged.

[233] Second, and more importantly, at paragraph 17 of the Eligibility Decision, the Tribunal noted that neither the Tribunal nor the parties had provided a definition for ‘First Nations child’ until the Caring Society brought the motion leading to the Eligibility Decision. The Tribunal did note that the parties had been discussing this issue outside of the Tribunal process but had not reached a consensus on this issue. In the Interim Eligibility Decision the Tribunal concluded that this issue was best determined at a full hearing and it sought submissions on a wide spectrum of issues such as international law and the UNDRIP, discrimination cases under the Indian Act, Aboriginal law, human rights law, and constitutional law.

[234] Third, it is helpful to recall the parties’ positions with respect to eligibility and what the Eligibility Decision actually decided. Prior to the Eligibility Decision, the Applicant wished to restrict eligibility for Jordan’s Principle to “First Nations children living on reserve” and “First Nations children with ‘disabilities and those who present with a discrete, short-term issue for which there is a critical need for health and social supports’” (Interim Eligibility Decision at para 12). At the time of the Eligibility Decision the Applicant willingly expanded eligibility to (a) Registered First Nations children, living on or off reserve; (b) First Nations children who are entitled to be registered; and (c) Indigenous children, including non-status Indigenous children who ordinarily reside on reserve. In comparison, the Caring Society wanted Jordan’s Principle to apply to First Nations children beyond children with status that live on reserves. The Caring Society proposed three additional categories to the Tribunal. For the sake of simplicity, I will refer to the Caring Society’s additional three categories as the first, second, and third categories in the order that they were addressed by the Tribunal in the Eligibility Decision. The Tribunal made the following ruling regarding the first category:

> > Should First Nations children without Indian Act status who are recognized as citizens or members of their respective First Nations be included under Jordan's Principle?
> [212] The Panel, in light of the reasons outlined above, answers yes to this question…
> > If the previously noted First Nations children are included in the eligibility criteria, does it automatically grant them services or does it only trigger the second part of the process, namely 1) a case-by-case approach and 2) respecting the inherent right to self-determination of First Nations to determine their citizens and/or members before the child is considered to be a Jordan's Principle case?
> [214] The Panel believes that it is the latter…

[235] The following excerpts highlight the Tribunal's ruling on the second category:

> [272] The Panel pursuant to section 53 (2) of the CHRA orders the AFN, the Caring Society, the Commission, the COO, the NAN and Canada to include as part of their consultations for the order in section I, First Nations children who do not have Indian Act status and who are not eligible for Indian Act status, but have a parent/guardian with, or who is eligible for, Indian Act status.
> [273] Further, Canada is ordered to immediately consider eligible for Jordan's Principle services those First Nations children who will become eligible for Indian Act registration/status under S-3 implementation.

[236] The following passages highlight the Tribunal's ruling on the third category, which the Tribunal split into two categories:

> [274] This last section will deal with two additional categories:

> First Nations children without Indian Act status, residing off reserve, who have lost their connection to their First Nations communities due to the operation of the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop, or discrimination within the FNCFS Program.
> First Nations children without Indian Act status, residing off reserve, who have lost their connection to their First Nations communities due to other reasons.

> [280] This being said, the Panel finds that First Nations children residing off reserve who have lost connection to their First Nations communities for other reasons than the discrimination found in this case fall outside of the claim before it. The claim was not focused on this at all until the 2019 motion and sufficient evidence has not been presented to support such a finding. As the Panel previously said, the Supreme Court of Canada stated in Moore that the remedy must flow from the claim.

> [283] However, the Panel did not make findings in regards to the services First Nations children of Residential School and of Sixties Scoop survivors receive off-reserve who are not recognized as part of a First Nation community given that it was not advanced by the parties in their claim or arguments before this motion and insufficient evidence was presented.

> [285] Given the lack of evidence in this motion, the Panel is not in a position to make findings let alone remedial orders for the two above categories at this time.

[237] In the end, the Tribunal only added the first and second categories of First Nations children who could be eligible for services under Jordan's Principle. The Tribunal also ordered the parties consult to generate potential eligibility criteria for Jordan's Principle. The parties were to consider the Tribunal's rulings and establish a mechanism to identify citizens/members of First Nations as well as funding sources.

[238] The Applicant's arguments regarding the Eligibility Decision, which I address below, relate to one another and necessarily overlap. Ultimately, I find that the Tribunal's definition of the term 'First Nations child' falls within a range of possible outcomes which are defensible in respect of the facts and the law.

(1) Reasonableness

(a) The Scope of the Tribunal's Jurisdiction & the Scope of the Complaint

[239] The Applicant submits that the Tribunal exceeded its jurisdiction in making the Orders. Specifically, the decision falls outside the scope of the Complaint and the evidence by adding categories that the Caring Society and the AFN did not even ask for. The Applicant also submits that the Caring Society and AFN essentially challenged the provisions of the Indian Act and that the Tribunal had no jurisdiction to entertain such submissions.

[240] On the whole, the Respondents submit that creating additional categories and defining 'First Nations child' beyond the scope of the Indian Act is consistent with international law principles; complies with a human rights framework; respects First Nations' rights to self-government and self-determination; and ensures substantive equality.

[241] In my view, the inclusion of two additional categories of children is not beyond the Tribunal's jurisdiction or the scope of the Complaint. With respect to the Tribunal's jurisdiction under the CHRA, I adopt the same reasoning set out above in the section addressing the Compensation Decision. The Tribunal found that a definition of 'First Nations child' predicated on the Indian Act would perpetuate discrimination. In making this finding, it was not ruling on the validity of the Indian Act. It was within the general and remedial jurisdiction of the Tribunal to prevent further discrimination by adding additional categories for eligibility that extend beyond the Indian Act. As for the scope of the Complaint, there is a clear nexus between the Eligibility Decision and the original Complaint. The Complaint involved Jordan's Principle and the Tribunal addressed this aspect of the Complaint by creating two additional categories of children who are eligible for Jordan's Principle. Additionally, it was a live issue for the Tribunal to define the meaning of 'First Nations child' because the parties had not yet determined the scope of this term.

[242] Although not always stated, at their core, the parties' submissions and the Tribunal's decision centre on the Indian Act. This does not mean that that the Tribunal acted outside of its jurisdiction when creating new categories of eligibility, however. There is a difference between legally challenging the status provisions of the Indian Act and defining 'First Nations child' for the purposes of eligibility under Jordan's Principle. Just because the Tribunal extended eligibility for Jordan's Principle beyond the confines of the Indian Act, does not mean that the Tribunal acted outside its jurisdiction or that it determined that the status provisions were invalid.

[243] There are numerous examples within the record to support the position that the Indian Act was central to the underlying proceedings. The Complaint explicitly referred to discrimination of First Nations children ‘on reserve’. Likewise, both parties’ submissions and the Tribunal’s decisions about eligibility discussed children living on ‘reserve’ and children with ‘status’. These concepts are creatures of the Indian Act. There simply is no ‘reserve’ or ‘status’ system without the Indian Act.

[244] Additionally, at the Federal Court hearing, the Applicant discussed the affidavit of Dr. Gideon. Of course, Dr. Gideon’s affidavit was also before the Tribunal. With this affidavit, the Respondent wanted to demonstrate that Canada was taking a liberal view of the definition of ‘First Nations child’ for the purposes of Jordan’s Principle. Dr. Gideon’s affidavit makes numerous references to the Indian Act and the concepts of ‘reserve’ and ‘status’. Indeed, it is difficult, if not impossible, to not consider the terms ‘reserve’ and ’status’ without also considering the Indian Act.

[245] Another example of the Applicant’s awareness of the Indian Act’s effect on the Eligibility Decision can be found in its submissions. The Applicant submits that the definition it was employing at the time of the Eligibility Decision was not discriminatory. It included children registered or entitled to be registered under the Indian Act who had a connection to a reserve, even if not always resident on it, and children ordinarily resident on reserve even if they did not have Indian Act status (2020 CHRT 36 at paras 17-18). The Applicant also led evidence from Mr. Perron that First Nations children with Indian Act status living off reserve suffered due to jurisdictional disputes. Conversely, there was no evidence related to non-status, off reserve children suffering discriminatory treatment.

[246] Canada's expanded categories are clearly informed by the Indian Act as they focus on status and residency on reserves. I acknowledge that these categories are more inclusive than Canada's original positions regarding eligibility and reflect a significant move forward. I recognize Canada's attempt in trying to eliminate discrimination within the context of not only the Complaint, the evidence, and the various decisions and rulings, but also within the existing legislative and constitutional constraints in which the parties operate.

[247] I am not persuaded, however, by the Applicant's submissions that the two additional categories are outside the scope of the Tribunal's jurisdiction, the Complaint, or the evidence before the Tribunal. It is true that there was evidence on the relationship between the Indian Act (including the status and reserve systems) and Canada's funding decisions. However, as I discuss below, there was also evidence that First Nations children, regardless of status or residency on reserves, suffer because of Canada's funding regime, which is predicated on and influenced by the Indian Act. I make this finding notwithstanding Canada's steps to expand eligibility.

[248] The Tribunal clearly contemplated the difficulties that arise when relying on concepts that originate from the Indian Act, such as 'status' and 'reserves':

> …The Panel believes it is an interpretation exercise to determine if using the Indian Act to determine eligibility criteria for Jordan's Principle furthers or hinders the Panel's substantive equality goal in crafting Jordan's Principle orders and the Panel's goal to eliminate discrimination and prevent similar practices from reoccurring (at para 177).

In this passage, the Tribunal implicitly acknowledges that a definition of 'First Nations child' that relies on the Indian Act will perpetuate the discrimination the Tribunal seeks to remedy.

[249] The Caring Society submitted, and the Respondents and intervener agreed, that the Tribunal reasonably concluded that 'all First Nations children' includes certain groups not recognized by the Indian Act. In expanding the definition to include the additional two categories, it prevented further discrimination. It was therefore reasonable not to exclude children solely due to the Indian Act's second generation cut-off rule.

[250] I agree with the Respondents. The Eligibility Decision prevented future discrimination, which is consistent with the purpose of the Tribunal's jurisdiction as previously referred to in paragraphs 125 to 128, above. There is no dispute that the Tribunal enjoys a large remedial jurisdiction and that this jurisdiction should be interpreted liberally in light of the quasi-constitutional nature of the CHRA. I also find that this purposive approach is consistent with jurisprudence outlining Canada's relationship with First Nations peoples, most recently articulated in R v Desautel, 2021 SCC 17 [Desautel].

[251] Although the facts of Desautel are quite different from the present case, I am still mindful of the guidance the Supreme Court provided at paragraph 33 regarding the context of proceedings involving Indigenous people:

> …an interpretation of "aboriginal peoples of Canada" in s. 35(1) that includes Aboriginal peoples who were here when the Europeans arrived and later moved or were forced to move elsewhere, or on whom international boundaries were imposed, reflects the purpose of reconciliation. The displacement of Aboriginal peoples as a result of colonization is well acknowledged:

> Aboriginal peoples were displaced physically — they were denied access to their traditional territories and in many cases actually forced to move to new locations selected for them by colonial authorities. They were also displaced socially and culturally, subject to intensive missionary activity and the establishment of schools — which undermined their ability to pass on traditional values to their children, imposed male-oriented Victorian values, and attacked traditional activities such as significant dances and other ceremonies. In North America they were also displaced politically, forced by colonial laws to abandon or at least disguise traditional governing structures and processes in favour of colonial-style municipal institutions.

By contrast, an interpretation that excludes Aboriginal peoples who were forced to move out of Canada would risk "perpetuating the historical injustice suffered by aboriginal peoples at the hands of colonizers" (R. v. Côté, 1996 CanLII 170 (SCC), [1996] 3 S.C.R. 139, at para. 53).

[252] The Tribunal's Eligibility Decision was clearly attempting to remedy past and future discrimination while being mindful not to "perpetuate historical injustice." This is evident when considering the scope of the evidence the Tribunal considered relating to the history of Indigenous-Crown relations.

[253] The first category acknowledges that there is a distinction between Indian status and First Nations citizenship. Presently, a First Nations child or person may not have Indian Act status, but they may be a member or citizen of their First Nation if that First Nation has control over its membership and has enacted such a provision. At present, this is possible through section 10 of the Indian Act, which allows for First Nations control over membership. Indian status, however, remains within the purview of Canada. The Tribunal did not act outside its jurisdiction by extending Jordan's Principle eligibility to individuals without Indian Act status that are recognized by their First Nations as citizens and members. I agree with the AFN that it was open to the Tribunal to take a purposive approach in interpreting its home legislation and to accordingly award extended eligibility of Jordan's Principle to individuals without Indian Act status that are recognized by their First Nations as citizens and members.

[254] The respondents and intervener generally echo the submissions of the AFN and the COO that the Indian Act is a form of apartheid law that gives the government unilateral authority to determine who is legally an Indian. They submit that First Nation signatories to the Treaties never agreed that treaty benefits and remunerations would cease when a descendant lost their Indian Act status. These submissions are duly noted. However, I need not make specific pronouncements on these submissions as, in my view, the findings of the Tribunal are reasonable without regard to these submissions.

[255] The COO points to the Act respecting First Nations Inuit and Métis children youth and families, SC 2019 c 24 [FNIMCYF Act] which acknowledges Canada's commitment to respecting the UNDRIP and First Nations' right to self-government or self-determination in relation to child and family services (See FNIMCYF Act at preamble, s 8). The FNIMCYF Act similarly does not define 'Indigenous Child', 'First Nation', or 'First Nations child'. Rather, the statute creates space for First Nations to do it themselves. In Ontario, the Child Youth and Family Services Act, 2017, SO 2017 c 14, Sched 1 [Ont CYFS Act] acknowledges the UNDRIP in its preamble and recognizes that a First Nations child's "band" or "community" is a band or community of which the child is a member or with which the child identifies (at s 2(4)). 'First Nations child' is not defined nor confined to the Indian Act definition. As the Tribunal recognized at paragraphs 224-226 of the Eligibility Decision, the Ont CYFS Act also has a mechanism to notify First Nations in the same manner as the FNIMCYF Act. As such, the Tribunal's reasoning is not without precedent.

[256] In addition, when viewed through the lens of the Complaint, the Merit Decision, and the Compensation Decision, the second category is not so remote as to not be part of the Complaint. The second category factors in that some First Nations children may become eligible for Indian Act status based on their parents' present or future eligibility or because of An Act to amend the Indian Act in response to the Superior Court of Quebec decision in Descheneaux c. Canada (Procureur général), SC 2017, c 25 [Bill S-3]. Bill S-3 amended the Indian Act to address sex-based discrimination and will temporarily increase the number status Indians in Canada.

[257] I also find the Eligibility decision reasonable because, in considering the third category, the Tribunal acknowledged that this category strayed beyond the Complaint. The Tribunal, citing Moore, was aware of the parameters of its jurisdiction and determined that the third category had no nexus to the Complaint.

[258] Overall, the Complaint was framed in terms of discrimination in relation to the Indian Act, reserves, and the status system. In arriving at its findings in the Eligibility Decision, the Tribunal was cognizant of the scope of the Complaint and its broad remedial jurisdiction. The Eligibility Decision sought to prevent future discrimination, which is consistent with the purpose of the Tribunal's enabling statute. As such, the Tribunal's decision was reasonable.

(b) Implications for Compensation Decision

[259] At the hearing for these judicial review applications, the parties noted that the additional two categories affect the Compensation Decision. Canada submitted that these two categories now expand the eligibility of those entitled to compensation. On its face, they do, but I find that the Tribunal reasonably delved into the delicate issue of Indian Act status when it sought to cease discrimination. It was a bold approach but one that was within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal based on the Complaint and the evidence in the record.

[260] I am not convinced that the first category will automatically expand the eligibility of those entitled to compensation. It certainly has the potential to do so, but Canada would need to coordinate with First Nations, as set out in the Compensation Framework. First Nations will determine whether children are citizens or members. For various reasons, First Nations may recognize children as members or citizens or they may not. At this stage, it is premature for anyone to ascertain how First Nations will approach this category or determine how many children this will affect.

[261] Similarly, there is also no way to ascertain how many children will fit into the second category. This is particularly true given that it is difficult to know the impact of Bill S-3. However, the second category is still attempting to address the effect of the Indian Act's status and reserve provisions on Canada's funding decisions. The Tribunal determined that these provisions still have the potential to discriminate against certain individuals. The two additional categories attempt to soften the effects that these provisions have on certain children and to give the parties some flexibility in how to work together to assess these complexities.

[262] I also note that the Compensation Framework itself contains provisions that place some limitations on whether certain categories are entitled to compensation for pain and suffering or for special compensation for wilful and reckless discrimination (see for example Articles 4.2.5.2 and 4.2.5.3). Again, this illustrates some restraint on the part of the Tribunal.

(c) Alleged Lack of Evidence

[263] The Applicant submits that there was no evidence for the Tribunal to make its order concerning the additional two categories. This is not accurate.

[264] In the Interim Eligibility Decision, the Tribunal had evidence of the continuing impact of the narrow interpretation of Jordan's Principle through the circumstances of SJ. That ruling clearly set forth that there was a denial of Jordan's Principle services simply because of the second generation cut-off rule (see paras 56-86). SJ did not have Indian Act status because one of her parents was registered under section 6(2) of the Indian Act.

[265] It is also important to note that SJ was not resident on reserve. As such, Canada's expanded categories at the time of the Eligibility Decision would not have captured SJ. The Applicant submits that there was no evidence before the Tribunal that children other than those accounted for in its expanded categories experienced discrimination. SJ's story indicates otherwise. There is no reason to believe that SJ's circumstances are unique.

(d) Non-Party First Nations

[266] The Applicant also submits that the community recognition concept under the first category is unreasonable because it imposes obligations on non-party First Nations to determine which children are eligible within 48 hours of being made aware of a potential claim (2017 CHRT 35 at para 10). Additionally, the Tribunal avoided addressing the problems it created regarding community recognition and the Indian Act's second generation cut-off rule by instructing the parties to devise a system themselves. Finally, the Tribunal ignored the potential spillover effects of recent legislative efforts to address child and family services issues such as the FNIMCYF Act. I disagree with all of these submissions for the following reasons.

[267] First, the order only required the parties to consult with one another. There was no declaration that it was declaring the Indian Act's citizenship or membership requirements to be improper or unconstitutional. In accordance with its dialogic approach and the difficult role it has within the CHRA, the Tribunal sought to endorse the good faith discussions that the parties had embarked upon outside of the Tribunal's process.

[268] Second, in no way did the order affect the second generation cut-off rule in the Indian Act. There was simply an order for the parties to look at two additional categories of First Nations children who would be eligible for consideration under Jordan's Principle. Eligibility and challenges to the cut-off rule cannot be dealt with where there is no Charter challenge to section 6(2) of the Indian Act. The Tribunal was aware of this (Eligibility Decision at para 176). The second generation cut-off rule, as questionable as it may be in light of First Nations' general opposition to the Indian Act's determination of status, remains unchallenged and in force.

[269] I also agree with CAP's submission that the Eligibility Decision required Canada to consult with the parties to develop eligibility criteria for First Nations children under Jordan's Principle, which led to a consent order. If Canada considered the consultation inadequate, it could have sought broader participation earlier. There is no evidence that it did or that any First Nation community is objecting to the purported burden of identification for categories of First Nations children.

(e) Determining Complex Questions of Identity

[270] Finally, the Applicant submits that the second category decides a complex question of identity that was not before the Tribunal and that Indigenous Peoples themselves do not agree on.

[271] In Desautel, the Supreme Court of Canada dealt with a section 35(1) Aboriginal rights claim of a non-citizen of Canada. The Court stated the following: "[w]hether a group is an Aboriginal people of Canada is a threshold question, in the sense that if a group is not an Aboriginal people, there is no need to proceed to the Van der Peet test… The threshold question is likely to arise only where there is some ground for doubt, such as where the group is located outside of Canada" (Desautel at para 20). The Court also found that no previous decision of the Supreme Court had interpreted the scope of the words "aboriginal peoples of Canada" in section 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, being schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (UK), 1982, c 11 (Desautel at para 21).

[272] Similar to the Supreme Court's approach in Desautel, I also find that the legal issue of the definition of who is a First Nations child and how that determination is made is ultimately left for another day (Desautel at para 32). The Eligibility Decision was not determining the legal effect of who is a First Nations child. Rather, it determined certain parameters to assist the parties in deciding who is eligible for Jordan's Principle and, consequently, compensation.

[273] I agree with Commission's submissions that the Eligibility Decision clarified the benefit at issue as being able to apply for services and have those requests considered on a case-by-case basis. In other words, First Nations children living off reserve will now have the opportunity apply for services pursuant to Jordan's Principle. This does not guarantee that all applications will be fulfilled and services will be provided. The Eligibility Decision only instructs Canada to let First Nations children "through the door" for the purposes of eligibility. Determining who may apply for services does not determine a complex question of identity that has legal consequences beyond the scope of eligibility for Jordan's Principle.

[274] Contrary to what the Applicant submits, the Eligibility Decision clearly left determinations of identity and citizenship to First Nations communities. I agree with the COO that it was appropriate for the Tribunal to make a decision that would allow First Nations to retain control over identity, membership, and citizenship, as the principles in Desautel provide. The COO points to Annex A of 2020 CHRT 36 which does not dictate anything to a First Nation. Rather, that annex provides a funding mechanism for a First Nation that chooses to participate in the community recognition process. Furthermore, it leaves space for the First Nation to determine how it will do so.

[275] For all of these reasons, I disagree with the Applicant that the Eligibility Decision is unreasonable because it determined complex questions of identity.

(2) Eligibility Decision Conclusion

[276] Ultimately, the Eligibility Decision contains no reviewable error to permit the intervention of this Court. It is intelligible and rationale and the Tribunal worked within its jurisdiction to make the findings it did, taking into consideration the entire process that has developed since the Complaint was filed in 2007.

[277] The Eligibility Decision highlights the tension between nationhood, the Indian Act, and eligibility for program funding provided by the Applicant. Frankly, the parties are talking to each other about different issues. The Respondents properly highlight the colonial legislation's adverse impact on Indigenous peoples historically and today. They also highlight that Indigenous people possess inherent Aboriginal and Treaty Rights including the right to self-determination. These rights include the right to govern their citizens, including children and families. It is a holistic approach.

[278] On the other hand, the Applicant adopts a more limited and legalistic approach. It is fine to approach matters this way, but this approach, as a starting point, is fundamentally at odds with how Indigenous parties may approach matters. It is also not conducive to early resolution of issues arising with First Nations. The multitude of rulings and orders confirms this.

[279] With that being said, Canada is to be commended for moving beyond its initial definition on eligibility. The Tribunal's remedial and dialogic approach can be credited for this improvement. Ultimately, however, the success rests upon true dialogue and discussion between Canada and the respondents. I encourage those discussions to continue for the benefit of future generations of First Nations children.

D. Procedural Fairness

[280] I am not persuaded that the Applicant was denied procedural fairness.

[281] As noted above, I have determined that the Tribunal did not change the nature of the Complaint in the remedial phase. The Tribunal, exercising extensive remedial jurisdiction under the quasi-constitutional CHRA, provided a detailed explanation of what had transpired previously and what would happen next in each ruling/decision (See e.g. 2016 CHRT 16 at para 161). In so doing, it was relying on a dialogic approach. Such an approach was necessary considering the scope of the discrimination and the corresponding efforts to remedy or prevent future discrimination. Most importantly, the Tribunal was relying on established legal principles articulated in Chopra v Canada (AG), 2007 FCA 268 at para 37 and Hughes 2010 at para 50 (Merit Decision at paras 468, 483). I do not agree that the Tribunal did not provide the parties with notice of matters to be determined.

[282] I also find that the Tribunal did not err in finding that discrimination is ongoing. The Tribunal retained jurisdiction to deal specifically with this issue from the Merit Decision onward. For example, in 2017 CHRT 14 at paragraphs 80 and 133, the Tribunal made the finding that discrimination is ongoing based on Canada's narrow interpretation of Jordan's Principle eligibility. The Tribunal made a similar finding in 2018 CHRT 4 at paragraph 389. These rulings were not challenged.

[283] I disagree that the Tribunal ought to have included the issue of whether the discrimination had ceased and given Canada a chance to make submissions on this point. As the parties moved along with the reporting requirements, the Tribunal did note that it was encouraged by Canada's compliance with some of its orders and findings, including the provision of increased funding. However, funding alone was not going to remedy discrimination (2018 CHRT 4 at paras 13, 105-107, 132-134, 222).

[284] I am persuaded by the Caring Society's submission that the Tribunal's finding of harm is supported by the "robust evidentiary record", which I have referenced throughout this decision. As a result, it was reasonable for the Tribunal to find that discrimination is ongoing, particularly in light of the fact that Canada never challenged this finding in previous Orders.

[285] The Applicant also submits that the Tribunal disregarded its right to procedural fairness by inviting the parties to make suggestions about "new categories" of victims for compensation. I find that the additional categories are not new, but are related to the issues presented by the Indian Act. The record shows that Canada had been relying on the Indian Act for its Jordan's Principle eligibility determinations for some time. The Indian Act's concepts on 'status' and 'reserve' were squarely before the Tribunal and these terms necessarily affected the eligibility for Jordan's Principle in one way or another.

[286] With respect, the Applicant never raised any objections with the Tribunal's approach. A party alleging a breach of procedural fairness has an obligation to raise it before the Tribunal at the earliest opportunity. The Applicant, being a sophisticated litigant, should be aware of their obligation. For example, at paragraph 11 of the Compensation Decision, the Tribunal reiterated its earlier finding in 2018 CHRT 4 at paragraph 389, that First Nations children and families continue to suffer. The Applicant did not challenge this finding.

[287] The Applicant also submits that the Tribunal did not explain itself or provide reasons when it stated that any procedural unfairness to Canada is outweighed by the prejudice borne by First Nations children and their families who suffered and continue to suffer unfairness and discrimination. I disagree. From the Merit Decision onward there were findings made on the harm suffered by children and their families. The fact that the Tribunal did not directly state how that weighing occurred does not render the decision procedurally unfair. It can be inferred from the record and, specifically, the evidence related to the harms suffered by children as referenced in the Tribunal's numerous decisions and rulings.

[288] All parties received notice of issues that were under consideration. Where outstanding issues were before the Tribunal and further questions remained, it notified all parties in writing and provided them with an opportunity to provide written and/or oral submission. The evidentiary record considered by the Tribunal and section 50(3)(e) of the CHRA empowers the Tribunal to decide procedural issues related to the inquiry. The Tribunal managed its remedial jurisdiction to ensure discrimination ceased and would not occur in the future.

[289] Since the Merit Decision, the issues of compensation and definitions related to Jordan's Principle were reserved by the Tribunal. I agree with the Caring Society and the AFN that Canada had every opportunity to seek a judicial review of that decision but chose not to. Nothing in the record suggests that the Tribunal limited the type or amount of evidence that the Applicant or any of the parties could adduce. Accordingly, I find that the Applicant was not treated unfairly.

[290] I also agree with the COO that the Tribunal appropriately considered the context, the rights, and interests of the parties when it crafted the decisions and its procedure. For example, in the Eligibility Decision, the Tribunal asked the parties to negotiate a mechanism that would implement the community eligibility decision on the ground. In 2020 CHRT 36 the Tribunal's order stemmed from the Tribunal's request that the parties negotiate an implementation plan for the Eligibility Decision.

[291] The Tribunal previously rejected the Applicant's suggestion that more or any negotiation has to occur before a remedy can be awarded (2018 CHRT 4 at paras 395-400).

[292] I also find that the Tribunal dealt fully and reasonably with the Applicant's claim of surprise with respect to the Compensation Decision. The AFN submits that it and the Caring Society clearly demonstrated their intention from the date of their initial filing to pursue individual compensation. The AFN points to paragraph 21(3) of the statement of particulars submitted prior to the Merit Decision. The Tribunal also recognized this at paragraph 108 of the Compensation Decision.

[293] As set out above, the Tribunal provided advance notice of the questions it wished the parties to respond to prior to the Compensation Decision. If the Applicant thought that the process was unfair, this would have been the opportune time to raise those concerns. It did not.

[294] At paragraph 490 of the Merit Decision, the Tribunal provided advance notice that it was seeking input from the parties on the outstanding question of remedies. In addition, the Tribunal dealt directly with the Applicant's arguments about unfairness of the process (2018 CHRT 4 at paras 376-389). The Tribunal reminded the Applicant that there were three phases identified in the Merit Decision and that the ruling closed the immediate relief phase (2018 CHRT 4 at paras 385-388). This ruling was not challenged by the Applicant.

[295] In 2017 CHRT 14 the Tribunal also pointed out the process it employed to address the remedies ordered in the Merit Decision, which required additional information from the parties (at para 32).

[296] For all of these reasons I find that the Applicant was not denied procedural fairness. The Tribunal afforded all parties with a full picture of what was to be determined at each stage of the proceedings and sought submissions from the parties. There were no surprises.

VII. Some Thoughts on Reconciliation

[297] While noting that these applications for judicial review did not involve constitutional issues or section 35 Aboriginal rights, the parties and the Tribunal have discussed the concept of reconciliation throughout these proceedings. Prior to concluding, I find it necessary to pause and reflect on this concept and consider but a few of the many lessons that have arisen during these proceedings.

[298] In Desautel, the Supreme Court stated the following on reconciliation and negotiation:

> [30] In this Court's recent jurisprudence, the special relationship between Aboriginal peoples and the Crown has been articulated in terms of the honour of the Crown. As was explained by McLachlin C.J. and Karakatsanis J. in Manitoba Metis, at para. 67:
> > The honour of the Crown [. . .] recognizes the impact of the "superimposition of European laws and customs" on pre-existing Aboriginal societies. Aboriginal peoples were here first, and they were never conquered; yet, they became subject to a legal system that they did not share. Historical treaties were framed in that unfamiliar legal system, and negotiated and drafted in a foreign language. The honour of the Crown characterizes the "special relationship" that arises out of this colonial practice…
> While the honour of the Crown looks back to this historic impact, it also looks forward to reconciliation between the Crown and Aboriginal peoples in an ongoing, "mutually respectful long-term relationship"... The honour of the Crown requires that Aboriginal rights be determined and respected, and may require the Crown to consult and accommodate while the negotiation process continues... It also requires that the Crown act diligently to fulfill its constitutional obligations to Aboriginal peoples. [Citations omitted.]

> [87] Negotiation has significant advantages for both the Crown and Aboriginal peoples as a way to obtain clarity about Aboriginal rights:
>
> > Negotiation . . . has the potential of producing outcomes that are better suited to the parties' interests, while the range of remedies available to a court is narrower. . . . The settlement of indigenous claims [has] an inescapable political dimension that is best handled through direct negotiation.
> > (S. Grammond, Terms of Coexistence, Indigenous Peoples and Canadian Law (2013), at p. 139)
> Negotiation also provides certainty for both parties... As the Court said in Clyde River… at para. 24, "[t]rue reconciliation is rarely, if ever, achieved in courtrooms". [Citations omitted.]

[299] In my view, the concept of reconciliation is, in essence, a continuation of the nation-building exercise of this young country in the sense that the foundational relationships between Indigenous people and the Crown continue to evolve. Reconciliation, as nation-building, can also result in the re-establishment, on a proper foundation, of broken or damaged relationships between Indigenous people and Canada in the manner suggested by the Supreme Court in its numerous judgments.

[300] Negotiations are also seen as a way to realize the goal of reconciliation. It is, in my view, the preferred outcome for both Indigenous people and Canada. Negotiations, as part of the reconciliation process, should be encouraged whether or not the case involves constitutional issues or Aboriginal rights. When there is good will in the negotiation process, that good will must be encouraged and fostered before the passage of time makes an impact on those negotiations. As Pitikwahanapiwin (Chief Poundmaker), a nation-builder in his own right, so aptly said:

> We all know the story about the man who sat by the trail too long, and then it grew over, and he could never find his way again. We can never forget what has happened, but we cannot go back. Nor can we just sit beside the trail.

[301] In my view, the procedural history of this case has demonstrated that there is, and has been, good will resulting in significant movements toward remedying this unprecedented discrimination. However, the good work of the parties is unfinished. The parties must decide whether they will continue to sit beside the trail or move forward in this spirit of reconciliation.

VIII. Conclusion

[302] I find that the Applicant has not succeeded in establishing that the Compensation Decision is unreasonable. The Tribunal, utilizing the dialogic approach, reasonably exercised its discretion under the CHRA to handle a complex case of discrimination to ensure that all issues were sufficiently dealt with and that the issue of compensation was addressed in phases. The Tribunal ensured that the nexus of the Complaint, as discussed in the Merit Decision, was addressed throughout the remedial phases. Nothing changed. All of this was conducted in accordance with the broad authority the Tribunal has under the CHRA.

[303] I also find that the Applicant has not succeeded in establishing that the Eligibility Decision is unreasonable. The Tribunal was aware of its jurisdiction when the Caring Society asked the Tribunal to create three new categories for Jordan's Principle. The Caring Society claimed that the third category would prevent further discrimination based on Indian Act status.

The Tribunal reasonably noted the issues with Indian status within the scope of the proceedings. It concluded that only two of the proposed categories were tied to the scope of the Complaint and the proceedings. I find no error in this conclusion.

[304] Finally, the Applicant has not succeeded in establishing that it was denied procedural fairness. The record indicates that the Applicant was afforded numerous opportunities to challenge the various decisions but did not. The record also shows that the Applicant, as well as each party before the Tribunal, was afforded an opportunity to make submissions on any issues that the Tribunal requested. All of this was in accordance with the broad authority the Tribunal has under the CHRA. No one was taken by surprise.

[305] The Applicant has not sought costs in either of these two applications for judicial review and neither has CAP. All of the Respondents, aside from the Commission and Amnesty, seek their costs. In light of this, the Respondents, aside from the Commission and Amnesty, will file their respective written submissions on costs within 45 days of the Order below and the Applicant will file its written reply within 90 days of the Order below. The parties, of course, are encouraged to discuss this and to file a joint submission. In the event a joint submission is not filed, the matter of costs will be disposed of based on written submissions.

JUDGMENT in T-1559-20 and T-1621-19

THIS COURT'S JUDGMENT is that:

1. The application for judicial review concerning the Compensation Decision in T-1621-19 is dismissed.
2. The application for judicial review concerning the Eligibility Decision in T-1559-20 is dismissed.
3. The Respondents, aside from the Commission and Amnesty, will provide their submissions on costs within 45 days of the date of this Order. The Applicant will provide its submissions on costs within 90 days of this Order. The matter of costs will be dealt with in writing.

Plaintiffs

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN

ORDER AND REASONS

[1] This is a motion brought on consent under Rule 334.29 of the Federal Courts Rules, SOR/98-106, for orders approving the Settlement Agreement, appointing the administrator and arbitrators, fixing the cost of administration, fixing the amount of an honorarium for the representative plaintiffs and fixing class counsel's fees.

[2] For the reasons that follow, I approve the Settlement Agreement, the representative plaintiffs' honoraria and class counsel's fees.

I. Backgrond

[3] On January 11, 2013, Human Resources and Skills Development Canada [HRSDC] issued a press release stating that an external portable hard drive containing the personal information of approximately 583,000 National Loan Services borrowers from 2000 to 2006 had been lost. The lost drive contained the names, social insurance numbers, contact information, and loan balances [Personal Information] of the affected borrowers.

[4] In order to assist individuals with determining whether they were personally affected by the data loss, HRSDC established a call center hotline where concerned individuals could obtain information about the data loss, and could confirm whether their Personal Information was believed to be on the lost drive.

[5] HRSDC also wrote to the affected individuals directly, using the last known contact information on file, to advise them that the data loss had occurred, and that the defendant had purchased customized credit protection service packages from Equifax. Additional credit protection packages were later purchased from TransUnion and both packages were offered to all affected individuals for six-year terms, beginning on the date that they provided consent. The class members were given until March 31, 2018 to apply for these credit protection packages.

[6] In January 2013, two counsel groups commenced putative class actions against the defendant over the data loss:

i. Bob Buckingham Law;

ii. Branch McMaster LLP, together with the firms now known as Strosberg Sasso Sutts LLP and Charney Lawyers PC.

[7] The four firms involved chose to work together to prosecute this class action and in April 2013, they issued a Consolidated Statement of Claim asserting causes of action in breach of contract, breach of warranty, breach of confidence, intrusion upon seclusion and negligence.

[8] This action was certified as a class action by this Court on all advanced causes of action but for the claims of negligence and breach of confidence (Condon v Canada, 2014 FC 250). The Federal Court of Appeal granted the plaintiffs' appeal from that decision, referring the matter back to this Court to include the claims for negligence and breach of confidence (Condon v Canada, 2015 FCA 159). The certification order, dated June 20, 2016, defines the Class as follows:

> All persons whose personal information was contained in an external hard drive in the control of Human Resources and Skills Development Canada (now known as Employment and Social Development Canada) or the National Student Loan Services Center which was lost or disclosed to others on or about November 5, 2012, but not including senior management of Human Resources and Skills Development Canada, the Canada Student Loans Program, or Ministers and Deputy Ministers of the Ministry of Human Resources and Skills Development.

[9] On December 5, 2017, the parties entered into a Settlement Agreement pursuant to which the defendant will pay $17.5 million [Fixed Settlement Fund] as compensation for class members' lost time and inconvenience in responding to the data loss. The Fixed Settlement Fund will be distributed to class members who complete a claim form, in payments fixed at $60 each [the Payments], net of all legal fees, taxes, disbursements, and the costs of administration.

[10] In addition, the defendant will fund the cost of an arbitration system so that class members can recover their Actual Losses (as defined below), over and above the compensation for loss of time and inconvenience [the Actual Loss Fund]. The Actual Loss Fund is uncapped and unlimited.

[11] To claim against the Fixed Settlement Fund, class members will not be required to demonstrate how much time they actually spent responding to the data loss. Instead, they will only be required to submit a brief claim form identifying themselves as class members, in which case they will be eligible for a $60 Payment.

[12] With respect to the Actual Loss Fund, "Actual Losses" are proven losses suffered by class members, excluding exemplary and punitive damages, as determined by an arbitrator, caused by the data loss, for which the class member has not been otherwise compensated.

[13] Class counsel are seeking a contingency fee of 30 percent on the $17.5 million Fixed Settlement Fund. They are not seeking fees on any awards made from the Actual Loss Fund.

[14] Class counsel have entered into contingency fee agreements [the Fee Agreements] with each of the three representative plaintiffs, which provide for a contingency fee of 30 percent upon the commencement of discovery.

II. Issues

[15] The following issues arise on this motion:

A. Is the Settlement Agreement fair, reasonable and in the best interests of the Class, and should the Court approve it?

B. Should the Fee Agreements be approved, and are the fees and disbursements proposed by class counsel reasonable?

C. Should the Court approve the proposed honoraria of $5,000 to each of the representative plaintiffs?

III. Analysis

A. Is the Settlement Agreement fair, reasonable and in the best interests of the Class, and should the Court approve it?

(1) The law relating to the approval of a settlement

[16] Pursuant to Rule 334.29 of the Federal Courts Rules, a class action may only be settled with the approval of a judge.

[17] The test for approving a class action settlement is whether, in all of the circumstances, the settlement is fair, reasonable and in the best interests of the Class as a whole, taking into account the claims and defences in the litigation and any objections to the settlement by class members. However, the test is not whether the settlement meets the demands of a particular class member.

[18] A settlement need not be perfect (Châteauneuf v Canada, 2006 FC 286 at para 7). It need only fall "within a zone or range of reasonableness" (Ontario New Home Warranty Program v Chevron Chemical Company (1999), 46 OR (3d) 130 (Ont Sup Ct J) at para 89).

[19] In determining whether to approve a settlement, the Court may take into account factors such as:

a. The likelihood of recovery or likelihood of success;

b. The amount and nature of discovery, evidence or investigation;

c. Terms and conditions of the proposed settlement;

d. The future expense and likely duration of litigation;

e. The recommendation of neutral parties, if any;

f. The number of objectors and nature of objections;

g. The presence of arm's length bargaining and the absence of collusion;

h. The information conveying to the Court the dynamics of, and the positions taken, by the parties during the negotiations;

i. The degree and nature of communications by counsel and the representative plaintiffs with class members during the litigation; and

j. The recommendation and experience of counsel.

(See Ford v F Hoffmann-La Roche Ltd (2005), 74 OR 3d 758 (Ont Sup Ct J) (QL) at para 117.)

[20] The factors listed above are merely guidelines. In a particular case, some criteria may be given more weight than others, some criteria may not be satisfied, and other criteria may be irrelevant (*Parsons v Canadian Red Cross S*ociety, [1999] OJ No 3572 (Ont Sup Ct J) (QL) at para 73 [Parsons 1999]).

(2) Factors that are relevant to this settlement approval motion

(a) The likelihood of recovery or success / Rationale for the settlement

[21] It has been five years since the lost hard drive went missing. To date, class counsel have not been able to identify any evidence that the Personal Information on the lost drive has been compromised in any way. It remains unclear whether the drive was stolen, merely lost or destroyed, and there is no evidence that a third party has even accessed the Personal Information, much less that the Personal Information has been used for unlawful or improper purposes.

[22] If this matter were to proceed to trial, the onus would be on the plaintiffs to establish that a privacy breach has actually occurred. Based on the evidentiary record developed over the last five years of litigation, including a number of investigations and expert reports, there are significant hurdles to the plaintiffs' ability to meet their onus of establishing that the Personal Information on the lost drive has been compromised or improperly disclosed in any way.

[23] I agree with the plaintiffs that their case at trial would likely turn on establishing nominal damages for breach of contract based on wasted time and inconvenience. The Fixed Settlement Fund of $17.5 million is designed to compensate class members for an average of four hours of wasted time and inconvenience in responding to the data loss, at average industrial hourly wage rates, net of legal fees.

[24] In my Reasons for Judgment delivered on the certification motion (2014 FC 250), I commented on the unique challenges facing the plaintiffs in litigating this action to a successful conclusion, including the problems related to proving the damages of the class members:

> [68] In addition, a summary review of the evidence adduced by both parties leads the Court to the conclusion that the Plaintiffs have not suffered any compensable damages. The Plaintiffs have not been victims of fraud or identity theft, they have spent at most some four hours over the phone seeking status updates from the Minister, they have not availed themselves of any credit monitoring services offered by the credit reporting agencies nor have they availed themselves of the Credit Flag service offered by the Defendant.
> [69] Nor does the evidence adduced support a claim for increased risk of identity theft in the future. Since the Data Loss, Equifax has produced reports pertaining to the credit files of the 88,548 individuals who availed themselves of the Credit Flag service. These reports show that there had been no increase in the relevant indicia that would be consistent with an increase in criminal activities involving those individuals' Personal Information. The rate of criminal activities registered was not higher than the 3% of the population generally victim of identity theft. Moreover, the Plaintiffs submitted a CBC news article concerning a Class Member who had been a victim of identity theft yet the article noted no proven causal link between the Data Loss and that theft.

[25] There is considerable uncertainty in the law as to whether a trial judge would award aggregate nominal damages in the context of a class action. There is little to no jurisprudence on the issue. The British Columbia Supreme Court in Tucci v Peoples Trust Co, 2017 BCSC 1525 (QL), recently recognized that wasted time spent responding to a privacy breach could form the basis for awarding compensable aggregate nominal damages (see paras 247, 257).

[26] Even if I were to accept that aggregate damages for nominal damages are available, the award per class member is also very much an uncertain factor. What is nominal in an individual action brought by one person may not be nominal when aggregated across a class of 583,000 individuals.

[27] I certified the plaintiffs' claim for nominal damages, but only on the basis that they were novel in the context of a class action. I further noted specifically that the defendant had advanced an "interesting and strong argument" that nominal damages should not be awarded in a class action (at para 51).

[28] With respect to the tort of intrusion upon seclusion, damages are presumed and therefore a nominal amount of damages can be awarded for the tort absent proof of actual harm (Jones v Tsige, 2012 ONCA 32 (QL) at para 60). Before there can be an award of damages, however, the onus remains on the plaintiffs to establish first that an intrusion actually occurred.

[29] In the summer of 2017, the plaintiffs retained the services of Cytelligence Inc. [Cytelligence], a cybersecurity and digital forensics company, to conduct an in-depth investigation to determine whether the Personal Information had been disclosed or sold on the deep/dark web. That investigation concluded that, "[b]ased on the age of the information, and given that Cytelligence could not uncover any such evidence, it is unlikely that the contents [of the lost hard drive] are in circulation on the dark web."

[30] Finally, class counsel's review of the defendant's extensive documentary production did not uncover any evidence that the Personal Information on the lost drive had been improperly accessed or generally disclosed anywhere.

[31] In sum, there is no evidence in the case at bar that would establish, on a balance of probabilities, that the Personal Information has been compromised. There is thus no evidence of an intrusion upon the class members' privacy.

[32] When this action commenced, it was questionable whether the action could be prosecuted successfully, given the state of the law on privacy breaches. Most of those factors are still relevant today.

[33] There have been approximately half a dozen privacy breach class actions settled to date in Canada where funds have been established to compensate class members for wasted time and inconvenience and/or actual losses. In most of these settlements, there was only one fund established to satisfy both sets of damages, and that fund was capped. Class members were also required to provide documented evidence to support their claims, even for wasted time and/or inconvenience (Lozanski v The Home Depot Inc, 2016 ONSC 5447 at paras 45, 51; Drew v Walmart Canada Inc, 2017 ONSC 3308 at para 10(b)).

[34] Rowlands v Durham Region Health et al, a class action about health information contained on a lost hard drive with no evidence of the information being compromised, was settled on the basis that each of the 83,524 class members had to come forward to prove their individual damages (Rowlands v Durham Region Health, et al, 2011 ONSC 719; Rowlands v Durham Region Health, et al, 2012 ONSC 3948). No money was available to the class members unless they proved their actual losses.

[35] In Lozanski, the Court approved a settlement of a class action in which a credit payment system was hacked by a third party. For the approximately 500,000 class members, a settlement fund of $250,000 was set up. Each class member with documented losses, including time spent remedying the issues relating to the data breach, could apply for reimbursement up to $5,000 on the following basis:

> [45] … The time remedying issues claim is: (a) for up to five hours at $15 per hour; or (b) for a Settlement Class Member with reasonable documentation of substantiated losses for out-of-pocket losses or unreimbursed charges who cannot separately document their time remedying those losses or charges may self-certify for up to two hours at $15 per hour.

[37] By contrast, in the case at bar, the Actual Loss Fund is uncapped, meaning that class members who can prove that they have sustained an Actual Loss can be compensated in full, on top of compensation for their wasted time and inconvenience.

(b) The amount and nature of discovery, evidence or investigation

[38] I am satisfied that I was presented with sufficient evidence to allow me to make an objective, impartial and independent assessment of the fairness of the proposed Settlement

Agreement (Dabbs v Sun Life Assurance Co of Canada, [1998] OJ No 1598 (Ont Sup Ct J) (QL) at para 15).

[39] I am also satisfied that over the five years since this action commenced, the parties have done what could reasonably have been done to inform themselves of the facts relevant to liability and damages, including reviewing the multiple investigations into the loss of the hard drive.

[40] Two main investigations were conducted into the loss of the hard drive. HRSDC's Special Investigations Unit conducted an internal investigation, including interviews of numerous employees who worked in proximity to the last person in possession of the hard drive, and a forensic technical analysis. Their investigation could not determine the cause of the data loss, but did rule out the possibility that "someone would have taken the hard drive with the intent to make off with the information."

> a. There is no evidence that the Personal Information contained on the lost drive was disclosed to others or was sold to a third party; and
> b. There is no evidence that the Personal Information contained on the hard drive was accessible or sold on the dark web, which contains websites that are not accessible via traditional web browsers (and therefore is where illegal transactions such as the sale of personal information tend to take place online).

[42] Class counsel have provided evidence that in addition to the many volumes of evidence adduced at the certification motion, they reviewed and analyzed approximately 68,377 documents produced by the defendant.

[43] Given the scope of the information available to class counsel, they were well situated to negotiate, and ultimately agree, subject to court approval, to the resolution of this action for the benefit of the class members.

(c) The terms and conditions of the proposed settlement

[44] The function of the Court in reviewing a settlement is not to reopen and enter into negotiations with litigants in the hope of improving the terms of the settlement. It is within the power of the Court to indicate areas of concern and to afford the parties an opportunity to answer those concerns with changes to the settlement. The Court's power to approve or reject settlements, however, does not permit it to modify the terms of a negotiated settlement (Dabbs, above at para 10).

[45] The proposed settlement contemplates two separate funds for the benefit of the class members: the Fixed Settlement Fund and the unlimited Actual Loss Fund.

[46] The Fixed Settlement Fund in the amount of $17.5 million will be allocated as follows:

a. Payments to compensate the class members for their wasted time and inconveniences associated with the data loss, claimed by filling out a brief form, without having to provide evidence of the time spent;

b. Proposed honoraria to the representative plaintiffs;

c. Class counsel fees, disbursements and taxes thereon; and

d. Costs of administrating the settlement, including the costs of giving notice of the proposed settlement in accordance with my Order of December 20, 2017.

[47] After payment of the expenses set out in subparagraphs (c) and (d) above, the balance will be used to fund the proposed honoraria to the representative plaintiffs (more on this below) and the $60 Payments to compensate class members for their wasted time and inconvenience. If there is a shortfall, the class member Payments will be made pro rata. If there is a surplus in the Fixed Settlement Fund after all of the class members are paid, the surplus will be used to pay for Actual Losses. Thereafter, if there remains a surplus from the Fixed Settlement Fund, even after all Actual Losses are paid, the parties will seek the direction of the Court before further distribution.

[48] This Court should consider the expected take-up rate in determining whether a settlement is fair, reasonable, and in the best interests of the class members, particularly where there is a fixed settlement fund (Smith v Vancouver City Savings Credit Union, 2012 BCSC 990 (QL) at paras 21-26).

[49] Class counsel submit that it is reasonable to estimate that approximately 30 percent of the class members will apply for compensation from the Fixed Settlement Fund. The $17.5 million amount of the Fixed Settlement Fund was accordingly derived from class counsel's estimate that approximately 30 percent of class members will participate in the claims process.

[50] In Smith, a case about the interest rate charged on overdraft fees, Justice Gray of the British Columbia Supreme Court found that a $2.5 million settlement fund was fair, reasonable, and in the best interest of the class, in part because it was likely that the class members who participated in the settlement would achieve full recovery:

> [24] In light of these administrative costs, and the low likelihood of "take-up" by claimants, it appears likely that under the proposed settlement, all those who present a claim will get full recovery, and that some funds will be paid to the VanCity Community Foundation.

[51] To support that finding, Justice Gray considered that the take-up rate in similar class actions was low (between 16-30 percent), and would likely be even lower because of the years that had passed since the events giving rise to the class members' claims. As such, Justice Gray concluded that the value of the fixed settlement fund would likely be sufficient to compensate all class members who file a claim (Smith, above at para 24).

[52] In the present case, I agree with class counsel that 30 percent is a reasonable estimation of the proportion of class members who will file a claim to the Fixed Settlement Fund. Class counsel considered several factors in estimating the expected take-up rate, including that:

a. There are an estimated 585,236 class members after subtracting the opt outs (there were a total of 564 opt outs);

b. Only 91,351 class members asked for and received credit protection services funded by the defendant (approximately 15.61 percent of the class), despite receiving a direct mailing from the defendant with this offer;

c. Only approximately 58,000 class members registered with the online system set up by class counsel for this class action (approximately 9.91 percent of the class);

d. It has been five years since the data loss was publicly disclosed;

e. Some of the Personal Information on the lost drive dates back to 2000 and is therefore almost two decades old; and

f. The maximum amount recoverable from the Fixed Settlement Fund is $60.

[53] While it is difficult to predict take-up rates, class counsel submit that take-up rates in Canadian class actions demonstrate that the take-up rate is below 50 percent in most Canadian class actions and often well below 50 percent, particularly where the size of the claim a class member can make is smaller.

[54] By contrast, the Actual Loss Fund is an unlimited and uncapped fund for each class member who applies for arbitration, without regard to the issue of take-up. Class members who claim that they incurred an Actual Loss must file an arbitration form and request an arbitration.

[55] Ivan Whitehall and Reva Devins are the proposed arbitrators and their costs will be paid entirely by the defendant.

[56] The protocol for the arbitrations has been provided to the Court. The proposed process is user-friendly, does not require the assistance of a lawyer, and requires the arbitrator to decide on a balance of probabilities whether the class member suffered an Actual Loss.

[57] The defendant will fund the cost of direct mailing to the Class to publicize the settlement, a cost estimated to be approximately $600,000. This amount is separate and apart and in addition to the Fixed Settlement Fund and the Actual Loss Fund.

(d) Future expense and likely duration of litigation

[58] Courts have recognized that a payment to class members now is a factor in support of a settlement. If there is no settlement now, counsel for the parties anticipate that at least a further three years will be needed for a trial and a potential appeal.

[59] After taking these probable three further years of litigation into consideration, including what is projected to be an eight-week trial with numerous expert witnesses to be called by each party, coupled with the factors outlined above, I am satisfied that the proposed settlement is fair and reasonable and in the best interests of the Class.

(e) The number of objections and nature of the objections

[60] As of the court-ordered deadline on February 12, 2018, at 5:00 p.m. EST, 294 objections to the settlement were received. These objections make up approximately 0.00050188 percent of the Class (1/20 of 1 percent).

[61] Four of the 294 objectors attended the proposed settlement hearing via videoconference from Fredericton, Toronto and Winnipeg and had the opportunity to voice their objections to the Court. A fifth objector sought to participate in the proposed settlement hearing via videoconference from Halifax. However, this objector was not able to participate, as notice that the Halifax local office would be open for videoconferencing was only given shortly before the hearing. Nevertheless, this objector's written objection was duly considered, along with all of the other written objections.

[62] 72 objectors submitted what appears to be an identical form letter. These 72 objectors, as well as many others, assert that the class members' outstanding student loan debt should be forgiven or discounted as part of this settlement. The objector who attended the proposed settlement hearing via videoconference from Fredericton expressed an objection of this nature. However, this proposition is untenable at law, particularly so since the Supreme Court of Canada laid to rest the doctrine of a fundamental breach in Canadian contract law (Tercon Contractors Ltd v British Columbia (Transportation and Highways), 2010 SCC 4). The parties did not negotiate, and could not have negotiated, the Settlement Agreement on the basis that debt forgiveness could form part of the compensation for class members.

[63] A large number of the objections refer to financial losses allegedly incurred as a result of the data loss as having value greater than $60, including the objector who attended the proposed settlement hearing via videoconference from Toronto. These objections are premised on a misunderstanding of the structure of the Settlement Agreement, since such losses can be claimed against the Actual Loss Fund.

[64] A large number of the objections also reference paying out-of-pocket for credit monitoring, despite the government's blanket offer to pay for six years of credit monitoring through TransUnion and Equifax. Both objectors who attended the proposed settlement hearing via videoconference from Winnipeg expressed this type of objection, seeking compensation for lifetime credit protection. In my view, lifetime protection is an unreasonable request.

[65] One of the objectors who attended the proposed settlement hearing from Winnipeg also expressed a desire to be given a new SIN number. However, the evidence shows that replacing an individual SIN number presents numerous challenges for both the individual and the government. Additionally, the government is actively monitoring class members' SIN numbers and will continue doing so until 2023.

[66] Finally, a large number of the objections reference the amount of class counsel's fee request. Another one of the objectors who attended the proposed settlement hearing via videoconference from Winnipeg also expressed this type of objection. However, it was publicized in the Notice of Certification that class counsel would be requesting up to one-third of any recovery in the action as legal fees and it was possible for class members to opt out on the basis of any objection to the proposed terms.

[67] As for the class member who requested to attend via videoconference from Halifax, she argues that her case is unique because she is transgender and has transitioned since the hard drive was lost. She states that she should be awarded $40,000 in damages.

[68] First, if she considered her claim to be distinct from that of the rest of the Class, she could have opted out of this class action, retained counsel and filed her own individual action against the defendant. In addition, if she has suffered actual compensable damages, in excess of lost time and inconvenience, she can file her claim against the Actual Loss Fund.

[69] Having considered all of the objections received, I am of the view that the settlement ought to be approved. The fact that a settlement is less than ideal for any particular class member is not a bar to approval for the Class as a whole (Parsons 1999, above at para 79).

[70] In this case, as in Manuge v Canada, 2013 FC 341, it would not serve the interests of the vast majority of the Class who did not object to the settlement to send the parties back into further discussions to address the concerns of a "handful" of objectors (at para 25).

(f) The presence of arm's length bargaining

[71] The negotiations that transpired leading to a settlement among the parties were arm's length and adversarial in nature, spanning several months.

(g) The degree and nature of communications with class members

[72] Given the size of the Class, class counsel organized and maintained a website located at www.studentloansclassaction.com [the website], a Strosberg Sasso Sutts LLP toll-free phone line, and a Facebook page maintained by Buckingham Law.

[73] The website hosts class counsel's secure, interactive web-based registration system. The registration system went live shortly after the commencement of the action, at which time and thereafter, class members were encouraged to register on the registration system. To date, approximately 58,000 class members have registered and provided their information to class counsel.

[74] The notice of proposed settlement was sent by email to all of the class members who registered with class counsel and provided valid e-mail addresses. Class counsel also posted the notice of the proposed settlement and Settlement Agreement on the website for class members to review and they organized an online marketing campaign.

[75] During these proceedings, class counsel updated the website fourteen times since January 22, 2013, and posted all key documents. In only the last year, the website has been viewed by over 50,000 unique users. As well, class counsel received in excess of 5,000 phone calls through their dedicated toll-free lines.

(h) The recommendation of experienced counsel

[76] Class counsel suggest that the proposed settlement is fair, reasonable and in the best interests of the class members. Class counsel are experienced class actions litigators and their tactics, analysis and processes have been disclosed to the Court. I am satisfied that their decision to settle this case reflects their best exercise of judgment. Class counsel's recommendations are significant and are given substantial weight in the approval process.

(i) The recommendation of the representative plaintiffs

[77] I was provided evidence that all of the representative plaintiffs were briefed regularly throughout the five years of this litigation. They were involved in making the major decisions, including instructing class counsel to sign the Settlement Agreement and unanimously recommending approval of this settlement to the Court.

(j) Conclusion

[78] There are ranges of acceptable settlements. This principle recognizes the reality of the uncertainties of law and fact in any particular case and the concomitant risks and costs necessarily inherent in taking any litigation to completion.

[79] This action was ably prosecuted and the litigation risks and the risks relating to damage issues were adequately canvassed by class counsel. This Court concludes that the Settlement Agreement is fair, reasonable and in the best interests of the Class and ought to be approved, including the appointment of the administrator and arbitrators.

B. Should the Fee Agreements be approved, and are the fees and disbursements proposed by class counsel reasonable?

(1) The law relating to the approval of class counsel fees

[80] Rule 334.4 of the Federal Courts Rules provides that no payments may be made to a lawyer from the proceeds recovered in a class action unless those payments are approved by a judge. Class counsel accordingly seeks this Court's approval of the Fee Agreements and class counsel's legal fees, disbursements, and applicable taxes.

(a) Counsel fees must be fair and reasonable

[81] Class counsel's fees are to be fixed and approved on the basis of whether they are "fair and reasonable" in all of the circumstances (Manuge, above at para 28; Parsons v Canadian Red Cross Society (2000), 49 OR (3d) 281 (Ont Sup Ct J) at paras 13, 56 [Parsons 2000]).

[82] In Manuge, this Court held that, in determining what is fair and reasonable, the Court must look at a number of factors, including the results achieved by class counsel, the extent of the risk assumed by class counsel, the amount of professional time actually incurred by class counsel, the causal link between the legal effort and the result achieved, the quality of the representation, the complexity of the issues raised by the litigation, the character and importance of the litigation, the likelihood that individual claims would have been litigated in any event, the views expressed by class members, the existence of a fee agreement, and the fees approved in comparable cases (Manuge, above at para 28; Merlo v Her Majesty the Queen, 2017 FC 533 (QL) at paras 77-98).

[83] In particular, courts have focused on two main factors in assessing the fairness and reasonableness of a fee request: (1) the risk that class counsel undertook in conducting the litigation; and (2) the degree of success or result achieved (Parsons 2000, above at para 13; Sayers v Shaw Cablesystems Limited, 2011 ONSC 962 at para 35). Risk in this context is measured from the commencement of the action (Gagne v Silcorp Ltd (1998), 49 OR (3d) 417 (Ont CA) at para 16). These risks include all of the risks facing class counsel, such as the liability risk, recovery risk, and the risk that the action will not be certified as a class action (Gagne, above at para 17; Endean v Canadian Red Cross Society, 2000 BCSC 971 (QL) at paras 28, 35).

(b) Percentage-based counsel fees are preferable to alternatives, such as applying a multiplier to counsel's time

[84] Over the years, courts have expressed a preference for utilizing percentage-based fees in class actions (Mancinelli v Royal Bank of Canada, 2017 ONSC 2324 at para 52). A percentage-based fee should be paid based on a percentage of the amounts recovered and should be awarded at a level that appropriately incentivizes and rewards class counsel.

[85] The percentage-based fee set out in a contingency fee retainer agreement is presumed to be fair and "should only be rebutted in clear cases based on principled reasons" (Cannon v Funds for Canada Foundation, 2013 ONSC 7686 at para 8). Examples of where a court may rebut the presumption that a percentage-based fee is fair include where:

a. There is a lack of full understanding or true acceptance on the part of the representative plaintiff;

b. The agreed-to contingency amount is excessive; or

c. The presumptively valid contingency fee would result in a fee award so large as to be unseemly.

[86] The main alternative to a percentage-based fee is applying a multiplier to class counsel's time. This multiplier approach has been criticized for, inter alia, encouraging inefficiency and duplication and discouraging early settlement (Cassano v Toronto-Dominion Bank (2009), 98 OR (3d) 543 (Ont Sup Ct J) (QL) at para 60). Courts have indicated that "the application of a multiplier … is unacceptably subjective if not completely arbitrary" (Fulawka v Bank of Nova Scotia, 2014 ONSC 4743 at para 22).

[87] Percentage-based fees, on the other hand, encourage a results-based approach to rewarding counsel. As noted by the British Columbia Supreme Court in Endean, percentage-based fees are common in class actions and properly reward class counsel for their effectiveness, rather than being based solely on the time incurred to achieve success (above at paras 74, 75).

[88] In Baker (Estate) v Sony BMG Music (Canada) Inc, 2011 ONSC 7105, Justice Strathy explained that compensating counsel through a percentage of recovery is "generally considered to reflect a fair allocation of risk and reward as between lawyer and client" (at para 64). A percentage-based fee encourages the lawyer to maximize recovery for the client efficiently; it is fair to the client since there is no payment without success (Baker, above at para 64).

(c) Percentage-based fees provide necessary incentives to class counsel for a class action regime to be viable

[89] Effective class actions would not be possible without contingency fees that pay counsel on a percentage basis.

[90] Contingency fees help to promote access to justice in that they allow counsel, rather than the client, to finance the litigation. Contingency fees also promote judicial economy, encourage efficiency in the litigation, discourage unnecessary work that might otherwise be done simply to increase the lawyer's fee based on time incurred, properly emphasize the quality of the representation and the results achieved, ensure that counsel are not penalized for efficiency, and reflect the considerable costs and risks undertaken by class counsel (Osmun v Cadbury Adams Canada Inc, 2010 ONSC 2752 at para 21).

[91] This Court, and courts across Canada, have recognized that the viability of class actions depends on entrepreneurial lawyers who are willing to take on these cases, and that class counsel's compensation consequently must reflect this reality (Manuge, above at para 49; Helm v Toronto Hydro-Electric System Limited, 2012 ONSC 2602 at para 26; Griffin v Dell Canada Inc, 2011 ONSC 3292 at para 53). Compensation must be sufficiently rewarding to "provide a real economic incentive to lawyers to take on a class proceeding and to do it well" (Sayers, above at para 37).

(d) Class counsel's requested 30 percent fee is comparable to other percentage-based fees in settled class actions

[92] In Baker, Justice Strathy stated that fees in the range of up to 30 percent are "very common" in class actions (above at para 63). In Cannon, Justice Belobaba approved a contingency fee of 33 percent (above at para 3).

(2) Factors supporting the fee request

[93] Class counsel argue and I agree that the following factors support the requested fee as being fair and reasonable.

(a) Risks undertaken by class counsel

[94] From the outset, class counsel agreed to pursue this action on a contingency fee basis pursuant to the Fee Agreements, accepting responsibility for all expenses and costs and seeking court approval for a fee if successful, in accordance with the Fee Agreements.

[95] In Green v Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, 2016 ONSC 3829, the Ontario Superior Court of Justice recognized the risks assumed by class counsel in pursuing class actions on a contingency fee basis and the need to incentivize counsel to take on these risks: “The risks are – quite simply … the risk of receiving no compensation for the time and disbursements invested in the case” (at para 14).

[96] The litigation risk assumed by class counsel is a function of the probability of success, the complexity of the proceedings, and the time and resources expended to pursue the litigation.

[97] When assessing these risks involved in pursuing class action litigation, the risks must be assessed as they existed when the litigation commenced and as the litigation continued. They should not be assessed with the benefit of hindsight (Ford, above at para 71).

[98] In this case, class counsel were cognizant of the procedural and litigation risks involved with these claims, being that liability was, and is, difficult to prove, and that individual damage assessments would likely be necessary at the end of a common issues trial, if successful. By any measure, this is a complex case, both in terms of the subject matter, the number of class members, and damages.

(b) Results achieved

[99] As reviewed in detail above, class counsel achieved good results for the class members.

[100] In weighing the results achieved by class counsel's work, it is also appropriate for the Court to consider to what extent the three objectives of class actions – namely, access to justice, behaviour modification, and judicial efficiency – have been met by the proposed settlement (Bancroft-Snell v Visa Canada Corporation, 2015 ONSC 7275 at para 49).

[102] The class action regime in the Federal Courts Rules was designed to encourage class counsel to advance actions like this, where the individual claims are relatively modest because, on an aggregate basis, entrepreneurial class counsel can earn a fee that justifies the risks associated with advancing the class action and the time invested.

[103] This settlement will serve as a benchmark for future privacy breach class actions and encourage organizations throughout Canada to take privacy seriously, for fear of facing serious litigation consequences for a privacy breach.

[104] With respect to the defendant, this action has directly encouraged the Government of Canada to take a substantial number of steps to improve their privacy security, which benefits not only the class members but all Canadians, as the Government is the single largest depository of Canadians' personal information.

(c) The counsel fee request is within the reasonable expectations of the representative plaintiffs and other class members

[105] The representative plaintiffs entered into Fee Agreements that contemplated the payment of 30 percent of the recovery, plus applicable taxes and disbursements, at the commencement of discovery. Since discovery was well underway by the time that settlement negotiations commenced and ultimately resulted in the proposed settlement, class counsel are now requesting that their fees be fixed at 30 percent of the recovery, in accordance with the Fee Agreements.

[106] All of the representative plaintiffs support class counsel's request for fees and the Notice of Certification, which was published and distributed in mid-2016, explicitly stated that class counsel would seek a fee of up to one-third of the recovery.

[107] Therefore, class members could fairly weigh this issue when deciding whether to opt out or to participate in the lawsuit going forward.

(d) Experience of class counsel

[108] Evidence was provided that class counsel have practised in class actions for many years. They have a breadth of experience in prosecuting class actions, and have collectively negotiated settlements of over a hundred class actions.

(e) Time and expenses incurred by class counsel

[109] Class counsel have done extensive work over the past five years to reach the Settlement Agreement, including litigating certification through two hearings, reviewing almost 70,000 documentary productions, and devising an innovative two-pronged approach to the settlement (the Fixed Settlement Fund and the unlimited Actual Loss Fund) in order to maximize compensation for the class members.

(f) Work that must be done if the settlement is approved

[110] If the Settlement Agreement is approved, class counsel must, inter alia: oversee the publication and distribution of the notice of settlement approval; continue to implement and oversee the administration of this class action for at least an additional eight months until the settlement distribution is complete; and liaise with the thousands of class members who may have questions about the judgment. Class counsel's job will not be complete until the settlement administration is complete.

(g) Conclusion

[111] In sum, the legal fees sought by class counsel are consistent with the Fee Agreements, and they are fair and reasonable when considered in light of the procedural and substantive risks assumed by class counsel. The legal fees are also fair and reasonable when considered in light of the evolution of the evidentiary record, five years after the data loss occurred.

(3) Class counsel incurred significant disbursements

[113] There were significant disbursements paid and accrued, which have been completely funded by class counsel, including $250,292 plus taxes for the registration system, which permitted class counsel to communicate with, and provide notice to, approximately 58,000 class members. There will be no interest charges on the disbursements.

C. Should the Court approve the proposed honoraria of $5,000 to each of the representative plaintiffs?

[114] Class counsel request that the Court award a $5,000 honorarium to each representative plaintiff, to be paid from the Fixed Settlement Fund, for a total of $15,000, in recognition of their respective contributions to this action.

[115] This Court has the discretion to award honoraria to representative plaintiffs and has done so numerous times previously. An honorarium is "not an award but a recognition that the representative plaintiffs meaningfully contributed to the class members' pursuit of access to justice" (Johnston v The Sheila Morrison Schools, 2013 ONSC 1528 at para 43).

[116] The affidavits filed by each representative plaintiff show that they expended a significant amount of time carrying out their duties as representative plaintiffs. They were not simply figureheads for this litigation – they carried out real work and functions such as:

a. Preparing the affidavits for certification;

b. Preparing for and attending cross-examinations on the affidavit in support of certification;

c. Assisting in the preparation of the list of documents in their possession for the documentary discovery phase and the lawsuit;

d. Strategizing with class counsel from time to time over the years;

e. Expressing their opinions to class counsel on the proposed Settlement Agreement and instructing class counsel to sign the Settlement Agreement; and

f. Assisting in the preparation and execution of the affidavits in support of this settlement approval motion.

[117] In addition, each of the representative plaintiffs had their name widely publicized in the media.

[118] The representative plaintiffs did not request these honoraria, nor were any honoraria promised to them by class counsel at any time. Indeed, the Fee Agreements each state:

> 16. The Client acknowledges that [the Client] is not entitled to receive any payment or fee out of the Recovery for acting as representative plaintiff in the Action unless ordered by the Court.

[119] Courts across the country, including this Court, have permitted stipends to representative plaintiffs in varying amounts (Manuge, above at para 53; Hislop v Canada (Attorney General), 2004 CanLII 11203 (Ont Sup Ct J) at para 22).

[120] In this case, class counsel submitted, and I agree, that $5,000 is appropriate for each representative plaintiff.

ORDER in T-132-13

THIS COURT ORDERS that:

1. Plaintiffs' motion is granted;
2. The Settlement Agreement is approved;
3. The parties will provide the Court, within seven working days from this Order and Reasons, with a draft order confirming the Settlement Agreement approval, the appointment of the administrator and arbitrators, the fixation of the administration costs, the fixation of the honoraria for the representative plaintiffs and the fixation of class counsel's fees, the whole in accordance with the present reasons;
4. There are no costs on this motion.

À la douce mémoire de Réjean Bélanger

In loving memory of Réjean Bélanger

I. Acknowledgement

[1] This decision concerns children. More precisely, it is about how the past and current child welfare practices in First Nations communities on reserves, across Canada, have impacted and continue to impact First Nations children, their families and their communities.

[2] These proceedings included extensive evidence on the history of Indian Residential Schools and the experiences of those who attended or were affected by them. The Tribunal also heard heartfelt testimony from someone who attended and was directly impacted by attending a residential school. At the outset of these reasons, the Panel Members (the Panel) believe it important to acknowledge the suffering of all residential school survivors, their families and communities. We recognize the courage of those who have spoken about their experiences over the years and before this Tribunal. We also wish to honour the memory and lives of the many children who died, and all who were harmed, while attending these schools, along with their families and communities. We wish healing and recognition for all Aboriginal peoples across Canada for the individual and collective trauma endured as a result of the Indian Residential Schools system.

II. Complaint and background

[3] Child welfare services, or child and family services, are services designed to protect children and encourage family stability. The main aim of these services is to safeguard children from abuse and neglect (see Annex, ex. 1 s.v. “child welfare”). Hence the best interest of the child is a paramount principle in the provision of these services and is a principle recognized in international and Canadian law. This principle is meant to guide and inform decisions that impact all children, including First Nations children.

[4] Each province and territory has its own child and family services legislation and standards and provides those services within its jurisdiction. However, the provision of child and family services to First Nations on reserves and in the Yukon is unique and is the subject of this decision.

[5] At issue are the activities of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada (INAC), known at the time of the hearing as Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada (AANDC), in managing the First Nations Child and Family Services Program (the FNCFS Program), its corresponding funding formulas and a handful of other related provincial and territorial agreements that provide for child and family services to First Nations living on reserve and in the Yukon Territory. Pursuant to the FNCFS Program and other agreements, child and family services are provided to First Nations on-reserve and in the Yukon by First Nations Child and Family Services Agencies (FNCFS Agencies) or by the province/territory in which the community is located. In either situation, the child and family services legislation of the province/territory in which the First Nation is located applies. AANDC funds the child and family services provided to First Nations by FNCFS Agencies or the province/territory.

[6] Pursuant to section 5 of the Canadian Human Rights Act (the CHRA), the Complainants, the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada (the Caring Society) and the Assembly of First Nations (the AFN), allege AANDC discriminates in providing child and family services to First Nations on reserve and in the Yukon, on the basis of race and/or national or ethnic origin, by providing inequitable and insufficient funding for those services (the Complaint). On October 14, 2008, the Canadian Human Rights Commission (the Commission) referred the Complaint to this Tribunal for an inquiry.

[7] In a decision dated March 14, 2011 (2011 CHRT 4), the Tribunal granted a motion brought by AANDC for the dismissal of the Complaint on the ground that the issues raised were beyond the Tribunal's jurisdiction (the jurisdictional motion). That decision was subsequently the subject of an application for judicial review before the Federal Court of Canada.

[8] On April 18, 2012, the Federal Court rendered its decision, Canada (Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2012 FC 445 (Caring Society FC), setting aside the Tribunal's decision on the jurisdictional motion. The Federal Court remitted the matter to a differently constituted panel of the Tribunal for redetermination in accordance with its reasons. The Respondent's appeal of that decision was dismissed by the Federal Court of Appeal in Canada (Attorney General) v. Canadian Human Rights Commission, 2013 FCA 75 (Caring Society FCA).

[9] A new panel, composed of Sophie Marchildon, as Panel Chairperson, and members Réjean Bélanger and Edward Lustig, was appointed to re-determine this matter (see 2012 CHRT 16). It dismissed the Respondent's motion to have the jurisdictional motion re-heard, and ruled the Complaint would be dealt with on its merits (see 2012 CHRT 17).

[10] The Complaint was subsequently amended to add allegations of retaliation (see 2012 CHRT 24). In early June 2015, the Panel found the allegations of retaliation to be substantiated in part (see 2015 CHRT 14).

[11] The present decision deals with the merits of the Complaint. During deliberations our friend and colleague, Tribunal Member Réjean Bélanger, passed away. Despite his valued contributions to the hearing and consideration of this matter, he sadly was not able to see the final result of his work. While this decision is signed on behalf of the remaining Members of the Panel, we dedicate it in his honour and memory.

III. Parties

[12] The Caring Society is a non-profit organization committed to research, policy development and advocacy on behalf of First Nations agencies that serve the well-being of children, youth and families. The AFN is a national advocacy organization that works on behalf of over 600 First Nations on issues such as Treaty and Aboriginal rights, education, housing, health, child welfare and social development. The Commission, in appearing before the Tribunal at a hearing, represents the public interest (see section 51 of the CHRA). AANDC is the federal government department primarily responsible for meeting the Government of Canada's obligations and commitments to Aboriginal peoples.

[13] Additionally, two organizations were granted "Interested Party" status for these proceedings: Amnesty International and the Chiefs of Ontario (COO). Amnesty International is an international non-governmental organization committed to the advancement of human rights across the globe. It was granted interested party status to assist the Tribunal in understanding the relevance of Canada's international human rights obligations to the Complaint. The COO is a non-profit organization representing the 133 First Nations in the Province of Ontario. It was granted interested party status to speak to the particularities of on-reserve child welfare services in Ontario.

IV. The hearing, disclosure and admissibility of documents

[14] The hearing of the Complaint spanned 72 days from February 2013 to October 2014. Throughout the hearing, documentary disclosure and the admissibility of certain documents as evidence became an issue.

[15] All arguably relevant documents were not disclosed prior to the commencement of the hearing. Despite agreeing to complete its disclosure prior to the start of the hearing, and subsequently confirming that it had, AANDC knew of the existence of a number of arguably relevant documents in the summer of 2012 and yet failed to disclose them prior to the hearing. Only after the completion of an Access to Information Act request made by the Caring Society, and shortly before the third week of hearings, did AANDC inform the parties and the Tribunal of the existence of over 50,000 additional documents and an unspecified number of emails, which were potentially relevant to the Complaint, but had yet to be disclosed. As a result, the Tribunal vacated hearing dates in June 2013, re-arranged the proceedings to hear the allegations of retaliation in July and August 2013, and, following a deadline for AANDC to complete its disclosure by August 31, 2013, resumed the hearing on the merits on dates from August 2013 to January 2014 (see 2013 CHRT 16).

[16] Following the disclosure of over 100,000 additional documents by AANDC, the hearing resumed. However, AANDC did not complete the disclosure of all arguably relevant documents until August 2014 due to an objection under section 37(1) of the Canada Evidence Act. Specifically, certain documents were characterized as being subject to Cabinet confidence privilege. All the parties agreed to have the Clerk of the Privy Council review the documents to determine if the privilege applied. This review process was completed fairly quickly once the Clerk was provided with the documents.

[17] An issue arose as to how the 100,000 additional documents could be admitted into evidence. The Caring Society requested an order that any additionally disclosed documents upon which it wished to rely be admitted as evidence for the truth of their contents, regardless of whether or not the author or recipient of the document was called as a witness, and whether or not they were put to any other witness. For reasons outlined in 2014 CHRT 2, the Panel ruled as follows:

> a. Rule 9(4) of the Tribunal's Rules of Procedure will continue to apply. As such, documents will continue to be admitted into evidence, on a case-by case basis, once they are introduced during the hearing and accepted by the Panel;
> b. There will be no need to call witnesses for the sole purpose of authenticating documentary evidence. Any issues raised relating to authentication will be considered by the Panel at the weighing stage;
>
> c. For the purposes of Rule 9(4), a document has not been fully "introduced" at the hearing until counsel or a witness for the party tendering it has indicated:
>
> i. which portions of the document are being relied upon; and
>
> ii. how these portions of the document relate to an issue in the case.
> d. Should a party wish to rely on evidence during its final argument that was not introduced according to the procedure above (either prior to or subsequent to this order), appropriate curative measures may be taken by the Panel, and in particular, the opposing party may be allotted additional time to adequately prepare a response, including calling additional witnesses and bringing forward additional documentary evidence, in accordance with the principles of procedural fairness. This may result in an adjournment of the proceedings.

[18] Following the completion of the hearing, further issues arose as to which documents ought to form part of the record before the Tribunal. AANDC raised concerns regarding the admissibility of documents relied on by counsel for the Complainants and Commission, but not referred to orally during the hearing. In 2015 CHRT 1, the Panel ordered:

> Documents listed in Appendix B of the Commission's December 1, 2014 letter (including Documents Referred to Only in Final Written Submissions

> (which were Adopted Orally) found at page 9) will be considered as forming part of the evidentiary record. The Respondent will be granted an opportunity to respond to the Complainant's documents listed in Appendix B and supporting submissions with the exception of tab-66. Should the Respondent decide to benefit from this opportunity, the Respondent is to advise the parties and the Tribunal of its intention and form of response by no later than January 21, 2015, following which the Respondent will have until February 4, 2015 to file its response.

[19] In response to the Panel's order, AANDC provided written representations with respect to the documents at issue. According to AANDC, the Panel should place little, if any, weight on those documents in determining the merits of the Complaint. It also provided a chart summarizing its position on each of the documents.

[20] AANDC's submissions on the documents subject to the Panel's order in 2015 CHRT 1, along with its other submissions regarding the weight to ascribe to the evidence in this matter, have been taken into consideration by the Panel, together with the submissions of the other parties, in making the findings that follow.

V. Analysis

[21] As mentioned above, the present Complaint alleges the provision of child and family services in on-reserve First Nations communities and in the Yukon is discriminatory. Namely that there is inequitable and insufficient funding for those services by AANDC. In this regard, the Complainants have the burden of proof of establishing a prima facie case of discrimination. A prima facie case is "...one which covers the allegations made and which, if they are believed, is complete and sufficient to justify a verdict in the complainant's favour in the absence of an answer from the respondent" (see Ont. Human Rights Comm. v. Simpsons-Sears, 1985 CanLII 18 (SCC) at para. 28).

[22] In the context of this Complaint, under section 5 of the CHRA, the Complainants must demonstrate (1) that First Nations have a characteristic or characteristics protected from discrimination; (2) that they are denied services, or adversely impacted by the provision of services, by AANDC; and, (3) that the protected characteristic or characteristics are a factor in the adverse impact or denial (see Moore v. British Columbia (Education), 2012 SCC 61 at para. 33 [Moore]).

[23] The first element is relatively simple in this case: race and national or ethnic origin are prohibited grounds of discrimination under section 3 of the CHRA. There was no dispute that First Nations possess these characteristics.

[24] The second element requires the Complainants to establish that AANDC is actually involved in the provision of a "service" as contemplated by section 5 of the CHRA; and, if so, to demonstrate that First Nations are denied services or adversely impacted by AANDC's involvement in the provision of those services.

[25] For the third element, the Complainants have to establish a connection between elements one and two. A "causal connection" is not required as there may be many different reasons for a respondent's acts. That is, it is not necessary that a prohibited ground or grounds be the sole reason for the actions in issue for a complaint to succeed. It is sufficient that a prohibited ground or grounds be one of the factors in the actions in issue (see Holden v. Canadian National Railway Co., (1991) 14 C.H.R.R. D/12 (F.C.A.) at para. 7; and, Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse) v. Bombardier Inc. (Bombardier Aerospace Training Center), 2015 SCC 39 at paras. 44-52 [Bombardier]).

[26] In this regard, it should be kept in mind that discrimination is not usually practiced overtly or even intentionally. Consequently, direct evidence of discrimination or proof of intent is not required to establish a discriminatory practice under the CHRA (see Basi v. Canadian National Railway, 1988 CanLII 108 (CHRT); and; Bombardier at paras. 40-41).

[27] In response to the Complaint, AANDC led its own evidence and arguments to refute the Complainants' claim of discrimination. It did not raise a statutory exception under sections 15 or 16 of the CHRA. Therefore, the Tribunal's task is to consider all the evidence and argument presented by the parties to determine if the Complainants have proven the three elements of a discriminatory practice on a balance of probabilities (see Bombardier at paras. 56 and 64; see also Peel Law Association v. Pieters, 2013 ONCA 396 at paras. 80-90).

[28] It is through this lens, and with these principles in mind, that the Panel examined the evidence and arguments advanced by the parties in this case. For the reasons that follow, the Panel finds AANDC is involved in the provision of child and family services to First Nations on reserves and in the Yukon; that First Nations are adversely impacted by the provision of those services by AANDC, and, in some cases, denied those services as a result of AANDC's involvement; and; that race and/or national or ethnic origin are a factor in those adverse impacts or denial.

A. AANDC is involved in the provision of child and family services to First Nations on reserves and in the Yukon

i. Meaning of "service" under section 5 of the CHRA

[29] Section 5 of the CHRA provides:

> 5. It is a discriminatory practice in the provision of goods, services, facilities or accommodation customarily available to the general public
>
> > (a) to deny, or to deny access to, any such good, service, facility or accommodation to any individual, or
> >
> > (b) to differentiate adversely in relation to any individual,
> on a prohibited ground of discrimination.

[30] Pursuant to the wording of this section, the Complainants must establish that the actions complained of are "…in the provision of…services…customarily available to the general public". The first part of this analysis involves determining what constitutes the "service" based on the facts before the Tribunal (see Gould v. Yukon Order of Pioneers, 1996 CanLII 231 (SCC) per La Forest J. at para. 68 [Gould]). In other words, what is the "benefit" or "assistance" being held out (see Watkin v. Canada (Attorney General), 2008 FCA 170 at para. 31 [Watkin]; and, Gould per La Forest J. at para. 55). In making this determination, "[r]egard must be had to the particular actions which are said to give rise to the alleged discrimination in order to determine if they are "services" (see Watkin at para. 33). In this respect, it may be useful to inquire whether the benefit or assistance is the essential nature of the activity (see Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Pankiw, 2010 FC 555 at para. 42).

[31] The next step requires a determination of whether the service creates a public relationship between the service provider and the service user. The fact that actions are undertaken by a public body for the public good is not determinative. In fact, no one factor is determinative. Rather, in ascertaining whether a service creates a public relationship, the Tribunal must examine all relevant factors in a contextual manner (see Gould per La Forest J. at para. 68; and, Watkin at paras. 32-33). As part of this determination, the Tribunal must decide what constitutes the "public" to which the service is being offered. A public is defined in relational as opposed to quantitative terms. That is, the public to which the service is being offered does not need to be the entire public. Rather, clients of a particular service could be a very large or very small segment of the "public" (see University of British Columbia v. Berg, [1993] 2 SCR 353 at pp. 374-388; and, Gould per La Forest J. at para. 68). A public relationship is created where this "public" is extended a "service" by the service provider (see Gould per La Forest J. at para. 55).

ii. Evidence indicating AANDC provides a "service"

[32] Both the Commission and the Caring Society characterize the FNCFS Program, its corresponding funding formulas and the related provincial/territorial agreements as a service provided by AANDC to First Nations children and families on reserves and in the Yukon.

[33] On the other hand, AANDC submits that its role in the provision of child and family services to First Nations is strictly limited to funding and being accountable for the spending of those funds. According to AANDC, funding does not constitute a "service". Furthermore, AANDC argues the funding it provides is not "customarily available to the general public". Rather, it is provided on a government to government; or, government to agency basis.

[34] In AANDC's view, the benefit held out as a service is the provincially mandated child welfare services provided to First Nations by the FNCFS Agencies or the provinces/territory. AANDC does not exert control over the services and programs provided. Rather, decisions as to which services to provide, how they will be provided and whether the delivery is in compliance with statutory and regulatory requirements rests with the agencies and the provinces/territory. In this regard, AANDC relies on NIL/TU,O Child and Family Services Society v. B.C. Government and Service Employees' Union, 2010 SCC 45 (NIL/TU,O), to argue that child welfare services are a matter within provincial jurisdiction and that it only became involved in First Nations child and family services as a matter of social policy under its spending power. According to AANDC, its funding does not change the provincial/territorial nature of child and family services.

[35] As explained in the following pages, the Panel finds AANDC is involved in the provision of child and family services to First Nations on reserves across Canada and in the Yukon. Specifically, AANDC offers the benefit or assistance of funding to "ensure", "arrange", "support" and/or "make available" child and family services to First Nations on reserves and in the Yukon. With specific regard to the FNCFS Program, the objective is to ensure the delivery of culturally appropriate child and family services, in the best interest of the child, in accordance with the legislation and standards of the reference province/territory, and provided in a reasonably comparable manner to those provided to other provincial/territorial residents in similar circumstances and within FNCFS Program authorities. This benefit or assistance is held out as a service by AANDC and provided to First Nations in the context of a public relationship.

a. Jurisdiction of the CHRA over the activities of AANDC

[36] With regard to the NIL/TU,O decision, the question in that case was whether the labour relations of a FNCFS Agency should be regulated under provincial or federal jurisdiction. Labour relations are presumptively a provincial matter. In this regard, the Supreme Court found the NIL/TU,O Agency was a child welfare agency regulated by the province in all aspects. Neither the fact that it received federal funding, the Aboriginal identity of its clients and employees, nor its mandate to provide culturally appropriate services to Aboriginal clients, displaced the operating presumption that labour relations are provincially regulated.

[37] The present case raises human rights issues in the context of AANDC's activities. As opposed to labour relations matters, human rights matters are not presumptively provincial. The CHRA applies to "…matters coming within the legislative authority of Parliament" (see CHRA at s. 2). While the activities of FNCFS Agencies and provincial governments may well be within provincial jurisdiction for labour relations purposes, this does not have any bearing on the Tribunal's jurisdiction over AANDC's activities in this case.

[38] The Complaint is filed against, and is focused upon, the activities of AANDC. AANDC is a federal government department created by Parliament through the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development Act. Its mandate is derived from a number of federal statutes, including the Indian Act. Therefore, any actions taken by AANDC come within the legislative authority of Parliament and could be subject to the CHRA.

[39] The issue in this case is not whether AANDC's activities fall outside the jurisdiction of the CHRA because they do not come within the legislative authority of Parliament. Rather, it is whether the CHRA applies to AANDC's activities because its actions are in the provision of a service. The fact that other actors, including provincial actors, may be involved in the provision of the service is not determinative and does not necessarily shield AANDC from human rights scrutiny (see for example Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1997] 3 SCR 624 [Eldridge]). As mentioned above, it is for the Tribunal to consider all relevant factors to determine the nature and extent of AANDC's involvement and whether that involvement rises to the status of a "service" under section 5 of the CHRA.

b. Funding can constitute a service

[40] Similarly, even if AANDC's role in the child and family welfare of First Nations is limited to funding, there is nothing in the CHRA that excludes funding from the purview of section 5. That is, funding can constitute a service if the facts and evidence of the case indicate that the funding is a benefit or assistance offered to the public pursuant to the criteria outlined above.

[41] A similar argument to the one advanced by AANDC was rejected by the British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal in Bitonti et al. v. College of Physicians & Surgeons of British Columbia et al., (1999) 36 CHRR D/263 (BCHRT) (Bitonti). Among other things, the complainants in that case argued that the allocation of funding provided by the Ministry of Health did not provide foreign medical school graduates with a real opportunity to obtain internships. The Ministry of Health responded that the expenditure of funds by the provincial government was a legislative act that was immune from the Tribunal's review. While the BCHRT ultimately found there was no service relationship between the Ministry of Health and the complainants, at paragraph 315 it was not prepared to accept the Ministry's argument regarding immunity for funding:

> Carried to its extreme, that position would mean, for example, that if the Ministry of Health provided funding for internships but stipulated that it would only pay male interns, that conduct would be immune from review. I am not prepared to go that far.

[42] Similarly, in Kelso v. The Queen, [1981] 1 SCR 199 at page 207 (Kelso), the Supreme Court stated (emphasis added):

> No one is challenging the general right of the Government to allocate resources and manpower as it sees fit. But this right is not unlimited. It must be exercised according to law. The government's right to allocate resources cannot override a statute such as the *Canadian Human Rights Act.

[43] Indeed, the Supreme Court has confirmed the quasi-constitutional nature of the CHRA on many occasions (see for example Robichaud v. Canada (Treasury Board), [1987] 2 SCR 84 at pp. 89-90 (Robichaud); Canada (House of Commons) v. Vaid, 2005 SCC 30 at para. 81 (Vaid); and, Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 53 at para. 62 [Mowat]). It expresses fundamental values and pursues fundamental goals for our society, such as the fundamental Canadian value of equality (see s. 2 of the CHRA; see also Mowat at para. 33; and, Canada (Attorney General) v. Mossop, [1993] 1 SCR 554 at p. 615, per Justice L'Heureux-Dubé).

Therefore, the CHRA is to be interpreted in a broad, liberal, and purposive manner befitting of this special status (see Mowat at para. 62).

[44] Conversely, any exemption from its provisions must be clearly stated (see Vaid at para. 81). Again, there is no indication in the CHRA or otherwise that Parliament intended to exclude funding from scrutiny under the Act, subject of course to the funding being determined to be a service. In line with Kelso, where the Government of Canada is involved in the provision of a service, including where the service involves the allocation of funding, that service and the way resources are allocated pursuant to that service must respect human rights principles.

[45] Therefore, the Panel dismisses the argument that funding cannot constitute a "service" within the meaning of section 5 of the CHRA. In any event, as will be examined in the following pages, the evidence in this case indicates the essential nature of the "assistance" or "benefit" offered by AANDC for the provision of child and family services on First Nations reserves is something more than funding.

c. The "assistance" or "benefit" provided by AANDC

[46] AANDC's FNCFS Program applies to FNCFS Agencies in all provinces and the Yukon Territory, except Ontario. In Ontario, AANDC has a cost-sharing agreement with the province for the provision of child and family services on First Nations reserves. AANDC also has agreements with the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia to provide child and family services to certain First Nations reserves. A similar agreement is also in place with the Yukon Territory. The provision of child and family services to First Nations in the Northwest Territories and Nunavut were not the subject of this Complaint.

[47] The FNCFS Program were developed to address concerns over the lack of child and family services provided by the provinces to First Nations reserves. Traditionally, assistance to First Nations children and their families was provided informally, by custom, within the network of their extended family. However, over time, this informal assistance became insufficient to meet the needs of children and families living on First Nations reserves.

[48] The Joint Committees of the Senate and the House of Commons in 1946-1948 and again in 1959-1961 urged provinces to increase their involvement in providing services to First Nations people in order to fill in the gaps resulting from disruptions to traditional patterns of community care. However, provincial governments were reluctant to provide those services for financial concerns and given federal jurisdiction over "Indians, and lands reserved for Indians" under section 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. This led to disparity in the quantity and quality of services provided to First Nations children and families on reserve from province to province, where some provinces only provided services if they were compensated by the federal government or only in life-and-death situations (see Annex, ex. 2 at p. 39 [the NPR]).

[50] In the 1970's and early 1980's, concerns began being raised over the child and family services being provided to First Nations by the provinces. Namely, the services were minimal, not culturally appropriate and there were an alarming number of First Nations children being removed from their communities. This started a move towards the creation of community-specific FNCFS Agencies. AANDC funded these agencies through ad hoc arrangements, but authorities for doing so were unclear and funding was inconsistent (see the NPR at p. 24).

[51] In 1986, AANDC put a moratorium on the ad hoc arrangements for the development of FNCFS Agencies. This moratorium remained in place until 1990 when AANDC implemented the FNCFS Program (see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at s. 1.1.6; and, the NPR at p. 24).

[52] At section 1.3 of the 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual, the objective and principles of the FNCFS Program are outlined and include:

> 1.3.2 The primary objective of the FNCFS program is to support culturally appropriate child and family services for Indian children and families resident on reserve or Ordinarily Resident On Reserve, in the best interest of the child, in accordance with the legislation and standards of the reference province.
>
> 1.3.4 FNCFS will be managed and operated by provincially mandated First Nations organizations (Recipients), which provide services to First Nations children and families Ordinarily Resident On Reserve. FNCFS Recipients will manage the program in accordance with provincial or territorial legislation and standards. INAC will provide funding in accordance with its authorities.
>
> 1.3.5 The child and family services offered by FNCFS on reserve are to be culturally relevant and comparable, but not necessarily identical, to those offered by the reference province or territory to residents living off reserve in similar circumstances.
>
> 1.3.6 Protecting children from neglect and abuse is the main objective of child and family services. FNCFS also provide services that increase the ability and capacity of First Nations families to remain together and to support the needs of First Nations children in their parental homes and communities.
> 1.3.7 First Nation agencies and other Recipients will ensure that all persons Ordinarily Resident On Reserve and within their Catchment Area receive a full range of child and family services reasonably comparable to those provided off reserve by the reference province or territory. Funding will be provided in accordance with INAC authorities.

[53] In 2012, following the filing of the Complaint, the wording of the objective of the FNCFS Program was modified, but is still similarly described as follows:

> 1.1 Objective
>
> The FNCFS program provides funding to assist in ensuring the safety and well-being of First Nations children ordinarily resident on reserve by supporting culturally appropriate prevention and protection services for First Nations children and families.
> These services are to be provided in accordance with the legislation and standards of the province or territory of residence and in a manner that is > reasonably comparable to those available to other provincial residents in similar circumstances within Program Authorities.

[54] The other provincial and territorial agreements for the provision of child and family services in First Nations communities have a similar purpose to the FNCFS Program. In Ontario, the Memorandum of Agreement Respecting Welfare Programs for Indians (see Annex, ex. 5 [the 1965 Agreement]), at page 1, provides:

> WHEREAS the 1963 Federal-Provincial Conference, in charting desirable long-range objectives and policies applicable to the Indian people, determined that the principal objective was the provision of provincial services and programs to Indians on the basis that needs in Indian Communities should be met according to standards applicable in other communities;
> AND WHEREAS Canada and Ontario in working towards this objective desire to make available to the Indians in the Province the full range of provincial welfare programs;

[55] In Alberta, the Arrangement for the Funding and Administration of Social Services (see Annex, ex. 6 [the Alberta Reform Agreement]) at page 1 states:

> WHEREAS:
>
> Canada continues to have a special relationship with and interest in the Indian people of Canada arising from history, treaties, statutes and the Constitution;
>
> Canada and Alberta recognize and agree that this arrangement will not prejudice the treaty rights of Indian people, nor alter any obligations of Canada to Indian people pursuant to treaties, statutes and the Constitution, including any rights protected by section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, nor affect any self-government rights that may be negotiated in future constitutional negotiations;
>
> Canada and Alberta recognize that Indians and Indian Families should be provided with Social Services which take into account their cultures, values, languages and experiences;

> Canada and Alberta are desirous of developing an arrangement in respect of the funding and administration for Social Services which would be applicable to Indians in the Province of Alberta; and
> Canada and Alberta acknowledge that Indians have aspirations towards self-government and both therefore wish to support the establishment, management, and delivery by Indians and Indian organizations of child and family services and other community-based Social Services for Indians in Alberta.

[56] At section 3 of the Alberta Reform Agreement, Canada's role is described as:

> 3. Canada will by this arrangement and in accordance with Appendix II:
>
> (a) arrange for the delivery of Social Services comparable to those provided by Alberta to other residents of the Province directly or through negotiated agreements with Indian Bands, Indian agencies, Indian organizations, or with Alberta, to persons ordinarily residing on a Reserve; and
> (b) fund Social Services for Indians and Indian Families ordinarily residing on a Reserve comparable to those provided by Alberta to other residents of the Province; and in particular, reimburse Alberta for those Social Services which Alberta delivers to Indians and Indian Families ordinarily residing on a Reserve.

[57] In British Columbia, the Service Agreement Regarding the Funding of Child Protection Services of First Nations Children Ordinarily Resident on Reserve (see Annex, ex. 7 [the BC Service Agreement]), which in 2012 replaced a previous memorandum of understanding between the two parties (see Annex, ex. 8 [the BC MOU]), provides:

> 1.0 Vision
>
> Governments working together in British Columbia to ensure that First Nation children, youth and their families live in strong, healthy families and sustainable communities where they are connected to their culture, language and traditions.
> DIAND and MCFD will contribute to this vision through a strong focus on providing funding and effective services respectively, to achieve meaningful outcomes for vulnerable First Nations children, youth and their families ordinarily resident on reserve.

[58] Finally, in the Yukon, there is the Funding Agreement (see Annex, ex. 9 [the Yukon Funding Agreement]). The Yukon Funding Agreement applies to all First Nations children and families ordinarily resident in the Territory. Pursuant to Schedule "DIAND-3" of the Yukon Funding Agreement, "[t]he Territory will administer the First Nation Child and Family Services Program in accordance with DIAND's First Nation Child and Family Services Program – National Manual or any other program documentation issued by DIAND as amended from time to time".

[59] The history and objectives of the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements indicate that the benefit or assistance provided through these activities is to "ensure", "arrange", "support" and/or "make available" child and family services to First Nations children and families on reserve and in the Yukon. Without the FNCFS Program, related agreements and the funding provided through those instruments, First Nations children and families on reserve and in the Yukon would not receive the full range of child and family services provided to other provincial/territorial residents, let alone services that are suitable to their cultural realities. The activities of the provinces/territory alone were insufficient to meet the child and family services needs of First Nations children and families on reserve and in the Yukon.

[60] Therefore, the essential nature of the FNCFS Program is to ensure First Nations children and families on reserve and in the Yukon receive the "assistance" or "benefit" of culturally appropriate child and family services to that are reasonably comparable to the services provided to other provincial residents in similar circumstances. The other related provincial/territorial agreements provide a similar "assistance" or "benefit". AANDC extends this "assistance" or "benefit" to First Nations children and families on reserves and in the Yukon Territory.

d. First Nations children and families are extended the "assistance" or "benefit" by AANDC

[61] First Nations and, in particular, First Nations on reserve, are a distinct public. AANDC extends the assistance or benefit of the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements to this public through FNCFS Agencies and/or the provinces/territory.

[62] Section 1.5 of the 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual defines the roles and responsibilities of AANDC's headquarters and regional offices in ensuring the safety and well-being of First Nations children ordinarily resident on reserve. At section 1.5.2, the role of Headquarters includes: "to provide […] funding on behalf of children and families as authorized by the approved policy and program authorities"; "to lead in the development of FNCFS policy"; and, "to provide oversight on program issues related to the FNCFS policy and to assist regions and First Nations in finding solutions to problems arising in the regions".

[63] The role of AANDC's regional offices is outlined at section 1.5.3 of the 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual and includes: "to interact with Recipients, Chiefs and Councils, Headquarters, the reference province or territory"; "to manage the program and funding on behalf of Canada and to ensure that authorities are followed"; "to assure Headquarters that the program is operating according to authorities and Canada's financial management requirements"; and, "to establish, in cooperation with Recipients, a process for dealing with disputes over issues relating to the operation of FNCFS".

[64] The role of the FNCFS Agencies is, among other things, "to deliver the FNCFS program in accordance with provincial legislation and standards while adhering to the terms and conditions of their funding agreements" (2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at section 1.5.4). The provinces mandate, regulate and oversee the FNCFS Agencies (see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at section 1.5.5).

[65] In a more summary fashion, the 2012 National Social Programs Manual defines the differing roles of AANDC, the provinces/territory and the FNCFS Agencies as follows, at page 30:

> 1.2 Provincial Delegations
> Child welfare is an area of provincial responsibility whereby each province, in accordance with their legislation, delegates authority to FNCFS agencies to manage and deliver child welfare services on reserve.

> The FNCFS agencies, delegated by the province, provide protection services to eligible First Nation children, ordinarily resident on-reserve in accordance with provincial legislation and standards.
> The Program funds FNCFS agencies to deliver protection (out of the home) and prevention services (in-home) to First Nation children, youth, and families ordinarily resident on reserve.

[66] AANDC has a "Shared Responsibility for Child Welfare" with the FNCFS Agencies and the provinces/territory (see the NPR at p.88). It not only provides funding, but policy and oversight as well. It works as a partner with the FNCFS Agencies and provinces/territory to deliver adequate child and family services to First Nations on reserves. It is not a passive player in this partnership, whereby it only provides funding: it strives to improve outcomes for First Nations children and families. In this regard, Ms. Sheilagh Murphy, Director General of the Social Policy and Programs Branch of AANDC, testified about the goal of AANDC social programs:

> Well, I mean we have this broad objective or goal to make sure that First Nations on Reserve -- men, women, and children -- are safe, that they are healthy and that they have the means to become productive members of their communities and can contribute to those communities and to Canada more generally as citizens.
> (StenoTran Services Inc.'s transcript of First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada) (CHRT), Ottawa, Vol. 54 at pp. 17-18 [Transcript])

[67] The FNCFS Program is one of the social programs meant to achieve this objective. A "Fact Sheet" developed in October 2006 and previously posted on AANDC's website (see Annex, ex. 10 [Fact Sheet]), demonstrates how the department previously held out the FNCFS Program:

> The First Nations Child and Family Services Program is one component of a suite of Social Programs that addresses the well-being of children and families. The main objective of the Program is to assist First Nations in providing access to culturally sensitive child and family services in their communities, and to ensure that the services provided to them are comparable to those available to other provincial residents in similar circumstances.

[68] AANDC works directly with its partners, including First Nations, to ensure the objectives of the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements are being met. The 2005 FNCFS Program Manual provides for consultation among AANDC and First Nations communities with regard to disputes over the program (see ss. 1.5.2-1.5.3). The Alberta Reform Agreement specifically provides for consultation with First Nations communities in reviewing the effectiveness of the arrangement (see ss. 13-14). Similarly, the agreements in British Columbia and the Yukon provide for evaluation and review by AANDC of the effectiveness of the programs, services and activities it funds (see ss. 9.2 and 10.1 of the BC Service Agreement; and, s. 13.4.1 of the Yukon Funding Agreement).

> The Government of Canada is committed to working with First Nations, provincial/territorial, and federal partners and agencies to implement a modernized vision of the First Nations Child and Family Services Program, a program that strives for safe and strong children and youth supported by healthy parents.

[70] Ms. Murphy provided some insight into the nature of AANDC's role and partnership in ensuring adequate child and family services to First Nations reserves:

> I mean, we continue to be a funder, we don't espouse to be experts in the area of child welfare practice. I mean, our role I think has changed in some ways in that when you look at the progression of this program -- we do audits and we do evaluations, the Auditor General looked at this program in 2008 and again in 2011. We do need to have – we don't just want to be writing cheques, we actually do have a genuine interest in making sure that First Nation Agencies are delivering the program according to the legislation and regulation, that they have the capacity to do that, that we are getting to outcomes.
> So we are not a passive player in terms of being interested in how First -- I mean, it's program risk management, it is financial risk management, to make sure that they are delivering the program that is within the authorities, that they are paying for the right things that we have been given the money for.

[71] As the above indicates, AANDC plays a significant role in the effort to improve outcomes for First Nations children and families residing on reserve. While AANDC argues that it does not control services, the manner and extent of AANDC's funding significantly shapes the child and family services provided by the FNCFS Agencies and/or the provinces/territory. This will be further elaborated upon in section B of this Analysis below. For the purposes of this "service" analysis, suffice it to say AANDC's involvement in the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements determines whether and to what extent child and family services are provided to First Nations reserves and in the Yukon.

[72] For example, a document entitled First Nations Child and Family Services British Columbia Transition Plan (Decision by Assistant Deputy Minister – ESDPP) authored by three AANDC employees and signed by the Assistant Deputy Minister at the time, Ms. Christine Cram (see Annex, ex. 11), at page 2, explains the ultimate consequence that AANDC's funding can have on FNCFS Agencies:

> For the majority of these FNCFS agencies, a permanent reduction of unexpended maintenance balances and the absence of additional resources for operations on a go forward basis will render them financially unviable and will likely result in many agency closures.

[73] It is AANDC that created the FNCFS Program and its corresponding funding formulas, and who negotiated and administers the provincial/territorial agreements. While the FNCFS Program is set up to work in a tripartite fashion, and the other agreements in a bilateral fashion, at the end of the day it is AANDC's involvement that is needed to improve outcomes for First Nations on reserves and in the Yukon. AANDC holds a considerable degree of control in this regard. Again, this will be elaborated upon in section B of this Analysis. However, by way of example, in a document entitled Reform of the FNCFS Program in Québec (Information for the Deputy Minister), at pages 1-3 (see Annex, ex. 12), two AANDC employees explain the Department's decision not to transition Québec to a new funding methodology:

> INAC has been in discussion with the First Nations of Québec and Labrador Health and Social Services Commission (Commission) and Québec's Ministry of Health and Social Services since June, 2007 regarding > transitioning the Quebec FNCFS Agencies to an enhanced prevention approach.

>
> The three parties have developed a Partnership for Results Framework that outlines the strategic direction, key outcomes and performance indicators for FNCFS on reserve in Québec. Both the First Nations leadership and the Province have submitted letters of endorsement for this initiative.
>
> In November of 2007, a number of issues were raised by the First Nations of Québec and Labrador Health and Social Services Commission. The issues largely pertain to the overall funding formula that was proposed as a model for the Québec First Nations agencies (See Annex A for detailed list of concerns and our proposed action).
>
> A decision was made in December 2007, to move forward in the transition to the enhanced prevention focused approach without Québec in order to give the Department time to address First Nations' concerns with the transition process.
>
> The Department has not yet informed Québec First Nations and the Province of Québec of the decision to delay the transition to the Enhanced Prevention Focused Approach in Québec.
>
> There is a risk that once the Commission and Québec First Nations are informed of the decision that was made; they will not want to proceed with the transition to the new enhanced prevention-focused approach. It is hoped that the delivery of messaging from a senior official will reassure the First Nations of the Department's commitment and enable the working level to address concerns raised and move the transition forward.

[74] This document is an official position to be adopted by AANDC's Deputy Minister, informed by high level AANDC employees. It illustrates that, despite a tripartite relationship where its partners support a new funding approach, AANDC is the one who controls the process and makes the final decision in determining the approach to be taken.

[75] Furthermore, AANDC has the power to withhold funds if FNCFS Agencies and/or the provinces/territory do not comply with its funding requirements. This could result in agencies closing their doors and, as a consequence, inadequate child and family services being provided to First Nations children and families on reserves and in the Yukon (see testimony of William McArthur, Manager, Social Programs, British Columbia Regional Office, AANDC, Transcript Vol. 64 at pp. 45-47).

[76] All the above indicates a public relationship between AANDC and First Nations children and families in the provision of child and family services. In sum, AANDC extends the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements as a partnership, including with First Nations, to improve outcomes for First Nations children and families on reserve. Ultimately, through the FNCFS Program, its funding formulas and the related provincial/territorial agreements, AANDC has a direct impact on the child and family services provided to First Nations children and families living on reserves and in the Yukon Territory.

[77] This public relationship between AANDC and First Nations on reserves and in the Yukon in the provision of child and family services is reinforced by the federal government's constitutional responsibilities and its special relationship with Aboriginal peoples.

e. Section 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867

[78] The fact that AANDC does not directly deliver First Nations child and family services on reserve, but funds the delivery of those services through FNCFS Agencies or the provincial/territorial governments, does not exempt it from its public mandate and responsibilities to First Nations people. AANDC argues that child welfare services fall within provincial jurisdiction and that it only became involved as a matter of social policy to address concerns that the provinces were not providing the full range of services to First Nations children and families living on reserves. However, that position does not take into consideration Parliament's exclusive legislative authority over "Indians, and lands reserved for Indians" by virtue of section 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[79] In Canada, legislative power is divided between the federal government and the provincial/territorial governments. As stated by the Supreme Court in Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22 at paragraph 22 (Central Western Bank):

> …federalism was the legal response of the framers of the Constitution to the political and cultural realities that existed at Confederation. It thus represented a legal recognition of the diversity of the original members. The division of powers, one of the basic components of federalism, was designed to uphold this diversity within a single nation. Broad powers were conferred on provincial legislatures, while at the same time Canada's unity was ensured by reserving to Parliament powers better exercised in relation to the country as a whole. Each head of power was assigned to the level of government best placed to exercise the power. The fundamental objectives of federalism were, and still are, to reconcile unity with diversity, promote democratic participation by reserving meaningful powers to the local or regional level and to foster co-operation among governments and legislatures for the common good.

[80] The Supreme Court also noted that "the interpretation of these powers and of how they interrelate must evolve and must be tailored to the changing political and cultural realities of Canadian society" (Central Western Bank at para. 23). This is referred to as the "living tree" doctrine.

[81] The legislative powers defined in the Constitution Act, 1867 are deemed to be exclusive to the extent that, even if Parliament does not legislate in its fields of jurisdiction, the provinces/territories are not allowed to do so (see Union Colliery Co. of British Columbia v. Bryden, [1899] A.C. 580 (P.C.) at p. 588). However, the Court has indicated clearly that this doctrine of inter-jurisdictional immunity is to be construed narrowly, among other reasons, so as not to allow any legal vacuum. It is used "…to protect that which makes certain works or undertakings, things (e.g., Aboriginal lands) or persons (e.g., Aboriginal peoples and corporations created by the federal Crown) specifically of federal jurisdiction" (Central Western Bank at para. 41). As also noted in Central Western Bank at paragraph 42:

> Canadian federalism is not simply a matter of legalisms. The Constitution, though a legal document, serves as a framework for life and for political action within a federal state, in which the courts have rightly observed the importance of co-operation among government actors to ensure that federalism operates flexibly.

[82] Despite the doctrine of inter-jurisdictional immunity, cooperative federalism can exist in situations where federal and provincial authorities connect. In the recent case of Quebec (A.G.) v. Canada (A.G.), 2015 SCC 14 (Canadian Firearms Registry), where

Quebec challenged the constitutionality of the federal government's decision to destroy the firearms registry, the Supreme Court found itself divided on the scope of cooperative federalism. Nonetheless, the majority in Canadian Firearms Registry held that cooperative federalism cannot override or modify the constitutional division of powers:

> [17] Cooperative federalism is a concept used to describe the "network of relationships between the executives of the central and regional governments [through which] mechanisms are developed, especially fiscal mechanisms, which allow a continuous redistribution of powers and resources without recourse to the courts or the amending process […] From this descriptive concept of cooperative federalism, courts have developed a legal principle that has been invoked to provide flexibility in separation of powers doctrines, such as federal paramountcy and interjurisdictional immunity. It is used to facilitate interlocking federal and provincial legislative schemes and to avoid unnecessary constraints on provincial legislative action […] With respect to interjurisdictional immunity, for example, the principle of cooperative federalism has been relied on to explain and justify relaxing a rigid, watertight compartments approach to the division of legislative power that unnecessarily constrains legislative action by the other order of government: "In the absence of conflicting enactments of the other level of government, the Court should avoid blocking the application of measures which are taken to be enacted in furtherance of the public interest" (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 37).
> [18] However, we must also recognize the limits of the principle of cooperative federalism. The primacy of our written Constitution remains one of the fundamental tenets of our constitutional framework: Reference re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, at para. 53. This is especially the case with regard to the division of powers:
> > . . . the text of the federal constitution as authoritatively interpreted in the courts remains very important. It tells us who can act in any event. In other words, constitutionally it must always be possible in a federal country to ask and answer the question — What happens if the federal and provincial governments do not agree about a particular measure of co-operative action? Then which government and legislative body has power to do what?

[83] Instead of legislating in the area of child welfare on First Nations reserves, pursuant to Parliament's exclusive legislative authority over "Indians, and lands reserved for Indians" by virtue of section 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867, the federal government took a programing and funding approach to the issue. It provided for the application of provincial child welfare legislation and standards for First Nations on reserves through the enactment of section 88 of the Indian Act. However, this delegation and programing/funding approach does not diminish AANDC's constitutional responsibilities. In a comparable situation argued under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (the Charter), the Supreme Court stated in Eldridge at paragraph 42:

> …the Charter applies to private entities in so far as they act in furtherance of a specific governmental program or policy. In these circumstances, while it is a private actor that actually implements the program, it is government that retains responsibility for it. The rationale for this principle is readily apparent. Just as governments are not permitted to escape Charter scrutiny by entering into commercial contracts or other "private" arrangements, they should not be allowed to evade their constitutional responsibilities by delegating the implementation of their policies and programs to private entities.

[84] Similarly, AANDC should not be allowed to evade its responsibilities to First Nations children and families residing on reserve by delegating the implementation of child and family services to FNCFS Agencies or the provinces/territory. AANDC should not be allowed to escape the scrutiny of the CHRA because it does not directly deliver child and family services on reserve.

[85] As explained above, despite not actually delivering the service, AANDC exerts a significant amount of influence over the provision of those services. Ultimately, it is AANDC that has the power to remedy inadequacies with the provision of child and family services and improve outcomes for children and families residing on First Nations reserves and in the Yukon. This is the assistance or benefit AANDC holds out and intends to provide to First Nations children and families.

[86] Parliament's constitutional responsibility towards Aboriginal peoples, in a situation where a federal department dedicated to Aboriginal affairs oversees a social program and negotiates and administers agreements for the benefit of First Nations children and families, reinforces the public relationship between AANDC and First Nations in the provision of the FNCFS Program and the related provincial/territorial agreements.

f. The Crown's fiduciary relationship with Aboriginal peoples

[87] Furthermore, AANDC's commitment to ensuring the safety and well-being of children and families living on reserves and in Yukon must be considered in the context of the special relationship between the Crown and Aboriginal peoples.

[88] The Complainants submit that the relationship between the Crown and Aboriginal peoples is a fiduciary relationship that gives rise to a fiduciary duty in relation to the FNCFS Program. While AANDC acknowledges there is a general fiduciary relationship between the federal Crown and the Aboriginal peoples of Canada, it argues that fiduciary duty principles are not applicable to the Complaint.

[89] It is well established that in all its dealings with Aboriginal peoples, the Crown must act honourably (see Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73, at para. 16 [Haida Nation]). It is also well established that there exists a special relationship between the Crown and the Aboriginal peoples of Canada, qualified as a sui generis relationship. This special relationship stems from the fact that Aboriginal peoples were already here when the Europeans arrived in North America (see R. v. Van der Peet, [1996] 2 SCR 507, at para. 30).

[90] In 1950, in a case about the application of section 51 of the Indian Act, 1906 and concerning reserve lands, the Supreme Court stated that the care and welfare of First Nations people are a "political trust of the highest obligation":

> The language of the statute embodies the accepted view that these aborigenes are, in effect, wards of the State, whose care and welfare are a political trust of the highest obligation. For that reason, every such dealing with their privileges must bear the imprint of governmental approval, and it would be beyond the power of the Governor in Council to transfer that responsibility to the Superintendent General.
> (St. Ann's Island Shooting And Fishing Club v. The King, [1950] SCR 211 at p. 219 [per Rand J.])

[91] However, this "political trust" was not enforceable by the courts. This changed when the Supreme Court moved away from the political trust doctrine. In the context of a case dealing with the sale of surrendered land at conditions quite different from those agreed to at the time of the surrender, the Supreme Court qualified the relationship between the Crown and Aboriginal peoples as a fiduciary relationship in Guerin v. The Queen, [1984] 2 SCR.335, at page 376 (Guerin):

> The fiduciary relationship between the Crown and the Indians has its roots in the concept of aboriginal, native or Indian title. The fact that Indian Bands have a certain interest in lands does not, however, in itself give rise to a fiduciary relationship between the Indians and the Crown. The conclusion that the Crown is a fiduciary depends upon the further proposition that the Indian interest in the land is inalienable except upon surrender to the Crown.

[92] This special relationship is also rooted in the large degree of discretionary control assumed by the Crown over the lives and interests of Aboriginal peoples in Canada:

> English law, which ultimately came to govern aboriginal rights, accepted that the aboriginal peoples possessed pre-existing laws and interests, and recognized their continuance in the absence of extinguishment, by cession, conquest, or legislation: see, e.g., the Royal Proclamation of 1763, R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 1, and R. v. Sparrow, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075, at p. 1103. At the same time, however, the Crown asserted that sovereignty over the land, and ownership of its underlying title, vested in the Crown: Sparrow, supra. With this assertion arose an obligation to treat aboriginal peoples fairly and honourably, and to protect them from exploitation, a duty characterized as "fiduciary" in Guerin v. The Queen, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 335.

[93] After the entry into force of section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, in R. v. Sparrow, [1990] 1 SCR 1075, at page 1108, the Supreme Court further confirmed and defined the duty of the Crown to act in a fiduciary capacity as the "general guiding principle" for section 35:

> In our opinion, Guerin, together with R. v. Taylor and Williams (1981), 34 O.R. (2d) 360, ground a general guiding principle for s. 35(1). That is, the Government has the responsibility to act in a fiduciary capacity with respect to aboriginal peoples. The relationship between the Government and aboriginals is trust-like, rather than adversarial and, contemporary recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights must be defined in light of this historic relationship.

[94] This general guiding principle is not limited to section 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but has broader application as confirmed by the Supreme Court in Wewaykum Indian Band v. Canada, 2002 SCC 79, at paragraph 79 (Wewaykum).

[95] First Nations children and families on reserves are in a fiduciary relationship with AANDC. In the provision of the FNCFS Program, its corresponding funding formulas and the other related provincial/territorial agreements, "the degree of economic, social and proprietary control and discretion asserted by the Crown" leaves First Nations children and families "…vulnerable to the risks of government misconduct or ineptitude" (Wewaykum at para. 80). This fiduciary relationship must form part of the context of the Panel's analysis, along with the corollary principle that in all its dealings with Aboriginal peoples, the honour of the Crown is always at stake. As affirmed by the Supreme Court in Haida Nation, at paragraph 17:

> Nothing less is required if we are to achieve "the reconciliation of the pre-existence of aboriginal societies with the sovereignty of the Crown": Delgamuukw, supra, at para. 186, quoting Van der Peet, supra, at para. 31.

[96] That being said, it is also well established that this fiduciary relationship does not always give rise to fiduciary obligations. While the fiduciary relationship may be described as general in nature, requiring that the Crown act in the best interest of Aboriginal peoples, fiduciary obligations are specific, related to precise aboriginal interests:

> This sui generis relationship had its positive aspects in protecting the interests of aboriginal peoples historically […]
> But there are limits. The appellants seemed at times to invoke the "fiduciary duty" as a source of plenary Crown liability covering all aspects of the Crown-Indian band relationship. This overshoots the mark. The fiduciary duty imposed on the Crown does not exist at large but in relation to specific Indian interests.

[97] The Supreme Court has relied on private law concepts to define circumstances that can give rise to a fiduciary obligation because, although the Crown's obligation is not a private law duty, it is nonetheless in the nature of a private duty, susceptible of giving rise to enforceable obligations :

> It should be noted that fiduciary duties generally arise only with regard to obligations originating in a private law context. Public law duties, the performance of which requires the exercise of discretion, do not typically give rise to a fiduciary relationship. As the "political trust" cases indicate, the Crown is not normally viewed as a fiduciary in the exercise of its legislative or administrative function. The mere fact, however, that it is the Crown which is obligated to act on the Indians' behalf does not of itself remove the Crown's obligation from the scope of the fiduciary principle. As was pointed out earlier, the Indians' interest in land is an independent legal interest. It is not a creation of either the legislative or executive branches of government. The Crown's obligation to the Indians with respect to that interest is therefore not a public law duty. While it is not a private law duty in the strict sense either, it is nonetheless in the nature of a private law duty. Therefore, in this sui generis relationship, it is not improper to regard the Crown as a fiduciary.

[98] Guerin stands for the principle that a fiduciary obligation on the Crown towards Aboriginal peoples arises from the fact that their interest in land is inalienable except upon surrender to the Crown. In another case where the Supreme Court found that the Crown has a fiduciary obligation to prevent exploitative bargains in the context of a surrender of reserve land, in Blueberry River Indian Band v. Canada (Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development), [1995] 4 SCR 344 at paragraph 38, it referred to private law criteria to define a situation that could give rise to a fiduciary obligation:

> Generally speaking, a fiduciary obligation arises where one person possesses unilateral power or discretion on a matter affecting a second "peculiarly vulnerable" person: see Frame v. Smith, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 99; Norberg v. Wynrib, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 226; and Hodgkinson v. Simms, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 377. The vulnerable party is in the power of the party possessing the power or discretion, who is in turn obligated to exercise that power or discretion solely for the benefit of the vulnerable party. A person cedes (or more often finds himself in the situation where someone else has ceded for him) his power over a matter to another person. The person who has ceded power trusts the person to whom power is ceded to exercise the power with loyalty and care. This is the notion at the heart of the fiduciary obligation.

[99] The present case does not raise land related issues. The Panel is aware that fiduciary obligations have yet to be recognized by the Supreme Court in relation to Aboriginal interests other than land outside the framework of section 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 (see Wewaykum at para. 81). However, the Panel is also aware that in Frame v. Smith, [1987] 2 SCR 99, at paragraph 60, Wilson J. held that fiduciary duties did not apply only to legal and economic interests but could extend to human and personal interests:

> To deny relief because of the nature of the interest involved, to afford protection to material interests but not to human and personal interests would, it seems to me, be arbitrary in the extreme.

[100] In fact, in Wewaykum the Supreme Court noted that since the Guerin case the existence of a fiduciary obligation has been argued in a number of cases raising a variety of issues (see at para. 82). While it did not comment on these cases, the Court in Wewaykum, at paragraph 83, did state that a case by case approach would have to focus on the specific interest at issue and whether or not the Crown had assumed discretionary control giving rise to a fiduciary obligation:

> I think it desirable for the Court to affirm the principle, already mentioned, that not all obligations existing between the parties to a fiduciary relationship are themselves fiduciary in nature […], and that this principle applies to the relationship between the Crown and aboriginal peoples. It is necessary, then, to focus on the particular obligation or interest that is the subject matter of the particular dispute and whether or not the Crown had assumed discretionary control in relation thereto sufficient to ground a fiduciary obligation.

[101] Recent case law from the Supreme Court confirms that a fiduciary obligation may also arise from an undertaking. The following conditions are to be met:

> In summary, for an ad hoc fiduciary duty to arise, the claimant must show, in addition to the vulnerability arising from the relationship as described by Wilson J. in Frame: (1) an undertaking by the alleged fiduciary to act in the best interests of the alleged beneficiary or beneficiaries; (2) a defined person or class of persons vulnerable to a fiduciary's control (the beneficiary or beneficiaries); and (3) a legal or substantial practical interest of the beneficiary or beneficiaries that stands to be adversely affected by the alleged fiduciary's exercise of discretion or control.

> (Alberta v. Elder Advocates of Alberta Society, 2011 SCC 24, at para. 36 (Elder Advocates Society); see also Manitoba Metis Federation Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2013 SCC 14, at para. 50 [Manitoba Metis Federation])

[102] AANDC argues that there must be an undertaking of loyalty by the Crown to the point of forsaking the interests of all others in favour of those of the beneficiaries for a fiduciary obligation to apply (see Elder Advocates Society at para. 31; and, Manitoba Metis Federation at para. 61).

[103] However, in Elder Advocates Society, at paragraph 48, it should be noted that the Supreme Court held that the necessary undertaking was met with respect to Aboriginal peoples:

> In sum, while it is not impossible to meet the requirement of an undertaking by a government actor, it will be rare. The necessary undertaking is met with respect to Aboriginal peoples by clear government commitments from the Royal Proclamation of 1763 (reproduced in R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 1) to the Constitution Act, 1982 and considerations akin to those found in the private sphere.

[104] In view of the above and the evidence presented on this issue, the relationship between the federal government and First Nations people for the provision of child and family services on reserve could give rise to a fiduciary obligation on the part of the Crown. Arguably the three criteria outlined in Elder Advocates Society have been met in this case.

[105] The FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements were undertaken and are controlled by the Crown. This undertaking is explicitly intended to be in the best interests of the First Nations beneficiaries, including that the "best interests of the child" and the safety and well-being of First Nations children are objectives of the program. The Crown has discretionary control over the FNCFS Program through policy and other administrative directives. It also exercises discretionary control over the application of the other related provincial/territorial agreements as First Nations are not party to their negotiation. The FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements also have a direct impact on a vulnerable category of people: First Nations children and families in need of child and family support services on reserve.

[106] The legal and substantial practical interests of First Nations children, families, and communities stand to be adversely affected by AANDC's discretion and control over the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements. The Panel agrees with the AFN, Caring Society and the COO that the specific Aboriginal interests that stand to be adversely affected in this case are, namely, indigenous cultures and languages and their transmission from one generation to the other. Those interests are also protected by section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The transmission of indigenous languages and cultures is a generic Aboriginal right possessed by all First Nations children and their families. Indeed, the Supreme Court highlighted the importance of cultural transmission in R. v. Côté, [1996] 3 SCR 139 at paragraph 56:

> In the aboriginal tradition, societal practices and customs are passed from one generation to the next by means of oral description and actual demonstration. As such, to ensure the continuity of aboriginal practices, customs and traditions, a substantive aboriginal right will normally include the incidental right to teach such a practice, custom and tradition to a younger generation.

[107] Similarly, in Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62 at paragraph 26 (Doucet-Boudreau), the Supreme Court stated the following with regard to the relation between language and culture:

> This Court has, on a number of occasions, observed the close link between language and culture. In Mahe, at p. 362, Dickson C.J. stated:
> > . . . any broad guarantee of language rights, especially in the context of education, cannot be separated from a concern for the culture associated with the language. Language is more than a mere means of communication, it is part and parcel of the identity and culture of the people speaking it. It is the means by which individuals understand themselves and the world around them.

[108] In certifying a class action based on the operation of the child welfare system on reserve in Ontario, Justice Belobaba on the Ontario Superior Court of Justice, in Brown v. Canada (AG), 2013 ONSC 5637 at paragraph 44, expressed his views on the existence of a fiduciary duty based on the discretionary Crown control over Aboriginal interests in culture:

> it is at least arguable that a fiduciary duty arose on the facts herein for these reasons: (i) the Federal Crown exercised or assumed discretionary control over a specific aboriginal interest (i.e. culture and identity) by entering into the 1965 Agreement; (ii) without taking any steps to protect the culture and identity of the on-reserve children; (iii) who under federal common law were "wards of the state whose care and welfare are a political trust of the highest obligation"; and (iv) who were potentially being exposed to a provincial child welfare regime that could place them in non-aboriginal homes.

[109] The Panel agrees with the Caring Society that it is not necessary for the purposes of this case to further define the contours of Aboriginal rights in language and culture or a fiduciary duty related thereto. It is enough to say that, by virtue of being protected by section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 indigenous cultures and languages must be considered as "specific indigenous interests" which may trigger a fiduciary duty. Accordingly, where the government exercises its discretion in a way that disregards indigenous cultures and languages and hampers their transmission, it can breach its fiduciary duty. However, such a finding is not necessary to make a determination regarding whether or not AANDC provides a service; or, more broadly, to determine whether there has been a discriminatory practice under the CHRA.

[110] Suffice it to say, AANDC's development of the FNCFS Program and related agreements, along with its public statements thereon, indicate an undertaking on the part of the Crown to act in the best interests of First Nations children and families to ensure the provision of adequate and culturally appropriate child welfare services on reserve and in the Yukon. Whether or not that gives rise to a fiduciary obligation, the existence of the fiduciary relationship between the Crown and Aboriginal peoples is a general guiding principle for the analysis of any government action concerning Aboriginal peoples. In the current "services" analysis under the CHRA, it informs and reinforces the public nature of the relationship between AANDC and First Nations on reserves and in the Yukon in the provision of the FNCFS Program and other provincial/territorial agreements.

iii. Summary of findings

[111] Overall, the Panel finds the evidence indicates the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements are held out by AANDC as assistance or a benefit that it provides to First Nations people. The FNCFS Program and other provincial/territorial agreements were created and negotiated on behalf of First Nations by AANDC, a federal government department with the mandate and mission to do so. First Nations are a distinct public, served by AANDC in the context of a unique constitutional and fiduciary relationship. AANDC has undertaken to ensure First Nations living on reserve receive culturally appropriate child and family services that are reasonably comparable to the services provided to other provincial residents in similar circumstances. Therefore, the Panel finds there is a clear public nature and relationship with First Nations in AANDC's provision of the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements.

[112] This finding is similar to the one made by the Federal Court in Attawapiskat First Nation v. Canada, 2012 FC 948. In discussing the nature of funding agreements similar to the ones at issue in the present Complaint, the Federal Court stated at paragraph 59:

> the [Attawapiskat First Nation] relies on funding from the government through the [Comprehensive Funding Agreement] to provide essential services to its members and as a result, the [Comprehensive Funding Agreement] is essentially an adhesion contract imposed on the [Attawapiskat First Nation] as a condition of receiving funding despite the fact that the [Attawapiskat First Nation] consents to the [Comprehensive Funding Agreement]. There is no evidence of real negotiation. The power imbalance between government and this band dependent for its sustenance on the [Comprehensive Funding Agreement] confirms the public nature and adhesion quality of the [Comprehensive Funding Agreement].

[113] As a result, and for the reasons above, the Panel finds AANDC provides a service through the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements. In the following pages, the Panel will examine the impacts of AANDC's service and, specifically, how AANDC's method of funding the FNCFS Program and related provincial/territorial agreements significantly controls the provision of First Nations children and family services on reserve and in the Yukon to the detriment of First Nations children and families.

B. First Nations are adversely impacted by the services provided by AANDC and, in some cases, denied services as a result of AANDC's involvement [114] Before dealing with how the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements are funded, it is helpful to have a basic understanding of how child welfare services are provided in Canada. Dr. Cindy Blackstock, Executive Director of the Caring Society, provided helpful testimony in this regard (see Transcript Vol. 1 at pp. 110, 112, 124-129, 132-136, 138-142 and 151; see also Annex, ex. 1).

i. General child welfare principles

[115] As indicated earlier, child welfare in Canada includes a range of services designed to protect children from abuse and neglect and to support families so that they can stay together. The main objective of social workers is to do all they can to keep children safely within their homes and communities. There are two major streams of child welfare services: prevention and protection.

[116] Prevention services are divided into three main categories: primary, secondary and tertiary. Primary prevention services are aimed at the community as a whole. They include the ongoing promotion of public awareness and education on the healthy family and how to prevent or respond to child maltreatment. Secondary prevention services are triggered when concerns begin to arise and early intervention could help avoid a crisis. Tertiary prevention services target specific families when a crisis or risks to a child have been identified. As opposed to separating a child from his or her family, tertiary prevention services are designed to be "least disruptive measures" that try and mitigate the risks of separating a child from his or her family. Early interventions to provide family support can be quite successful in keeping children safely within their family environment, and provincial legislation requires that least disruptive measures be exhausted before a child is placed in care.

[117] Protection services are triggered when the safety or the well-being of a child is considered to be compromised. If the child cannot live safely in the family home while measures are taken with the family to remedy the situation, child welfare workers will make arrangements for temporary or permanent placement of the child in another home where he or she can be cared for. This is called placing the child “in care”. The first choice for a caregiver in this situation would usually be a kin connection or a foster family. Kinship care includes children placed out-of-home in the care of the extended family, individuals emotionally connected to the child, or in a family of a similar religious or ethno-cultural background.

[118] The child welfare system is typically called into action when someone has concerns about the safety or well-being of a child and reports these concerns to a social worker. The first step is for the social worker to do a preliminary assessment of the report in order to decide whether further investigation is called for. If the social worker concludes that an investigation is warranted, he or she can meet with family members and can interview the child. The child is not removed from the home during the investigation unless his or her safety is at risk. The social worker will develop a plan of action for the child and his or her family in coordination with the child’s extended family and professionals such as teachers, early child care workers and cultural workers. A whole range of services may include personal counselling, mentoring by an Elder, access to childhood development programs or to programs designed to enhance the homemaking and parental skills of the caregiver.

[119] There are circumstances, however, when the risk to the child’s safety or well-being is too great to be mitigated at home, and the child cannot safely remain in his or her family environment. In such circumstances, most provincial statutes require that a social worker first look at the extended family to see if there is an aunt, an uncle or a grandparent who can care for the child. It is only when there is no other solution that a child should be removed from his or her family and placed in foster care under a temporary custody order. Following the issuance of a temporary custody order, the social worker must appear in court to explain the placement and the plan of care for the child and support of the family. The temporary custody order can be renewed and eventually, when all efforts have failed, the child may be placed in permanent care.

[120] The major categories of child maltreatment are: sexual, physical, or emotional abuse, or exposure thereto, and neglect. For First Nations, the main source of child maltreatment is neglect in the form of a failure to supervise and failure to meet basic needs. Poverty, poor housing and substance abuse are common risk factors on reserves that call for early counselling and support services for children and families to avoid the intervention of child protection services.

ii. The allocation of funding for First Nations child and family services [121] AANDC funds child and family services on reserves and in the Yukon in various ways. At the time of the complaint, there were 105 FNCFS Agencies in the 10 provinces across Canada (104 at the time of the hearing). The FNCFS Program, applies to most of the FNCFS Agencies in Canada, uses two funding formulas: Directive 20-1 and the Enhanced Prevention Focused Approach (the EPFA). In Ontario, funding is provided through the 1965 Agreement. In certain parts of Alberta and British Columbia, funding is provided through the Alberta Reform Agreement and the BC MOU and, since 2012, the BC Service Agreement. Finally, in the Yukon funding is allocated pursuant to the Yukon Funding Agreement (see testimony of Ms. Barbara D'Amico, Senior Policy Analyst at the Social and Policy Branch of AANDC, Transcript Vol. 50 at p. 141). Each method of funding is addressed in turn.

a. The FNCFS Program

[122] Beginning with the FNCFS Program, AANDC's authorities require that, before entering into a funding arrangement with an FNCFS Agency (or Recipient), an agreement be in place between the province or territory and the agency that meets the requirements of AANDC's national FNCFS Policy (see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at s. 4.1). Thereafter, funding is provided through a comprehensive funding arrangement (CFA), which is "…a program-budgeted funding agreement that [AANDC] enters into with Recipients…" (2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at s. 4.4.1). According to the 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at section 4.4.1:

> [A CFA] contains components funded by means of a Contribution, which is a reimbursement of eligible expenses and Flexible Transfer Payments, which are formula funded. Surpluses from the Flexible Transfer Payment may be retained by the Recipient provided the terms and conditions of the CFA have > been fulfilled. The FNCFS program expects that all surplus money will be used for FNCFS. It is also expected that Recipients will absorb any deficits.

[123] Funding for FNCFS Agencies is determined in accordance with AANDC "authorities" (see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at s. 1.4). Those "authorities" are obtained from the federal government through Cabinet and Treasury Board and "…are reflected in the […] Program Directive" (2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at s. 1.4.5). The Program Directive, also called Directive 20-1 and found at Appendix A of the 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual, "…interprets the authorities and places them into a useable context" (2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at s. 1.4.5). Directive 20-1 is AANDC's "…national policy statement on FNCFS" (see definition of "Program Directive 20-1 CHAPTER 5 (Program Directive)", 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at s. 7, p. 51). It is also:

> …a blueprint on how INAC will administer the FNCFS program from a national perspective, it is also intended to be a teaching document, for new staff at both INAC Headquarters and Regions. The combination of the national manual and the regional manuals should create a clear picture of INAC's role in FNCFS in Canada

[124] Prior to 2007, around the time of the Complaint, all provinces and the Yukon, except Ontario, functioned under Directive 20-1. Currently, New Brunswick, British Columbia, Newfoundland and Labrador and the Yukon are subject to the application of Directive 20-1.

[125] In line with the FNCFS Program, the principles of Directive 20-1 include a commitment to "…expanding First Nations Child and Family Services on reserve to a level comparable to the services provided off reserve in similar circumstances […] in accordance with the applicable provincial child and family services legislation" (see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at Appendix A, ss. 6.1 and 6.6). Furthermore, Directive 20-1 supports "…the creation of First Nations designed, controlled and managed services" (see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at Appendix A, s. 6.2). Under Directive 20-1, funding for FNCFS agencies is determined through two separate categories: operations and maintenance.

[126] Operational funding is intended to cover operations and administration costs for such items as salaries and benefits for agency staff, travel expenses, staff training, legal services, family support services and agency administration, including rent and office expenditures (see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at s.2.2.2 and at Appendix A, s. 19.1). It is calculated using a formula based on the on-reserve population of children aged 0-18 as reported annually by First Nations bands across Canada. The calculation of the operations funding is done annually by AANDC as of December 31 of each year, based on the population statistics of the preceding year (see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at s. 3.2). FNCFS Agencies are eligible to receive a fixed administrative allocation pursuant to the following formula:

> A fixed amount $143,158.84 per organization + $10,713.59 per member band + $726.91 per child (0-18 years) + $9,235.23 x average remoteness factor + $8,865.90 per member band x average remoteness factor + $73.65 per child x average remoteness factor + actual costs of the per diem rates of foster homes, group homes and institutions established by the province or territory.
> (see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at Appendix A, s. 19.1(a); see also 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at ss. 3.2.1-3.2.3)

[127] The adjustment factor is multiplied by $9,235.23, the remoteness factor is multiplied by $8,865.90 times the number of bands within the agency's catchment area and the child population (0 to 18 years) is multiplied by $73.65 times the remoteness factor (see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at s. 3.2.3). The remoteness factor takes into account such things as the distance between the First Nation and a service centre, road access, and availability of services. It can range from 0 to 1.9. If multiple communities are served by an FNCFS Agency, the remoteness factors of each of the communities is averaged to come to the 'average remoteness factor' (see testimony of W. McArthur, Transcript Vol. 63 at pp. 28-29).

[128] The amounts in the operational funding formula are based on certain assumptions emanating from the time it was put in place in the early 1990's:

- On average, 6% of the on reserve child population is in care;

- On average, 20% of families on reserve require child and family services or are classified as multi-problem families;
- One child care worker and one family support worker for every 20 children in care;
- One supervisor and one support staff for every 5 workers;
- Wages based on average salaries in Ontario and Manitoba

(see Annex, ex. 13 at pp. 7-8 [Wen:De Report One]).

[129] According to Ms. D'Amico, the 6% assumption regarding children-in-care is based on the 2007 national average and it provides FNCFS Agencies with stability. That is, even if an agency has or later achieves a smaller percentage of children-in-care, their budget is not affected. The 20% of families requiring services is determined using an assumption that there are on-average three children per family. By dividing the total on-reserve child population by three, AANDC arrives at the number of families it believes would normally be served by the applicable FNCFS Agency. It then takes 20% of that population calculation as a variable in determining the FNCFS Agency's budget (see testimony of B. D'Amico, Transcript Vol. 51 at pp. 25-31).

[130] In the first four years of operation of a new FNCFS Agency, the funding formula is gradually implemented at a rate of 75% in the first year, 85% the second year, 95% the third year and 100% in the fourth year [see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at section 3.2.1 and Appendix A, s. 19.1(c)]. Furthermore, for agencies that serve less than 1,000 children, the fixed maximum amount of $143,158.84 is decreased as follows: $71,579.43 (501-800 children); $35,789.10 (251-500); and, regions with a child population of 0 to 250 receive no administrative allocation [see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at Appendix A, s. 19.2(b)]. However, in British Columbia, the full allocation for population begins with at least 801 children (see testimony of W. McArthur, Transcript Vol. 63 at p. 23).

[131] Maintenance funding is intended to cover the actual costs of eligible expenditures for maintaining a First Nations child ordinarily resident on reserve in alternate care out of parental home. Children must be taken into care in accordance with provincially or territorially approved legislation, standards and rates for foster home, group home and institutional care. FNCFS Agencies are required to submit monthly invoices for children in care out of the parental home and are to be reimbursed on the basis of actual expenditures (see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at ss. 3.3.1-3.3.2 and Appendix A, s. 20.1).

[132] Until 2011, FNCFS Agencies in British Columbia were funded on a per diem structure, but have since transitioned to reimbursement for maintenance expenses based on actual costs. However, if funding based on actuals provides for less funding, the previous per diem funding levels are maintained as part of a plan to eventually transition FNCFS Agencies in that province to the EPFA (see testimony of W. McArthur, Transcript Vol. 63 at pp. 35-36; and, testimony of B. D'Amico, Transcript Vol. 51 at pp. 150-151).

[133] FNCFS Agencies also have the option of applying for "flexible" funding for maintenance under Directive 20-1 (see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at Appendix A, s. 20.2). This option allows agencies to receive a payment of their total operational funding allocation, along with a historically based estimate of their maintenance costs. This flexible funding option is meant to provide FNCFS Agencies with increased flexibility to re-profile maintenance funding to provide increased resources for prevention. To access this flexible funding option an FNCFS Agency must undergo an assessment and receive approval from AANDC's regional office, along with approval from AANDC Headquarters. In 2006, only 7 out of 105 FNCFS Agencies utilized the flexible funding option (see Annex, ex. 14 at p. 5 [2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program]).

[134] The monetary amounts reflected in Directive 20-1 reflect 1995-1996 values and have not been significantly modified since that time, despite the directive providing for them to be increased by 2% every year, subject to the availability of resources (see 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual at Appendix A, s. 22.00; and, testimony of W. McArthur, Transcript Vol. 64 at pp. 3-4). Furthermore, maximum funding by AANDC is 100 percent of eligible costs. FNCFS Agencies may be required to repay funds to AANDC if their total funding from all sources, including from voluntary sector sources, exceeds eligible expenditures and when AANDC's contribution thereto is in excess of $100,000 (see 2012 National Social Programs Manual at p. 10, s. 11.0 [the stacking provisions]).

[135] Since 2005, an 8.24 percent increase has been applied to each FNCFS Agency's total allocation under Directive 20-1 (see testimony of W. McArthur, Transcript Vol. 63 at p. 32; and, testimony of B. D'Amico, Transcript Vol. 51 at p. 17). Additional funding is also provided in New Brunswick for the Head Start program and for in-home care as a precursor to the transition to the EPFA (see testimony of B. D'Amico, Transcript Vol. 51 at pp. 169-173).

[136] That is, since 2007, AANDC has transitioned the funding model for certain provinces under the FNCFS Program from Directive 20-1 to the EPFA. An agreement was reached to implement the EPFA in Alberta and Saskatchewan in 2007, Nova Scotia in 2008, Québec in 2009, Prince Edward Island in 2009 and Manitoba in 2010.

[137] Under EPFA, prevention is included as a third funding stream to operations and maintenance. Prevention services are "…designed to reduce the incidence of family dysfunction and breakdown or crisis and to reduce the need to take children into Alternate Care or the amount of time a child remains in Alternate Care" (2012 National Social Programs Manual at p. 33, s. 2.1.17; see also p. 38, s. 4.4.1). Eligible expenses under this prevention funding stream include: salaries and benefits for prevention and resource workers, travel, paraprofessional services, family support services, mentoring services for children, home management services, and non-medical counselling services not covered by other funding sources (see 2012 National Social Programs Manual at p. 38, s. 4.4.2).

[138] Implementation of the EPFA begins with tri-partite discussions between the province, First Nation community and AANDC. From the tripartite discussions, a Tripartite Accountability Framework is developed outlining the goals, objectives, performance indicators, and roles and responsibilities of the parties. Using the Tripartite Accountability Framework as a benchmark, the FNCFS Agency prepares an initial 5-year business plan, which is subject to AANDC review and acceptance by the province. The business plan is a pre-requisite in order to receive funding under the EPFA (see 2012 National Social Programs Manual at p. 37, s. 4.3; see also testimony of B. D'Amico, Transcript Vol. 50 at pp. 146-152).

[139] Once the framework and business plan are in place, the costing discussions take place. According to the 2012 National Social Programs Manual, funding for operations and prevention services are based on a cost-model developed at regional tri-partite tables and are consistent with reasonable comparability to the respective province within AANDC's program authority (see 2012 National Social Programs Manual at p. 38, s. 4.4.1). That is, the EPFA is to be tailored to each jurisdiction using a formula made-up of line-items that are identified at tripartite tables. The determination of staffing numbers and which line items to include in the formula, and the dollar values assigned to each of those line items, is based on variables provided by the province (for example staffing ratios, caseload ratios, and salary grades). Those amounts are then worked into AANDC's operations and prevention cost-model. A cost-model is utilized because the provinces do not always use a funding formula that AANDC can replicate (see testimony of B. D'Amico, Transcript Vol. 50 at pp. 56, 150-151; and, Vol. 51 at pp.18-66, 153-154).

[140] Similar to Directive 20-1, the formula for the EPFA is based on the child population served by the FNCFS Agency and the assumptions that a minimum of 20% of families are in need of child and family services and that 6% of children are in care (although in Manitoba an assumption of 7% of children in care is used in the EPFA formula). The prevention focused services component of the EPFA formula is largely based on the salaries needed for service delivery staff, where the amount of staff needed is calculated based on the assumed amount of children in care and families in need of services. The estimated amount of children in care is calculated by multiplying the child population served by the FNCFS Agency by the assumed percentage of children in care. As mentioned above, the number of families in need of services is calculated by taking the total child population served by the FNCFS Agency, dividing it by the average amount of children per First Nation family (3), and then multiplying that number by the assumed percentage of families in need of prevention services (20%) (see testimony of B. D'Amico, Transcript Vol. 51 at pp. 24-31).

[141] The calculated estimates of children in care and families in need of care are then used to determine the amount of service delivery staff needed for the FNCFS Agency. Similar to Directive 20-1, provincial ratios in terms of social workers per children in care or families in need, supervisors per amount of socials workers, and support staff per amount of workers are used to estimate the staff needed for specific positions. The average salaries for those positions within the province, at the time EPFA is implemented, then make up the bulk of funding provided for the prevention focused services component of the funding formula (see testimony of B. D'Amico, Transcript Vol. 51 at pp. 32-79). As Ms. Murphy explained:

> We are from a funding perspective, so how the provinces fund is what we want to stay comparable with, not the types of services that the province funds -- or provides, excuse me.
>
> And the only way that we could find that, a way to be comparable, was to identify the variables, those calculation variables; so the salary grids, the ratios – the staffing ratios, the caseload ratios. Those were the only funding tools that we could find to be comparable, and that is why we had incorporated that into the EPFA formula.

[142] Eligible expenditures for maintenance and operations under the EPFA are outlined at sections 3.4 and 3.5 of Directive 20-1 (see 2012 National Social Programs Manual at p. 38, s. 4.4.1). AANDC expects FNCFS Agencies to manage their operations and prevention costs within the budgets they have (see testimony of S. Murphy, Transcript Vol. 54 at p. 170). However, the EPFA does allow agencies flexibility in moving funding from one stream (operations, maintenance or prevention) to another "…in order to address needs and circumstances facing individual communities" (2012 National Social Programs Manual at p. 38, s. 4.4.1).

[143] Under EPFA, funding for prevention and operations is determined at the beginning of a five year period on a fixed cost basis (see testimony of B. D'Amico, Transcript Vol. 53 at p.16). EPFA funding is then rolled-out over a 3-4 year period, where the FNCFS Agency receives 40% of funding in year 1, 60% in year 2 and between 80% and 100% in year 3. The full funding amount is provided by year 4 (see testimony of B. D'Amico, Transcript Vol. 52 at pp. 145-146). Once EPFA is fully implemented, the only revision in the funding formula from year to year is to account for the child population served by the FNCFS

Agency. EPFA does not provide additional funding for increases in operations or prevention costs over time, such as for changes to professional services rates or incremental increases in salaries (see testimony of B. D'Amico, Transcript Vol. 52 at pp. 147-150; see also 2012 National Social Programs Manual at p. 37, s. 4.1)

[144] For example, in Alberta, where the EPFA was first implemented in 2007, the average salaries for service delivery staff from that initial implementation of the EPFA, based on 2006 values, are still being applied eight years later to the calculation of 2014 budgets (see testimony of B. D'Amico, Transcript Vol. 52 at p. 153; and, testimony of Ms. Carol Schimanke, Manager of Social Development, Child and Family Services Program, AANDC Alberta Regional Office, Transcript Vol. 61 at pp. 115-116). According to Ms. D'Amico, the rationale behind this is as follows:

> Because what the idea of EPFA was that if you placed more money in prevention and did a lot more early intervention work, your maintenance costs would go down. When those maintenance costs go down, that money could be reinvested into operations.
> So the idea -- and this is not in practice, but the idea behind this was for it -- for the Agencies to be self-sufficient and be able to move the monies from one stream to another. So that's why there was no escalator included in here.
>
> This is an issue we are now reviewing about what happens after year five if the maintenance isn't supplying the operations anymore, or never did, so, what if that theory doesn't work?

[145] Ms. D`Amico specified that in practice, given that some FNCFS Agencies are doing more intake and investigations as part of their prevention strategies, this has led to more kids in care and no reduction in maintenance costs (see Transcript Vol. 51 at pp. 91-92). The EPFA funding formula also does not include funds for intake and investigation.

[146] Maintenance funding under the EPFA is budgeted annually based on actual expenditures from the previous year (see 2012 National Social Programs Manual at p. 38, section 4.4.1). AANDC "re-bases" an agency's maintenance budget each year. For example, if an agency's maintenance budget is $100 in year one, but its expenditures for that year total only $80, AANDC will reduce its maintenance budget in the second year to $80. If in the second year that agency's number of children in care increases unexpectedly, the agency must work within its existing budget to manage those costs in the interim.

[147] In other words, if maintenance costs are greater than the set amount of maintenance funding, the FNCFS Agency must recover the deficit from its operations and/or prevention funding streams. If there is still a deficit in maintenance, AANDC has some funds that it holds back centrally at the beginning of each fiscal year to help manage those types of situations. When that fund is depleted, AANDC reallocates money from other programs within AANDC to cover the maintenance costs. If an FNCFS Agency has a surplus from its maintenance budget, the agency can keep it and re-apply it to other eligible expenses (see testimony of C. Schimanke, Transcript Vol. 61 at pp. 91, 96-98; testimony of B. D'Amico, Transcript Vol. 50 at pp. 174-181; and, testimony of S. Murphy, Transcript Vol. 54 at pp. 167-168, 172-174).

[148] AANDC receives a 2% increase in its budget for Social Programs every year. However, for the FNCFS Program, that 2% increase is calculated based on the budget of the FNCFS Program prior to the implementation of the EPFA, at about $450 million. Ms. Murphy estimated the current budget of the FNCFS Program, with the implementation of the EPFA, to be approximately $627 million. In her words:

> So the difference in that, between that 450 million has been made up of some of the two percent -- the portion of growth, some of it's the incremental investments that have come to the Department through the EPFA for those six jurisdictions and the rest of it is resource re-allocations.

b. Reports on the FNCFS Program

[149] The FNCFS Program has been examined in multiple reports: the First Nations Child and Family Services Joint National Policy Review, referred to above as the NPR, in 2000; three related studies from 2004-2005 referred to as the Wen:De reports; and, two Auditor General of Canada reports in 2008 and 2011, along with follow-up reports thereon by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

First Nations Child and Family Services Joint National Policy Review Final Report

[150] The NPR was published in 2000. It is a collaborative report by AANDC and the Assembly of First Nations. Although the NPR pre-dates the complaint by about 8 years, its study of the impacts of Directive 20-1 is still relevant given that the funding formula still applies to many FNCFS Agencies and in the Yukon. The report also outlines a rigorous methodology and consultation in arriving at its conclusions. The Panel finds this early study of Directive 20-1 informative and a useful starting point in understanding the impacts of AANDC's funding formula on First Nations children and families on reserves.

[151] The NPR describes the context of First Nations child and family services as including several experiences of massive loss, resulting in identity problems and difficulties in functioning for many First Nations and their families. These experiences include the historical experience of residential schools and its inter-generational effects, and the migration of First Nations out of reserves causing disruption to the traditional concept of family (see NPR at pp. 32-33). As the NPR puts it at page 33:

> First Nation families have been in the centre of a historical struggle between colonial government on one hand, who set out to eradicate their culture, language and world view, and that of the traditional family, who believed in maintaining a balance in the world for the children and those yet unborn. This struggle has caused dysfunction, high suicide rates, and violence, which have had vast inter-generational impacts.

[152] According to the NPR, "Program Directive 20-1 was developed to provide equity, predictability and flexibility in the funding of first nations child and family services agencies" (at p.10). A principle of Directive 20-1 is that AANDC is committed to the expansion of child and family services on reserve to a level comparable to the services off reserve in similar circumstances (see NPR at p. 20). This is AANDC's own standard and it expects FNCFS Agencies to abide by it:

> FNCFS Agencies are expected through their delegation of authority from the provinces, the expectations of their communities and by DIAND, to provide a > comparable range of services on reserve with the funding they receive through Directive 20-1.

> (NPR at p. 83, emphasis added)

[153] However, the NPR found the funding formula under Directive 20-1 inhibited FNCFS Agencies' ability to meet the expectation of providing a comparable range of child and family services on reserve for a number of reasons:

- The formula provides the same level of funding to agencies regardless of how broad, intense or costly, the range of service is (at p. 83).
- Variance in the definition of maintenance expenses from region to region, resulting in AANDC rejecting maintenance expenses that ought to have been reimbursed in accordance with provincial/territorial legislation and standards (at pp. 13-14, 84).
- Insufficient funding for staff and not enough flexibility in the funding formula for agencies to adjust to changing conditions (increases in number of children coming into care; development of new provincial/territorial programs; or, routine price adjustments for remoteness) (at pp. 13-14, 65, 70, 92-93, 96-97).
- There has not been an increase in cost of living since 1995-1996 (at pp. 18, 26).
- Funding only provided to new FNCFS agencies for 3 year and 6 year evaluations; however, provincial legislation requires on-going evaluations (at p. 11).
- First Nations have to comply with the same administrative burden created by change in provincial legislation but have not received any increased resources to meet those responsibilities, contradicting the principle of Directive 20-1 (at p. 12).
- Unrealistic amount of administration support to smaller agencies, often compounded by remoteness (at pp. 14, 97).
- The maximum annual budgetary increase of 2% did not reflect the average annual increase of 6.2% in the FNCFS Agencies (at p. 14).

- The average per capita per child in care expenditure was 22% lower than the average in the provinces (at p. 14).

- The formula does not provide adequate resources to allow FNCFS Agencies to do legislated/targeted prevention, alternative programs and least disruptive/intrusive measures for children at risk (at p. 120).

[154] The NPR made 17 recommendations to address these areas of concern with respect to Directive 20-1, including investigating a new methodology for funding operations. It was recommended that the new funding methodology consider factors such as work-load case analysis, national demographics and the impact on large and small agencies, and economy of scale (see NPR at pp. 119-121). A further recommendation was to develop a management information system in order to ensure the establishment of consistent, reliable data collection, analysis and reporting procedures amongst AANDC, FNCFS Agencies and the provinces/territory (see NPR at p. 121).

The Wen:De Reports

[155] The NPR led to the establishment of the Joint National Policy Review National Advisory Committee (the NAC) in 2001. The NAC involved officials from AANDC, the AFN and FNCFS Agencies. One of the tasks of the NAC was to explore how to change parts of Directive 20-1 in line with the NPR recommendations. Funded by AANDC, the NAC commissioned further research in order to establish that revisions of the FNCFS Program and Directive 20-1 were warranted. Three reports were produced on the subject: the Wen:De Reports. Each of the three reports outlines clearly the methodology used to arrive at its findings and explains those findings in great detail. Three important contributing authors of the Wen:De reports, Dr. Cindy Blackstock, Dr. John Loxley, and Dr. Nicolas Trocmé testified at length about the reports at the hearing and confirmed the findings in these reports.

[156] The objective of the first Wen:De report in 2004 was to identify three new options for FNCFS Agency funding and the research agenda needed to inform each of those options (see Wen:De Report One at p. 4). The authors explain how they reviewed pertinent literature from Canada and abroad; conducted interviews with informed observers and participants, including the Operations Formula Funding Design Team; and met with six FNCFS Agencies representing differing agency sizes, service contexts, regions and cultural groups (see Wen:De Report One at p. 6).

[157] The authors noted that the concerns and challenges expressed by the FNCFS Agencies that it interviewed were in line with the NPR findings and recommendations, such as the lack of funding for prevention services, legal services, capital costs, management information systems, culturally based programs, caregivers, staff salaries and training, and costs adjustments for remote and small agencies (see Wen:De Report One at pp. 6, 8).

[158] Notably, the report found FNCFS Agencies "…are not funded on the basis of a determination of need but rather on population levels" resulting in "…significant regional variation in the implementation of Directive 20-1 as funding officials within the department adapted to their local context" (Wen:De Report One at p. 5). As a result, it concluded:

> Overall, our findings affirm that the findings and recommendations of the NPR which was completed in June of 2000 continue to be reflective of the concerns that FNCFSA are experiencing today. […] All agencies agreed that immediate redress of inadequate funding was necessary to support good social work practice in their communities.

[159] Wen:De Report One presents three options to address this conclusion: (1) redesign the existing funding formula; (2) follow the funding model of the province/territory in which the agency is located; or, (3) a new First Nations based funding formula that funds agencies on the basis of community needs and assets, along with the particular socio-economic and cultural characteristics of the communities and Nations which the agencies serve (see Wen:De Report One at pp. 7-13).

[160] The second Wen:De report analyzed the three options presented in the first report (see Annex, ex. 15 [Wen:De Report Two]). To do so, the various authors of the report conducted literature reviews and key informant interviews with twelve sample FNCFS Agencies. A key method was to conduct detailed case studies of the twelve sample agencies and the provinces using standardized questionnaires administered by regional researchers. The research approach involved specialized research projects on the incidence and social work response to reports of child maltreatment respecting First Nations children, prevention services, jurisdictional issues, extraordinary circumstances, management information services and small agencies (see Wen:De Report Two at pp. 7, 9-11).

[161] Wen:De Report Two begins by examining the experience of First Nations children coming into contact with the child welfare system in Canada. It notes that the key drivers of neglect for First Nations children are poverty, poor housing and substance misuse. The report underscores that two of those three factors are arguably outside the control of parents: poverty and poor housing. As such, parents are unlikely to be able to redress these risks and it can mean that their children are more likely to stay in care for prolonged periods of time and, in some cases, permanently (see Wen:De Report Two at p. 13). On this issue, Wen:De Report Two indicates:

- There are approximately three times the numbers of First Nations children in state care than there were at the height of residential schools in the 1940s (see at p. 8).
- Aboriginal children are more than twice as likely to be investigated compared to non-Aboriginal children (see at p. 15).
- Once investigated, cases involving Aboriginal children are more likely to be substantiated and more likely to require on-going child welfare services (see at p. 15).
- Aboriginal children are more than twice as likely to be placed in out of home care, and more likely to be brought to child welfare court (see at p. 15).
- The profiles of Aboriginal families differ dramatically from the profile of non-Aboriginal families (see at p. 15).
- Aboriginal cases predominantly involve situations of neglect where poverty, inadequate housing and parent substance abuse are a toxic combination of risk factors (see at p. 15).

> First Nations child and family service agencies are inadequately funded in almost every area of operation ranging from capital costs, prevention programs, standards and evaluation, staff salaries and child in care programs. The disproportionate need for services amongst First Nations children and families coupled with the under-funding of the First Nations child and family service agencies that serve them has resulted in an untenable situation.

[163] Based on its research findings, the report indicates that Directive 20-1 would need substantial alteration in order to meet the requirements of the FNCFS Program and to ensure equitable child welfare services for First Nations children resident on reserve. There are a number of issues causing an inadequacy in funding. The lack of an adjustment to funding levels for increases in the cost of living is identified as one of the major weaknesses of Directive 20-1. Although Directive 20-1 contains a cost of living adjustment, it has not been implemented since 1995. According to Wen:De Report Two, not adjusting funding for increases in cost of living "…leads to both under-funding of services and to distortion in the services funded since some expenses subject to inflation must be covered, while others may be more optional (at p. 45). Wen:De Report Two calculates prices increased by 21.21% over the ten year period since Directive 20-1 was last adjusted for cost of living (see a p. 45). To restore the loss of purchasing power since 1995, it found $24.8 million would be needed to meet the cost of living requirements for 2005 alone (see Wen:De Report Two at p. 51).

[164] Similarly, Directive 20-1 contains no periodic reconciliation for inflation. For example, since Directive 20-1 was introduced in 1990, there has been no adjustment for salary increases. Two thirds of FNCFS Agencies participating in Wen:De Report Two reported funding for salaries and benefits was not sufficient (see at pp. 35, 57). Wen:De Report Two estimates the loss of funds due to inflation for the operations portion of Directive 20-1 to be $112 million (at p. 57). It adds, any increases in funding only come with increases in the number of children served. Therefore, in the circumstances, "either the quality of services must have declined if child and family needs grew proportionately with population or, increases in costs of services can have been covered, if at all, only from a reduction in the proportion of children or families receiving services" (at p. 121).

[165] The population thresholds were also found by all agencies to be an inadequate means of benchmarking operations funding levels. Approximately half of the respondents to the study stated funding should be based on community needs not child population. Some added that the entire community population should be taken into account, not just that of children, since it is the entire family that needs support when a child is at risk or is unsafe. In fact, small agencies (those serving child populations of less than 1,000) represent 55% of the total number of FNCFS Agencies. According to 75% of the small agencies who participated in Wen:De Report Two, their salary and benefits levels for staff were not comparable to other child welfare organizations (see at pp. 46-48, 213).

[166] In addition, Directive 20-1 provides no adjustment for the different content of provincial/territorial legislation and standards. While the FNCFS Program includes a guiding principle that services should be reasonably comparable to those provided to children in similar circumstances off reserve, it contains no mechanism to ensure this is achieved (see Wen:De Report Two at p. 50).

[167] Aside from the above, Wen:De Report Two found consensus among FNCFS Agencies it canvassed that Directive 20-1 makes inadequate provision for travel, legal costs, front-line workers, program evaluation, accounting and janitorial staff, staff meetings, Health and Safety Committee meetings, security systems, human resources staff for large agencies, quality assurance specialists and management information systems. Furthermore, Wen:De Report Two comments that funding has not reflected the significant technology changes in computer hardware and software over the past decade. Moreover, liability insurance premiums have increased substantially over that same period and are not reflected in Directive 20-1 (see at p. 122). Wen:De Report Two also identified management information systems as not meeting minimum standards in the vast majority of cases (see at p. 57).

[168] Of particular note, funds for prevention and least disruptive measures were identified as inadequate, along with 84% of reporting FNCFS Agencies feeling that current funding levels were insufficient to provide adequate culturally based services (see Wen:De Report Two at p. 57). In this regard, the report found that "the present funding formula provides more incentives for taking children into care than it provides support for preventive, early intervention and least intrusive measures" (Wen:De Report Two at p. 114). This is because the funding formula provides dollar-for-dollar reimbursement of "maintenance" expenditures and prevention services are often not deemed to fall under "maintenance" (see Wen:De Report Two at p. 19-21). As a result, prevention funding was identified as being inadequate, in spite of the fact that such services are mandated under most provincial child welfare legislation (see Wen:De Report Two at p. 91). On this basis, the report states:

> This means that agencies in this situation effectively have no money to comply with the statutory requirement to provide families with a meaningful opportunity to redress the risk that resulted in their child being removed. More importantly, the children they serve are denied an equitable chance to stay safely at home due to the structure and amount of funding under the Directive. In this way the Directive really does shape practice – instead of supporting good practice.
> (Wen:De Report Two at p. 21)

[169] Wen:De Report Two concludes option three, a new First Nations based funding formula that funds agencies based on needs and assets, is the most promising way to address these deficiencies because of the "…possibility of re-conceptualizing the pedagogy, policy and practice in First Nations child welfare in a way that better supports sustained positive outcomes for First Nations children" (Wen:De Report Two at p. 9). In sum, Wen:De Report Two recommends: targeted funding for least disruptive measures; funds for adequate culturally based policy and standards development; ensure that human resources funds are sufficient; increased investment in research to inform policy and practice for FNCFS Agencies; and, introduce financial review and adjustment to account for changes to provincial child welfare legislation (see Wen:De Report Two at p. 56).

[170] The third Wen:De report involved the development and costing of the recommended changes arising from the second report (see Annex, ex. 16 [Wen:De Report Three]). A national survey instrument was developed and sent out to 93 FNCFS Agencies. Thirty-five surveys were completed, representing 32,575 children, 146 First Nations and $28.6 million in operating funds. This covered 38% of all FNCFS Agencies, 49% of all bands, 31.4% of all children 0-18 and 28.7% of all funding for operations (see Wen:De Report Three at pp. 9-10).

> 1) uncertainty in what the original rationale was underlying the development of the formula 2) regional interpretations of sometimes vaguely worded guidelines, 3) a failure to implement certain elements of the formula such as the annual inflation adjustment and 4) a failure of the policy to keep pace with advances in social work evidence based practice, child welfare liability law and the evolution of management information systems and 5) the policy appeared to leave out some child welfare expenses altogether or fund them inadequately such as the failure of the policy to support agencies to provide in home interventions to abused and neglected children to keep them safely at home as opposed to bringing them into care.

[172] Despite these weaknesses, Wen:De Report Three also indicates Directive 20-1 has some positive features, including that it is national in scope, has undergone two national studies, has enabled the development of FNCFS Agencies throughout Canada, and offers a baseline for judging the impacts of possible changes to the current regime.

[173] These reasons were the principle basis forming the recommendation in Wen:De Report Three to implement both options 1 and 3. That is, redesign Directive 20-1 now, with a priority on funding prevention services and providing redress for losses in funding due to inflation, while providing a foundation for the development of a First Nations based formula over time (see Wen:De Report Three at pp. 11-12). In also pursuing option 1, the report noted the development of a First Nations funding model would not provide a quick fix to the problems with the existing funding formula (see Wen:De Report Three at p. 14).

[174] Option two, tying FNCFS Agency funding to provincial formulae, was found to be the least promising option, notably because in several provinces it is not clear what their formula is and First Nation communities do not have the same degree of infrastructure of programs, services and volunteer agencies. Moreover, provincial funding traditions are not based on the particular needs and conditions faced by First Nation families living on reserve, including that it costs more to service First Nations children and families due to their high needs levels (see Wen:De Report Three at p. 13).

[175] In recommending reforms to Directive 20-1, Wen:De Report Three noted that "[a] shift in funding mentality is vital" (at p. 20). That is, as stated at page 20 of Wen:De Report Three:

> An approach that invests in the community and engages the community at all levels – children, adolescents, youth, parents and Elders means directing resources at growth and development of the people rather than the breakdowns of the people in the community. This approach demonstrates long term commitment to the growth of a child and family and invests in the future of contributing members to society.

> Although each suggested change element is presented as a separate item, it is important to understand that these elements are interdependent and adoption in a piece meal fashion would undermine the overall efficacy of the proposed changes. For example, providing least disruptive measures funding for at home child maltreatment interventions without providing the cost of living adjustment would result in agencies not having the infrastructure and staffing capacity to maximize outcomes. Similarly, these recommendations assume that there will be no reductions in the First Nations child and family service agency funding envelope. Situations where funds in one area are cut back and redirected to other funding streams in child and family services should be avoided as our research found that under funding was apparent across the current formula components.

[177] Wen:De Report Three recommends certain economic reforms to Directive 20-1, along with policy changes to support those reforms. The recommended economic reforms from Wen:De Report Three, include: a new funding stream for prevention/least disruptive measures (at pp. 19-21); adjusting the operations budget (at pp. 24-25); reinstating the annual cost of living adjustment on a retroactive basis back to 1995 (at pp. 18-19); providing sufficient funding to cover capital costs (buildings, vehicles and office equipment) (at pp. 28-29); and, funding for the development of culturally based standards by FNCFS Agencies (at p. 30).

[179] For small agencies the report found that the fixed amount per agency or the provision for overhead did not provide realistic administrative support for two reasons. The first is that no agency representing communities with a combined total of 250 or fewer children receives any overhead funding whatsoever. The second problem is that available funding is currently fixed in three large blocks: 251-500 = $ 35,790; 501-800 = $ 71,580; and, 801 and up = $143,158. A slight increase or decrease in child population can result in a huge increase or decrease in overhead funding available to an agency (see Wen:De Report Three at p. 23).

[180] Therefore, Wen:De Report Three recommends two reforms. First, that overhead funding be extended to agencies serving populations of 125 and above. The report proposes a minimum of $20,000 be made available to the smallest agency representing 125 children. Thereafter, the second proposal is to give agencies additional funding for every 25 children in excess of 125. Under this approach, 6 agencies would still be too small to receive any fixed amount; 8 small agencies which never before received a fixed amount of overhead funding would now do so; 23 agencies of medium size would receive funding increases; and, 56 large agencies would receive no change in their funding. In the future, Wen:De Report Three believes a minimum economy of scale for small agencies will be required to provide a basic level of child and family services (see at p. 23-24).

[181] In terms of the remoteness factor in Directive 20-1, Wen:De Report Three identified a number of weaknesses, including that the average adjustment is considered by 90% of the agencies canvassed to be too small to compensate for the actual costs of remoteness; and, that the remoteness index is usually based on accessibility to the nearest business centre, which are not necessarily able to offer specialized child welfare services. According to Wen:De Report Three, these weakness have led to some communities receiving less than their population warrants and some receiving more. As such, it proposes an across the board increase in remoteness allowances and to adjust the index from the current service centre base to a city centre base (see at pp. 25-26).

[182] Other policy recommendations from Wen:De Report Three include: that AANDC clarify that legal costs related to children in care are billable under "maintenance"; that support services related to reunifying children in care with their families be eligible "maintenance" expenses, since they are mandatory services according to provincial child welfare statutes; validation of the need for research and mechanisms to share best practices at a regional and national level; and, that AANDC clarify the "stacking provisions" in Directive 20-1 in order to make it easier for First Nations to access voluntary sector funding sources (at pp. 16-18).

[183] Finally, Wen:De Report Three found jurisdictional disputes between federal government departments and between the federal government and provinces over who should fund a particular service took about 50.25 person hours to resolve, resulting in a significant tax on the limited resources of FNCFS Agencies. As a result, it recommends the immediate implementation of Jordan's Principle for jurisdictional dispute resolution and its integration into any funding agreements between AANDC and the provinces. Jordan's Principle asserts that the government (federal or provincial) or department that first receives a request to pay for a service must pay for the service and resolve jurisdictional issues thereafter (see Wen:De Report Three at p. 16).

[184] Total costs of implementing all the reforms recommended in Wen:De Report Three were estimated at $109.3 million, including $22.9 million for new management information systems, capital costs (buildings, vehicles and office equipment) and insurance premiums; and, $86.4 million for annual funding needs (see at p. 33).

[185] The EPFA was designed in an effort to address some of the shortcomings of Directive 20-1 identified in the NPR and the Wen:De reports. However, despite Wen:De Report Three's caution that the recommended changes are interdependent and adoption in a piece meal fashion would undermine the efficacy of those proposed changes, this is in fact the approach AANDC took. This becomes clear in reviewing the Auditor General of Canada's 2008 report on the FNCFS Program and AANDC's corresponding responses, along with the rest of the evidence to follow.

2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada

[186] Following a written request from the Caring Society, the Auditor General of Canada initiated a review of AANDC's FNCFS Program and reported the findings to the House of Commons in 2008 (see Annex, ex. 17 [2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada]). The purpose of the review was to examine the "…management structure, the processes, and the federal resources used to implement the federal policy…" on reserves (2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada at p.1).

[187] The 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada echoed the findings of the NPR and Wen:De reports. Namely, that "[c]urrent funding practices do not lead to equitable funding among Aboriginal and First Nations communities" (2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada at p.2). The findings of the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada include:

- The funding formula is outdated and does not take into account any costs associated with modifications to provincial legislation or with changes in the way services are provided (see at p. 20, s. 4.51),
- AANDC has limited assurance that child welfare services delivered on reserves comply with provincial legislation and standards. Funding levels are pre-determined without regard to the services the agency is bound to provide under provincial legislation and standards (see at pp.14-15, ss. 4.30, 4.34).
- There is no definition of what is meant by reasonably comparable services or way of knowing whether the services that the program supports are in fact reasonably comparable. Furthermore, child welfare may be complicated by other social problems or health issues. Access to social and health services, aside from child welfare services, to help keep a family together differs not only on and off reserves but among First Nations as well. AANDC has not determined what other social and health services are available on reserves to support child welfare services. On-reserve child welfare services cannot be comparable if they have to deal with problems that, off reserves, would be addressed by other social and health services (see at pp. 12-13, ss.4.20, 4.25).

- There are no standards for FNCFS Agencies to provide culturally appropriate child welfare services that meet the requirements of provincial legislation. The number of FNCFS Agencies being funded is the main indicator of cultural appropriateness that AANDC uses. According to AANDC, the fact that 82 First Nations agencies have been created since the current federal policy was adopted means there are more First Nations children receiving culturally appropriate child welfare services. However, the Auditor General found that many agencies provide only a limited portion of the services while provinces continue to provide the rest. Further, AANDC does not know nationally how many of the children placed in care remain in their communities or are in First Nations foster homes or institutions (see at p. 13, ss. 4.24-4.25).

- The formula is based on the assumption that each FNCFS Agency has 6% of on-reserve children placed in care. This assumption leads to funding inequities among FNCFS Agencies because, in practice, the percentage of children that they bring into care varies widely. For example, in the five provinces covered by the report, that percentage ranged from 0 to 28% (see at p. 20, s. 4.52).

- The funding formula is not responsive to factors that can cause wide variations in operating costs, such as differences in community needs or in support services available, in the child welfare services provided to on-reserve First Nations children, and in the actual work performed by FNCFS Agencies (see at p. 20, s. 4.52).

- The formula is not adapted to small agencies. It was designed on the basis that First Nations agencies would be responsible for serving a community, or a group of communities, where at least 1,000 children live on reserve. The Auditor General found 55 of the 108 agencies funded by AANDC were small agencies serving a population of less than 1000 children living on reserve who did not always have the funding and capacity to provide the required range of child welfare services (see at p. 21, ss. 4.55-4.56).

- The shortcomings of the funding formula have been known to AANDC for years (see at p. 21, s. 4.57).

[188] As certain provinces were transitioned to the EPFA at the time of the report, the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada also comments on the new funding formula. It found that while the new funding formula provides more funds for the operations of FNCFS Agencies and offers more flexibility to allocate resources, it does not address the inequities noted under the current formula. It still assumes that a fixed percentage of First Nations children and families need child welfare services and, therefore, does not address differing needs among First Nations (see 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada at p. 23, ss. 4.63-4.64).

[189] Overall, the Auditor General of Canada was of the view that:

> the funding formula needs to become more than a means of distributing the program's budget. As currently designed and implemented, the formula does not treat First Nations or provinces in a consistent or equitable manner. One consequence of this situation is that many on-reserve children and families do not always have access to the child welfare services defined in relevant provincial legislation and available to those living off reserves.

[190] The Auditor General further noted that because the FNCFS Program's expenditures were growing faster than AANDC's overall budget, funds had to be reallocated from other programs, such as community infrastructure and housing. This means spending on housing has not kept pace with growth in population and community infrastructure has deteriorated at a faster rate. In the Auditor General's view, AANDC's budgeting approach for the FNCFS Program is not sustainable and needs to minimize the impact on other important departmental programs (see 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada at p. 25, ss. 4.72-4.73).

[191] The Auditor General of Canada made 6 recommendations to address the findings in its report. AANDC agreed with all the recommendations and indicated the actions it has taken or will take to address the recommendations (see 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada at p. 6 and Appendix). AANDC's response to the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada demonstrates its full awareness of the impacts of its FNCFS Program on First Nations children and families on reserves, including that its funding is not in line with provincial legislation and standards. Furthermore, despite the flaws identified with the new funding formula, AANDC still viewed EPFA as the answer to the problems with the FNCFS Program:

> 4.67 Recommendation. Indian and Northern Affairs Canada, in consultation with First Nations and provinces, should ensure that its new funding formula and approach to funding First Nations agencies are directly linked with provincial legislation and standards, reflect the current range of child welfare services, and take into account the varying populations and needs of First Nations communities for which it funds on-reserve child welfare services.
>
> The Department's response. Indian and Northern Affairs Canada's current approach to Child and Family Services includes reimbursement of actual costs associated with the needs of maintaining a child in care. The Department agrees that as new partnerships are entered into, based on the enhanced prevention approach, funding will be directly linked to activities that better support the needs of children in care and incorporate provincial legislation and practice standards.
> (2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada at pp. 23-24, s. 4.67)

[192] The flaws with Directive 20-1 and the EPFA would subsequently be scrutinized by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts

[193] In February 2009, the House of Commons Standing Committee on Public Accounts held a hearing on the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada. This hearing was held with officials from the Office of the Auditor General of Canada and AANDC "[g]iven the importance of the safety and well-being of all Canadian children and the disturbing findings of the audit" (Annex, ex.18 at p.1 [2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts]).

[194] The Committee noted the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada made 6 recommendations and that it fully supports those recommendations. As AANDC agreed with all the recommendations, "the Committee expects that the Department will fully implement them" (2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts at p. 3).

> What we had was a system that basically provided funds for kids in care. So what you got was a lot of kids being taken into care. And the service agencies didn't have the full suite of tools, in terms of kinship care, foster care, placement, diversion, prevention services, and so on. The new approach that we're trying to do through the new partnership agreements provides the agencies with a mix of funding for operating and maintenance--which is basically paying for the kids' needs--and for prevention services, and they have greater flexibility to move between those.
> (2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts at pp. 7-8 [footnote omitted])

[196] Assistant Deputy Minister Christine Cram's testimony before the Standing Committee echoed that of the Deputy Minister:

> We currently have two formulas in operation. We have a formula for those provinces where we haven't moved to the new model. Under that formula, we reimburse all charges for kids who are actually in care, and that's why the costs have gone up so dramatically over time. There were comments made about the fact that under the old formula there wasn't funding provided to be able to permit agencies to provide prevention services. That's a fair criticism of the old formula. Under the new formula, as the deputy was mentioning, we have three categories in the funding formula. We have operations, prevention, and maintenance. So those are each determined on a different basis.

[197] With regard to the continued application of Directive 20-1 in many provinces and in the Yukon, the Standing Committee expressed concern:

> The Committee is quite concerned that the majority of First Nations children on reserves continue to live under a funding regime which numerous studies have found is not working and should be changed. According to the Joint National Policy Review, "The funding formula inherent in Directive 20-1 is not flexible and is outdated." The 2005 Wen:de report, which undertook a comprehensive review of funding formulae to support First Nations child and family service agencies, found that the current funding formula drastically underfunds primary, secondary and tertiary child maltreatment intervention services, including least disruptive measures. The report writes, "The lack of early intervention services contributes to the large numbers of First Nations children entering care and staying in care." An evaluation prepared in 2007 by INAC's Departmental Audit and Evaluation Branch recommended that INAC, "correct the weaknesses in the First Nations Child and Family Service Program's funding formula." The OAG concluded, "As currently designed and implemented, the formula does not treat First Nations or provinces in a consistent or equitable manner. One consequence of this situation is that many on-reserve children and families do not always have access to the child welfare services defined in relevant provincial legislation and available to those living off reserves."
> Yet, this funding formula continues. As the Auditor General puts it, "Quite frankly, one has to ask why a program goes on for 20 years, the world changes around it, and yet the formula stays the same, preventative services aren't funded, and all these children are being put into care."
>
> While the Committee appreciates the efforts the Department is making to develop new agreements based on the enhanced prevention model, the Committee completely fails to understand why the old funding formula is still in place. Moving to new agreements should in no way preclude making improvements to the existing formula, especially as it may take years to develop agreements with the provinces. In the meantime, many First Nations children are taken into care when other options are available. This is unacceptable and clearly inequitable.
> (2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts at pp. 9-10 [footnotes omitted])

[198] With regard to the new EPFA funding formula, the Standing Committee agreed with the Auditor General's comments regarding the fact that this new formula does not address the inequities of Directive 20-1 (i.e. the assumptions built into the formula regarding the percentage of first nations children and families in need of care):

> The Committee could not agree more, especially as the Department has known about this problem in the old formula yet has repeated it in the new formula. The Committee is very disturbed that the Department would take a bureaucratic approach to funding agencies, rather than making efforts to provide funding where it is needed. The result of this approach is that communities that need funding the most, that is, where more than six percent of the children are in care, will continue to be underfunded and will not be able to provide their children the services they need. The Committee strongly believes that INAC needs to develop a funding formula that is flexible enough to provide funding based on need, rather than a fixed percentage.

[199] Finally, with regard to the Auditor General's finding that AANDC has not analyzed and compared the child welfare services available on reserves with those in neighbouring communities off reserve, the Standing Committee made the following observations:

> Nonetheless, it should be possible to compare the level of funding provided to First Nations child and family services agencies to similar provincial agencies, and given their unique and challenging circumstances, it would be reasonable to expect First Nations agencies to receive a higher level of funding. Yet, when asked how the funding for First Nations child and family service agencies compares to agencies for non-natives, the Assistant Deputy Minister said, "I'm sorry, but we don't know the answer." The same question was put to the Deputy Minister and he replied, "Our accountability is for the services delivered by those agencies to the extent that we fund them."
> The Committee finds these responses quite disappointing. The Deputy Minister's response was unsatisfactory because the issue under discussion is the extent to which the agencies are funded. Also, to not know how the funding compares to provincial agencies makes the Committee wonder how the level of funding is determined, and how the Department can be assured that it is treating First Nations children equitably.
>
> As the policy requires First Nations child welfare services to be comparable with services provided off reserves and the Committee believes that First Nations children should be treated equitably, the Committee > believes that INAC must have comprehensive information about the funding level provided to provincial child welfare agencies and compare that to the funding of First Nations agencies. This does not mean that INAC should adopt provincial funding formulae for First Nations agencies as the needs for First Nations agencies are unique and often greater. Nonetheless, at the very least, INAC should be able to compare funding.

[200] After hearing from the officials of the Office of the Auditor General of Canada and AANDC, including Sheila Fraser, the Auditor General of Canada, Michael Wernick, Deputy Minister of AANDC, and Christine Cram, Assistant Deputy Minister of AANDC, the Standing Committee on Public Accounts made 7 recommendations of its own. Those recommendations include: that AANDC provide a detailed action plan to the Public Accounts Committee on the implementation of the recommendations arising out the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada; that AANDC conduct a comprehensive comparison of its funding under the FNCFS Program to provincial funding of similar agencies; that AANDC immediately modify Directive 20-1 to allow for the funding of enhanced prevention services; that AANDC ensure its funding formula is based upon need rather than an assumed fixed percentage of children in care; that AANDC determine the full costs of meeting all of its policy requirements and develop a funding model to meet those requirements; and, that AANDC develop measures and collect information based on the best interests of children for the results and outcomes of its FNCFS Program (see 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts at pp. 4-12).

[201] In response to the Standing Committee's report, presented to the House of Commons on August 19, 2009, AANDC generally accepted the recommendations, although with some nuances (see Annex, ex. 19 [AANDC's Response to the 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts]). For example, AANDC generally responded:

> The Standing Committee on Public Accounts' recommendations speak to the link between provincial comparability, revising Directive 20-1, moving to a needs based formula and to determining the full costs of the FNCFS Program nationally. This suggests INAC should undertake a one-time simultaneous reform of the program in all provinces. INAC is in fact > undertaking similar steps towards reform, however, it is being done province-by-province. Rather than taking a one-size-fits all approach that would overlook community level needs and compromise partnerships and accountability, INAC is addressing provincial comparability, including a needs component in the formula and finalizing the process with a full costing analysis for each jurisdiction. All of this is done at tripartite tables ensuring buy-in by all partners, reasonable comparability with the respective province and sound accountability aimed at achieving positive outcomes for children and their families. As well, INAC is committing to review Directive 20-1.

> (AANDC's Response to the 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts at Introduction)

[202] With regard to the recommendation that AANDC conduct a comprehensive comparison of its funding to provincial funding, AANDC responded:

> INAC agrees with this recommendation on the understanding that a comparative analysis can only be provided with the limited data we have access to and on a phased basis. This review will require a substantial amount of time and work with the provinces and First Nations. The information available in provincial annual reports is general and the funding provided under their children's services often includes programs beyond child and family services. Overall, these provincial reports do not contain the level of detail required to make the kind of comprehensive comparison expected by the Committee. Relationships must be strengthened with provincial partners as they are key in providing INAC with the necessary information concerning the funding of their child welfare programs. This is what INAC is doing as it proceeds with the Enhanced Prevention Focused Approach. Provinces must also agree to allow INAC to make this information available to the public.
> It should also be noted that due to the complexity of child welfare service delivery across the country, comparability between FNCFS agencies and provincial child welfare providers on-reserve, is challenging. Specifically, child welfare services in the provinces are delivered in a variety of ways. The services can vary by jurisdiction based on need; be provided directly by the province; or by provincially delegated authorities or regional/districts. A province can also fund agencies to deliver the services and/or contract third parties.
> Therefore, INAC cannot commit to conducting such a comprehensive review nor can it be done for all jurisdictions by the timelines required by the Committee. INAC would be able to provide a basic comparison of jurisdictions that are currently under the Enhanced Prevention Focused Approach and where INAC has basic information on salary rates and > caseload ratios. INAC expects to complete this first phase by or before December 31, 2009.

> As INAC moves forward on transitioning other jurisdictions and as relationships are built with each province at the tripartite tables, INAC will be in a better position to conduct a comparison of funding between FNCFS agencies and provincial systems. This phase will consist of the provinces with whom INAC has not yet developed or completed tripartite accountability frameworks. This phase is expected to be completed by 2012.
> (AANDC's Response to the 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts at Recommendation 2 – Provincial Comparison)

[203] In response to the recommendation that AANDC revise the funding formula to provide funding based on need, AANDC responded:

> It is important to note that the 6% average number of children in care calculation is one of many factors used only to model operations funding which includes the number of protection workers. This is then translated into a portion of the operations funding that agency receives. This 6% number was arrived at through discussions with First Nations Agency Directors and provincial representatives, and was thought to be fairly representative of the overall needs of the communities. Under the Enhanced Prevention Focused Approach, FNCFS agencies have the flexibility to shift funds from one stream to another in order to meet the specific needs of the community. This costing model provides all FNCFS agencies under the new approach with the necessary resources to offer a greater range of child and family services.
> Through discussions with provincial and First Nations partners, it is clear that they preferred to create a costing model that would provide recipients stable funding for operations. The majority of partners indicated they would not be supportive of a model that generated more resources for Recipients based upon a higher percentage of children in care. Also, this model ensures that FNCFS agencies supporting communities with lower populations are provided with sufficient funding to operate both prevention and protection programs. Without the fixed percentage formula used to calculate and fund Operations, agencies with a very low percentage of children in care would not have the necessary resources to operate. Moreover, if the operations budget were based upon need rather than a fixed percentage, the agencies could find themselves with widely fluctuating operations budgets year to year which would hamper their ability to plan and provide services. The new costing models provide a stable operating and prevention budget that does not rely on the number of children in care as one of its determinants.

> (AANDC's Response to the 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts at Recommendation 5 – Funding Formula based on Need)

[204] AANDC's response to the recommendations of the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada and the 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts would be revisited in 2011 by the Auditor General.

2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada

[205] In 2011, the Auditor General of Canada assessed AANDC's progress in implementing the recommendations from the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada and the 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts (see Annex, ex. 20 [2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada]).

[206] With regard to comparability of services, the Auditor General noted that while AANDC had agreed to define what is meant by services that are reasonably comparable, it had not done so. The Auditor General stated that "[u]ntil it does, it is unclear what is the service standard for which the Department is providing funding and what level of services First Nations communities can eventually expect to receive" (see 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada at pp. 23-24, s. 4.49). In addition, the Auditor General found AANDC had not conducted a review of social services available in the provinces to assess whether the services provided to children on reserve are the same as what is available to children off reserve (see 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada at p. 24, s. 4.49).

[207] Concerning the new EPFA funding formula, the Auditor General reiterated its previous finding that it did not address all of the funding disparities that were noted in the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada. While the Auditor General acknowledged that the EPFA enables additional services beyond those offered by Directive 20-1, it noted that:

> without having defined what is meant by comparability, the Department has been unable to demonstrate that its new Enhanced Prevention Focused Approach provides services to children and families living on reserves that are reasonably comparable to provincial services.

[208] With respect to the recommendation that AANDC determine the full costs of meeting the policy requirements of the FNCFS Program, the Department agreed to regularly update the estimated cost of delivering the program with the new EPFA funding approach on a province-by-province basis and to periodically review the program budget. The Auditor General reported that AANDC had identified the costs it would have to pay for services in each province before transitioning to EPFA. AANDC determined that it needed an increase of between 50 and 100% in its funding for operations and prevention services in each of the provinces that transitioned to EPFA. With all cost components taken into consideration, on average, EPFA led to an increase of over 40% in the cost of the FNCFS Program in the participating provinces (see 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada at pp. 24-25, ss. 4.53-4.54). In this regard, the Auditor General noted the FNCFS Program budget has increased by 32% since the 2005-2006 fiscal year, partly reflecting the increased funding levels needed to implement EPFA (see 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada at p. 25, s. 4.55).

[209] On the comprehensive comparison of funding to FNCFS Agencies with provincial funding to similar agencies requested by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, the Auditor General reported that AANDC had compared some elements of child and family services programs on and off reserve, such as social workers' salaries and benefits in preparation for framework negotiations with the provinces. However, AANDC did not provide any information about social workers' caseloads, stating that it is not public information. In addition, AANDC asserted certain services provided by the provinces, such as services related to health issues and youth justice, were not within AANDC's mandate (see 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada at p. 25, ss. 4.56- 4.57).

[210] In general, the Auditor General's review of programs for First Nations on reserves, including its follow-up on the status of AANDC's progress in addressing some of the recommendations from the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada, was as follows:

> Despite the federal government's many efforts to implement our recommendations and improve its First Nations programs, we have seen a > lack of progress in improving the lives and well-being of people living on reserves. Services available on reserves are often not comparable to those provided off reserves by provinces and municipalities. Conditions on reserves have remained poor. Change is needed if First Nations are to experience more meaningful outcomes from the services they receive. We recognize that the issues are complex and that solutions will require concerted efforts of the federal government and First Nations, in collaboration with provincial governments and other parties.

> We believe that there have been structural impediments to improvements in living conditions on First Nations reserves. In our opinion, real improvement will depend on clarity about service levels, a legislative base for programs, commensurate statutory funding instead of reliance on policy and contribution agreements, and organizations that support service delivery by First Nations. All four are needed before conditions on reserves will approach those existing elsewhere across Canada. There needs to be stronger emphasis on achieving results.
>
> We recognize that the federal government cannot put all of these structural changes in place by itself since they would fundamentally alter its relationship with First Nations. For this reason, First Nations themselves would have to play an important role in bringing about the changes. They would have to become actively engaged in developing service standards and determining how the standards will be monitored and enforced. They would have to fully participate in the development of legislative reforms. First Nations would also have to co-lead discussions on identifying credible funding mechanisms that are administratively workable and that ensure accountable governance within their communities. First Nations would have to play an active role in the development and administration of new organizations to support the local delivery of services to their communities.
> Addressing these structural impediments will be a challenge. The federal government and First Nations will have to work together and decide how they will deal with numerous obstacles that surely lie ahead. Unless they rise to this challenge, however, living conditions may continue to be poorer on First Nations reserves than elsewhere in Canada for generations to come.

2012 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts

[211] In February 2012, the Standing Committee on Public Accounts issued a report following the 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada (see Annex, ex. 21 [2012 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts]).

[212] Deputy Minister of AANDC, Michael Wernick, testified before the Committee and "…agreed, without reservation, with the OAG's diagnosis of the problem…" (2012 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts at p. 3). Mr. Wernick stated to the Committee:

> One of the really important parts of the Auditor General's report is that it shows there are four missing conditions. The combination of those is what's likely to result in an enduring change. You could pick any one of them, such as legislation without funding, or funding without legislation, and so on. They would have some results, but they would probably, in our view, be temporary. If you want enduring, structural changes, it's the combination of these tools." He also said, "With all due respect, I want to send the message that, if Parliament demands better results, it has to provide us with better tools.

[213] With specific regard to the FNCFS Program, the Deputy Minister stated:

> We have fixed the funding formula. We make sure resources are available for prevention services. And we've put in place these kinds of tripartite agreements, because these are creatures of the provincial child protection statutes. In six of the provinces, I think it is, we have $100 million or more in funding over several budgets. They go at the pace at which we can conclude agreements with the provinces--I can certainly provide the list--but we're now covering about 68% of first nations kids with this prevention approach.

[214] The Standing Committee concluded its report with the following statements:

> The Committee notes that the government is taking a number of concrete actions to improve conditions for First Nations on reserves, and the Deputy Minister of AANDC expressed his commitment to address the structural impediments identified by the OAG. Like the Deputy Minister, the Committee is optimistic that progress can be made, but it will require significant structural reforms and sustained management attention. The Committee believes that AANDC, in coordination with other departments, needs to develop and commit to a plan of action to take the necessary steps, and the Committee intends to monitor the government's progress to > ensure that First Nations on reserves experience meaningful improvements in their social and economic conditions.

[215] The then Minister of AANDC, Mr. John Duncan, responded to the 2012 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts (see Annex, ex. 22 [AANDC's Response to the 2012 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts]). Of note, Minister Duncan acknowledged the following:

> I would also like to acknowledge the work of the Office of the Auditor General in providing Parliament, the Government of Canada, and Canadians with valuable insights into Canada's approach to program delivery for First Nations on reserves. I consider the six-page preface to Chapter 4 of the 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada to be an important roadmap for Parliament in moving forward on First Nation issues.
>
> I agree that many of the problems faced by First Nations are due to the structural impediments identified – the lack of clarity about service levels, lack of a legislative base, lack of an appropriate funding mechanism, and a lack of organizations to support local service delivery.
>
>
> Through the Enhanced Prevention Focused Approach for First Nations Child and Family Services clarity about service levels and comparability of services and funding levels have been addressed at tripartite tables with the six provinces that have transitioned to the new approach.
>
> The Office of the Auditor General observed that there are challenges associated with the use of contribution agreements to fund programs and services for First Nations. For instance, agreements may not always focus on service standards or the results to be achieved; agreements must be renewed yearly and it is often unclear who is accountable to First Nations members for achieving improved outcomes. In addition, contribution agreements involve a significant reporting burden, and communities often have to use scarce administrative resources to respond to the numerous reporting requirements stipulated in their contribution agreements.

> The Government of Canada recognizes that reliance on annual funding agreements and multiple accountabilities when funding is received from multiple sources can impede the provision of timely services and can limit the ability of First Nations to implement longer term development plans.
> To address these concerns, Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada is implementing a risk-based approach to streamlining funding agreements, and reporting requirements. The General Assessment tool supports increased flexibility by assessing the capacity of recipients to access a wider range of funding approaches, including multi-year funding agreements. In addition, a pilot initiative with 11 First Nations communities is currently being implemented using a new approach to reporting which is increasing transparency and accountability at the community level by using the First Nations website as a reporting tool and addressing capacity issues created by the reporting burden.
> (AANDC's Response to the 2012 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts)

[216] The NPR, Wen:De reports and the Auditor General and the Standing Committee reports all have identified shortcomings in the funding and structure of the FNCFS Program. This was further demonstrated in other evidence presented to the Tribunal and to which the Panel will return to below. First, however, we will outline the evidence advanced with regard to the funding of child and family services under the 1965 Agreement in Ontario, along with the other provincial agreements in Alberta and British Columbia.

c. 1965 Agreement in Ontario

[217] There is also evidence indicating shortcomings in the funding and structure of the 1965 Agreement in Ontario.

[218] In 1965, the federal government entered into an agreement with the Province of Ontario to enable social services, including child and family services, to be extended to First Nations communities on reserve. Around the same time, child welfare authorities in Ontario began the large-scale removal of Aboriginal children from their homes and communities, commonly referred to as part of the "Sixties Scoop". Ms. Theresa Stevens, Executive Director for Anishinaabe Abinoojii Family Services in Kenora, Ontario, described how buses would drive into communities and take all the children away (see Transcript Vol. 25 at pp. 28-30). As will be explained in more detail below, the collective trauma experienced by many First Nations in Ontario as a result of the Sixties Scoop informs the climate for the provision of child and family services in the province. The Panel acknowledges the suffering of Aboriginal children, families and communities as a result of the Sixties Scoop.

[219] The 1965 Agreement is a cost-sharing agreement where Ontario provides or pays for eligible services up front and invoices Canada for a share of the costs of those services pursuant to a cost-sharing formula. Eligible services for cost sharing under the 1965 Agreement are described in its Schedules. Mr. Phil Digby, Manager of Social Programs at AANDC's Ontario Regional Office, testified at the hearing and explained how the 1965 Agreement works. At the beginning of each fiscal year, Ontario provides AANDC with a cash flow forecast. Once approved, AANDC provides Ontario with a one-month cash advance, followed by monthly instalments. There is a 10% holdback on the payments, which is paid out (with any adjustments) at the end of the year after an audit. There is no overall cap on expenditures under the 1965 Agreement.

[220] The cost-sharing formula is set out at clause 3 of the 1965 Agreement and is based on two elements: the "per capita cost of the Financial Assistance Component of the Aggregate Ontario Welfare Program provided to persons other than Indians with Reserve Status in Ontario"; and, the "per capita cost of the Financial Assistance Component of the Aggregate Ontario Welfare Program provided to Indians with Reserve Status in Ontario".

[221] According to Mr. Digby, social assistance is the area where there was the best data that gave a good proxy for the proportionate share of costs and relative share of costs in First Nations communities vis-à-vis the rest of Ontario. As of 2011-12 the average cost of providing social assistance to persons living off reserve was approximately $200. For First Nations living on reserve it was about $1,200. AANDC's share of the costs is calculated by taking 50% of the average cost of providing social assistance to persons living off reserve (200 x 0.50 = 100) and dividing it by the average cost of providing social assistance to persons living on reserve (100/1200 = 0.0833); subtracting the average cost of providing social assistance to persons living off reserve from the average cost of providing social assistance to persons living on reserve (1200 – 200 = 1000) and dividing that amount by the average cost of providing social assistance to persons living on reserve (1000/1200 = 0.8333); and then, adding those two numbers together to arrive at the cost-sharing ratio (0.0833 + 0.8333 = 0.9166). Pursuant to these numbers, AANDC paid approximately 92% of the eligible costs under the 1965 Agreement in 2011-12. According to Mr. Digby, the 1965 Agreement cost-sharing formula recognizes the higher per capita costs of providing social assistance to First Nations on reserves and AANDC's agreement to take the financial responsibility for these additional costs (see testimony of P. Digby, Transcript Vol. 59 at pp. 24-28).

[222] There are two mechanisms used by the province of Ontario to provide child welfare services on reserve: (i) child welfare societies, including provincial child welfare agencies and FNCFS Agencies; and (ii) service contracts for prevention services. There are seven fully-mandated FNCFS Agencies in Ontario and they are funded according to the same funding model as provincial child welfare agencies in Ontario. There are also six pre-mandated FNCFS Agencies who do not have a full protection mandate and are in the process of developing their capacity to become fully-mandated FNCFS Agencies. There are also approximately 25 First Nations reserves that receive prevention services via service contract.

[223] The 1965 Agreement has never undergone a formal review by AANDC. The sections of the agreement dealing with child and family services have not been updated since 1981, and the Schedules to the agreement have not been updated since 1998. This is significant given in 1984 Ontario implemented the Child and Family Services Act, which incorporated elements from other pieces of legislation (for example, youth justice and mental health) to address the child and family services needs of Ontarians. At that time, the Government of Canada took the position that AANDC did not have the mandate or resources to start funding justice and health programs, as those types of programs would fall under a different department (see testimony of P. Digby, Transcript Vol. 59 at p. 69).

[224] In 2000, the NPR recommended a tripartite review be done of the 1965 Agreement (see at pp. 18 and 121). The 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada also noted that there are provisions in the 1965 Agreement to keep it up-to-date and that they could be used to ensure both the 1965 Agreement and the services that the federal government pays for are current.

[225] The fact that the 1965 Agreement has not been kept up-to-date with Ontario's Child and Families Services Act was highlighted by Mr. Digby in a 2007 discussion paper (see Annex, ex. 23 [1965 Agreement Overview]). The Panel finds the 1965 Agreement Overview document to be relevant and reliable, especially given Mr. Digby's involvement in its authorship. According to the 1965 Agreement Overview discussion paper, at page 4, issues raised by various stakeholders with regard to the 1965 Agreement and its implementation include:

> Concern that the agreement is bilateral, not tripartite, since First Nations were not asked to be signatories in 1965. While clause 2.2 of the 1965 Agreement indicates that bands are to signify concurrence to the extension of provincial welfare programs, this does not reflect the type of intergovernmental relationship sought by many First Nations.
> First Nations and the provincial government have, from time to time, expressed interest in INAC cost-sharing additional provincial social service programs to be extended on reserve. INAC has generally not had the resources to 'open up' new areas for cost-sharing. […] There has been no update to the agreement schedule with regard to cost-sharing child welfare. As several programs within the provincial Child and Family Services Act (CFSA) fall outside of INAC's mandate, the department is not in a position to 'open up' discussion on cost-sharing the full CFSA.

[226] In 2011, the Commission to Promote Sustainable Child Welfare (the CPSCW) prepared a discussion paper regarding Aboriginal child welfare in Ontario (see Annex, ex. 24 [CPSCW Discussion Paper]). The CPSCW was created by the Minister of Children and Youth Services in Ontario to develop and implement solutions to ensure the sustainability of child welfare. It reports to the Minister thereon. In light of this public mandate, the Panel finds the discussion paper relevant and reliable to the issue of the provision of child and family services to First Nations on reserve in Ontario.

[227] The CPSCW Discussion Paper, at page 4, begins by noting the impact of history on many Aboriginal communities:

> The combination of colonization, residential schools, the Sixties Scoop, and other factors have undermined Aboriginal cultures, eroded parenting capacity, and challenged economic self-sufficiency. Many Aboriginal people live in communities that experience high levels of poverty, alcohol and substance abuse, suicides, incarceration rates, unemployment rates, and other social problems. Aboriginal children are disproportionately represented in the child welfare system and in the youth justice system. Suicide rates for Aboriginal children and youth surpass those of non-Aboriginals by approximately five times. Aboriginal youth are 9 times more likely to be pregnant before age 18, far less likely to complete high school, far more likely to live in poverty, and far more likely to suffer from emotional disorders and addictions.

[228] Despite these specific risk factors for Aboriginal peoples, the CPSCW Discussion Paper notes that many provincial child welfare agencies give little attention to the requirements for providing services to Aboriginal children set out in Ontario's Child and Families Services Act (see at p. 26). Specifically, the discussion paper points to sections 213 and 213.1 of the Child and Families Services Act whereby a society or agency that provides services with respect to First Nations children must regularly consult with the child's band or community, usually through a Band Representative, about the provision of the services, including the apprehension of children and the placement of children in care; the provision of family support services; and, the preparation of plans for the care of children.

[229] According to the CPSCW Discussion Paper, Band Representatives can be crucial and tend to fulfill the following functions: serving as the main liaison between a Band and Children's Aid Societies [CASs]; providing cultural training and advice to CASs; monitoring Temporary Care Agreements and Voluntary Service Agreements with CASs; securing access to legal resources; attending and participating in court proceedings; ensuring that the cultural needs of a child are being addressed by the CAS; and, participating in the development of a child's plan of care (see at p. 26).

[230] The CPSCW Discussion Paper indicates that, in the past, First Nations were funded on a claims basis by the federal government to hire a Band Representative. However, since 2003, that funding was discontinued. Therefore, some First Nations divert resources from prevention services to cover the cost of a Band Representative, while others simply do not have one (see CPSCW Discussion Paper at p. 26).

[231] Providing child welfare services in remote and isolated Northern Ontario communities was also identified by the CPSCW Discussion Paper as a challenge for CASs. Those challenges include the added time and expense to travel to the communities they serve, where some communities do not have year round road access and where flying-in can be the only option for accessing a community. In fact, one agency was required to make up to 80 flights in a day.

[232] Another challenge for remote and isolated communities is recruiting and retaining staff, especially qualified staff from the community. The legacy of the Sixties Scoop and the association of CASs with the removal of children from the community have caused some First Nations community members to resent or resist CAS workers and can create a hostile working environment.

[233] Other challenges for remote and isolated communities are a lack of suitable housing, which makes it difficult to hire staff from outside the community and to find suitable foster homes; limited access to court; and, the lack of other health and social programs, which impacts the performance and quality of child and family services (see CPSCW Discussion Paper at pp. 28-29). On this last point, the CPSCW Discussion Paper emphasizes that "[p]romoting positive outcomes for children, families and communities, requires a full range of services related to the health, social, and economic conditions of the community: child welfare services alone are not nearly enough" (at p. 29).

[234] The CPSCW Discussion Paper also notes that there are many distinct differences between designated Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal CASs: they serve significantly larger and less inhabited geographic areas with lower child and youth populations, they have significantly larger case volumes per thousand, they serve more of their children and youth in care versus in their own homes, and they have smaller total expenditures, but significantly higher expenditures per capita and higher expenditures per case (see CPSCW Discussion Paper at p. 29).

[235] Finally, in discussing the federal-provincial dynamics of providing child and family services on reserve, the CPSCW Discussion Paper comments that instead of working collaboratively towards providing effective service delivery to Aboriginal peoples, the federal government has devolved some of its responsibilities for Aboriginal peoples to the provincial governments, which contributes to some confusion over ultimate jurisdiction (see CPSCW Discussion Paper at pp. 34-35).

[236] On this last point, in 2007 the Ontario Ministry of Children and Youth Services wrote to AANDC expressing their concern over AANDC's decision to no longer provide funding for Band Representatives: "with the withdrawal of federal funding, many First Nations do not have the financial resources required to participate in planning for Indian and native children involved with a children's aid society or to take part in child protection legal proceedings" (Annex, ex. 25 at p. 2).

> The paramount purpose of the CFSA is to "promote the best interests, protection and well-being of children." The band representative function supports not only the purpose of the Act but also the other important purposes and provisions to which the Act pertains. A lack of sufficient capacity within First Nation communities limits their ability to respond effectively and in accordance with legislated times frames for action. The withdrawal of [INAC's] funding for band representation functions has eroded First Nations' ability to participate as intended in the CFSA.

[238] Despite the discordance between Ontario's Child and Families Services Act and AANDC's policy to no longer fund Band Representatives, Minister Duncan indicated that "it falls within the responsibilities of First Nation governments to determine their level of engagement in child welfare matters" and "we do not foresee the Government of Canada providing funding support in this area" (Annex, ex. 27 at p.1).

[239] Ambiguity surrounding jurisdiction for the provision of mental health services to First Nations youth has also been a cause for concern. When the Anishinaabe Abinoojii Family Services agency sought a mandate to provide children's mental health services, an AANDC employee prepared a document to provide information to the Regional Director General and Assistant Regional Directors General on the issue (see Annex, ex. 28 [Abinoojii Mental Health Services Mandate]). The Executive Director for Anishinaabe Abinoojii Family Services, Ms. Stevens, testified as to the content of the document (see Transcript Vol. 25 at pp. 174-178).

[240] According to the Abinoojii Mental Health Services Mandate document, there are waiting lists for First Nations children served by the Abinoojii Family Services agency who require mental health services. The document adds that while there is some cooperation between mental health service organizations and the Abinoojii agency to manage these waiting lists, there is also a need for more resources and culturally appropriate assessment tools and counsellors. The Ministry of Children and Youth Services has a Mental Health Policy for Children and Youth and has some resources for mental health counselling, but the needs outstrip the funding (see Abinoojii Mental Health Services Mandate at pp. 1-2).

[241] In considering the request, the Abinoojii Mental Health Services Mandate document states that AANDC does not have a mandate for mental health services and that these expenditures are not eligible under the 1965 Agreement. Rather, Health Canada has the federal mandate on mental health and provides funding through a number of programs. However, those programs focus more on prevention and mostly deal with adult issues. Health Canada programs do not specifically deal with children in care and do not cover mental health counselling (see Abinoojii Mental Health Services Mandate at p. 2).

[242] In a roundtable meeting between Abinoojii Family Services agency, AANDC, Health Canada and the Ministry of Children and Youth Services for Ontario, Health Canada recognized a need to look at the whole system as services/programs tend to work in silos and raised the possibility of re-prioritizing resources or seeking additional funding. AANDC indicated that the province is the lead on child welfare and Health Canada is the lead on health issues at the federal level, but that it supports the work on examining existing programs, outlining gaps and working together to ensure First Nations receive services that are comparable and culturally appropriate (see Abinoojii Mental Health Services Mandate at p. 2).

[243] In 2012, the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies (the OACAS) produced a report regarding trends in child welfare in Ontario, including in Aboriginal communities (see Annex, ex. 29 [Child Welfare Report]). The OACAS is an advocacy group representing the interests of 45 CASs member organizations. Governed by a voluntary board of directors, OACAS consults with and advises the provincial government on issues of legislation, regulation, policy, standards and review mechanisms. It promotes and is dedicated to achieving the best outcomes for children and families (see Child Welfare Report at p. 2). Given the OACAS's mandate and focus, the Panel finds its report relevant and reliable.

[244] According to the Child Welfare Report, the current funding model does not reflect the needs of Aboriginal communities and agencies for several reasons including: insufficient resources for services, where they tend to be crisis driven; shortage of funding for administrative requirements; lack of funding to establish infrastructure necessary to deliver statutory child protection services, while operating within the extraordinary infrastructure deficits of many of the communities they serve; and, insufficient funds to retain qualified staff to deliver culturally appropriate services (at p. 7). Among other things, at page 7 of the Child Welfare Report, the OACAS asked the Ontario government to:

> Establish an Aboriginal child welfare funding model and adequate funding to support culturally appropriate programs that encompass the unique experiences of diverse Aboriginal populations – on-reserve, off-reserve, remote, rural, and urban. Invest in capacity building to enable the proper recruitment, training and retention of child welfare professionals in emerging Aboriginal Children's Aid Societies.

[245] In terms of infrastructure and capacity building, the 1965 Agreement has not provided for the cost-sharing of capital expenditures since 1975 (see testimony of P. Digby, Transcript Vol. 59 at p. 93). Ms. Stevens explained the impact of this on her organization: many high-risk children are sent outside the community to receive services because there is no treatment centre in the community. Abinoojii Family Services spends approximately 2 to 3 million a year sending children outside their community. According to Ms. Stevens, there are not enough resources to build a treatment centre or develop programs to assist these high-risk children because those funds are expended on meeting the current needs of those children (see Transcript Vol. 25 at p. 32).

[246] Again, the above evidence on the 1965 Agreement identifies shortcomings in AANDC's approach to the provision of child and family services on First Nations reserves in Ontario. In the provision of child and family services, the Panel finds the situation in Ontario falls short of the objective of the 1965 Agreement"…to make available to the Indians in the Province the full range of provincial welfare programs".

d. Other provincial/territorial agreements

[247] As mentioned above, two other provinces have agreements with AANDC for the provision of child and family services on reserve: Alberta and British Columbia. While in the Yukon, the Yukon Funding Agreement applies.

[248] As mentioned above, the Yukon Funding Agreement applies to all First Nations children and families ordinarily resident in the Territory. Schedule "DIAND-3" of the Yukon Funding Agreement provides for the application of Directive 20-1 to the funding of child and family services to those First Nations children and families.

[249] In Alberta and British Columbia, AANDC reimburses the provinces for the delivery of child and family services to certain First Nations communities on reserve where there are no FNCFS Agencies. In Alberta, six First Nations communities are served by the Alberta Reform Agreement for child and family services. In British Columbia, seventy-two First Nation communities receive services under the BC Service Agreement.

[250] Pursuant to the Alberta Reform Agreement, AANDC reimburses Alberta for the costs of providing various social services, including child welfare services, to certain First Nations reserves in the province. For those child welfare services, funding is provided at the beginning of the fiscal year based on a funding formula using year-end costs of the preceding fiscal year. Adjustments are made based on actual expenditures during the fiscal year (see Alberta Reform Agreement at Schedule A, s. 1).

[251] In British Columbia, the BC MOU was in place from 1996 to 2012. Under the BC MOU, AANDC reimbursed the province for eligible maintenance expenses based on a per diem formula which accounted for the province's administration, supervision and maintenance costs (see BC MOU at s. 5.0; and Appendix B and D). The per diem rates could be adjusted annually and the province could receive an adjustment to the previous year's per diem rates based on actual expenditures (see BC MOU at Appendix C). Those adjustments included rate increases based on inflation and increased emphasis on prevention services. For the fiscal year 2006/2007, the recalculation of per diem rates resulted in an invoice to AANDC for over $5 million dollars (see Annex, ex. 30).

[252] In 2012, the BC MOU was replaced by the BC Service Agreement. The BC Service Agreement now provides for reimbursement of maintenance expenses based on actual expenditures. It also provides funding to the province for operations expenses based on a costing model agreed to between the province and AANDC (see BC Service Agreement at s. 7; and Appendix A). For fiscal year 2012-2013, operations funding amounted to $15 million.

[253] The Alberta Reform Agreement, the BC MOU and the BC Service Agreement provide reimbursement for actual eligible operating and administrative expenditures, including retroactive adjustments for inflation and increases for changes in programming. This is quite different from FNCFS Agencies in those provinces, including under the EPFA in Alberta, where there is no such adjustments for those types of increases in costs (see testimony of C. Schimanke, Transcript Vol. 62 at pp. 53-54). As expressed in the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada at page 19, these adjustments and reimbursements for actuals are linked directly to provincial child welfare legislation:

> 4.49 INAC funds some provinces for delivering child welfare services directly where First Nations do not. INAC has agreements with three of the five provinces we covered on how they will be funded to provide child welfare services on reserves. We found that in these provinces, INAC reimburses all or an agreed-on share of their operating and administrative costs of delivering child welfare services directly to First Nations and of the costs of children placed in care. […]

> 4.50 INAC funding to cover the costs of operating and administering First Nations agencies is established through a formula. Although the program requires First Nations agencies to meet applicable provincial legislation, we found that INAC's funding formula is not linked to this requirement. The main element of the formula is the number of children aged from 0 to 18 who are ordinarily resident on the reserve or reserves being served by a First Nations agency. […]

iii. AANDC's position on the evidence [255] AANDC argues the evidence above is not sufficient to establish adverse treatment in the provision of funding for First Nations child and family services, including that there is a lack of specific examples to support the allegation of a denial of such services. In sum, it claims the reports and evidence regarding the FNCFS Program above should be given little weight, that the choices of FNCFS Agencies in administering their budgets should be considered in evaluating any adverse impacts, along with any additional funding they receive beyond Directive 20-1 or the EPFA, that comparing the federal and provincial/territorial funding systems is not a valid comparison under the CHRA, and, even if it were, such comparative evidence is lacking in this case. Each argument is addressed below.

a. The relevance and reliability of the studies on the FNCFS Program

[256] AANDC views the various studies of the FNCFS Program outlined above as having little weight. It questions the comprehensiveness of the studies, noting the experience of a few agencies does not establish differential treatment.

[257] The Panel finds the NPR and Wen:De reports to be highly relevant and reliable evidence in this case. They are studies of the FNCFS Program commissioned jointly by AANDC and the AFN. They employed a rigorous methodology, in depth analysis of Directive 20-1, and consultations with various stakeholders. The Panel accepts the findings in these reports. There is no indication that AANDC questioned the findings of these reports prior to this Complaint. On the contrary, there are indications that AANDC, in fact, relied on these reports in amending the FNCFS Program.

[258] In its October 2006 Fact Sheet (see Annex, ex. 10), AANDC acknowledged the impacts and findings of the Wen:De reports, along with the NPR, and committed to refocusing the FNCFS Program to improve outcomes for First Nations children and families on reserve:

> Currently, Program funding is largely based on protection services, which encourage Agencies to remove First Nation children from their parental homes, rather than providing prevention services, which could allow children to remain safely in their homes.
> - Program expenditures were $417 million in 2005-2006 and are expected to grow to $540 million by 2010-11 if the program continues to operate under the protection-based model.
> - From 1996-97 to 2004-05, the number of First Nation children in care increased by 64.34%.
>
> - Approximately 5.8% of First Nation children living on reserve are in care out of their parental homes.
>
> Current Issues: First Nation children are disproportionately represented in the child welfare system. Placement rates on reserve reflect a lack of available prevention services to mitigate family crisis.
>
> Changes in the landscape: Provinces and territories have introduced new policy approaches to child welfare and a broader continuum of services and programs that First Nations Child and Family Services must deliver to retain their provincial mandates as service providers. However, the current federal funding approach to child and family services has not let First Nations Child and Family Services Agencies keep pace with the provincial and territorial policy changes, and therefore, the First Nations Child and Family Services Agencies are unable to deliver the full continuum of services offered by the provinces and territories to other Canadians. A fundamental change in the funding approach of First Nations Child and Family Services Agencies to child welfare is required in order to reverse the growth rate of children coming into care, and in order for the agencies to meet their mandated responsibilities.

> The Future: A Joint National Policy Review on First Nations Child and Family Services, completed in 2000, recommended that the federal government increase prevention services for children at risk-services that must be provided before considering the removal of the child and placement in out of home care-and that it provide adequate funding for this purpose.
> - Indian and Northern Affairs Canada funded research undertaken by the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada in 2004 and 2005. The reports: WEN: DE: We are coming to the light of day, and WEN: DE: The journey continues, included recommendations for investments and policy adjustments required to address the shortcomings of the current system. This research will form the basis of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada's request for investments and policy renewal.
>
> - The Government of Canada is committed to working with First Nations, provincial/territorial, and federal partners and agencies to implement a modernized vision of the First Nations Child and Family Services Program, a program that strives for safe and strong children and youth supported by healthy parents.
> - The strategy is to refocus the program from a protection-based approach towards a preventive-based model, promote a variety of care options to provide children and youth with safe, nurturing and permanent homes, and build on partnerships and implement practical solutions to improve child interventions services.

[259] Ms. Murphy and Ms. D'Amico also testified about AANDC's reliance on the NPR and Wen:De reports in implementing the EPFA (see Transcript Vol. 53 at pp. 46-47; and, Vol. 54 at pp. 50-51).

[260] Internal AANDC documents presented at the hearing also support the department's adherence to the findings in the NPR and Wen:De reports. AANDC submits the Panel should rely on the testimony of its witnesses rather than what is found in internal documents, given that many of the authors did not testify before the Tribunal in order to provide context and the documents may merely reflect the opinion of employees at a specific time. Therefore, AANDC submits that the Tribunal should assess the weight of documents contextually, with reference to oral evidence regarding their proper interpretation, and considering the scope of the author's authority to prepare the document in question.

[261] The Panel has considered these arguments in weighing the evidence and finds the documents relied upon below to be straightforward and clear. Many of these documents are presentations prepared for, or delivered to, high level AANDC officials. The Panel finds these presentations highly relevant and reliable given they are the means by which information on the FNCFS Program is provided to AANDC management, including Deputy or Assistant Deputy Ministers, in order to inform policy decisions or future requests to Cabinet (see Transcript Vol. 54 at pp. 159, 166; and, Vol. 55 at p. 199). Furthermore, the other AANDC documents referred to below corroborate the information found in those presentations.

[262] A 2005 presentation to the 'Policy Committee' refers to the NPR by stating: "[a] 2000 review of FNCFS found that Indian Affairs was funding [FNCFS Agencies] 22% less, on average, than their provincial counterparts" (see Annex, ex. 31 at p. 2 [Policy Committee presentation]). The Policy Committee presentation, at page 3, goes on to state that, despite maintenance expenditures increasing by 7% to 10% annually, the Department only receives a 2% annual adjustment to the departmental budget. According to the Policy Committee presentation at page 3, "[a]dditional investments are now required for further stabilization for basic supports with respect to Enhanced Organizational Support, and Maintenance Volume Growth."

[263] The 2005 Policy Committee presentation also indicates FNCFS Agencies are threatening to withdraw from service delivery because they cannot deliver provincially mandated services within their current budgets. The presentation continues by stating that provincial governments have written to the Minister of AANDC indicating their concern that the department is not providing sufficient funding to permit FNCFS Agencies to meet provincial statutory obligations. As a result, the Policy Committee presentation warns that provinces may refuse to renew the mandates of FNCFS Agencies or give mandates to new agencies (see at p. 4).

[264] In line with the NPR and Wen:De reports, the Policy Committee presentation states: "In addition to enhanced basic supports for First Nation Child and Family Services, fundamental change in the approach to child welfare is required in order to reverse the growth rate of children coming into care" (at p. 5). In this regard, the presentation proposes transformative measures be put in place to allow investment in prevention services according to provincial legislation and standards (see at p. 6). This "[e]nables the availability of a full spectrum of culturally-appropriate programs and services that would eventually reduce the over representation of First Nations children in the child welfare system" (Policy Committee presentation at p. 6). It also "…addresses immediate critical funding pressures and would stabilize the child welfare situation on reserve" (Policy Committee presentation at p. 6). Finally, according to the Policy Committee presentation, "[i]ncreasing the budget for basic services would enable [FNCFS Agencies] to retain and train staff and meet the increased costs of maintaining operations (e.g. cost of living adjustment, legal fees, insurance, remoteness)" (at p. 6).

[265] Similarly, in another document entitled "First Nations Child and Family Services (FNCFS) Q's and A's", it states:

> Circumstances are dire. Inadequate resources may force individual agencies to close down if their mandates are withdrawn, or not extended by the provinces. This would result in provinces taking over responsibility for child welfare, likely at a higher cost to Indian and Norther Affairs Canada.
>
> Over the past decade the trend in child welfare has been towards prevention or least disruptive measures. INAC recognizes that the current funding formula is not flexible enough to follow this trend and needs to be revised. […]INAC received authority in 2004-2005 to implement a Flexible Funding Option for Maintenance resources. This will permit some agencies to reprofile Maintenance resources to allow for greater flexibility in how these funds are utilized by placing greater emphasis on prevention services.
>
> Incremental Operations funding will assist agencies to a very limited extent in providing additional prevention services. Additional Operations resources will assist agencies in coping with funding pressures resulting from increased legal fees, insurance costs and other operational expenses that have not been adjusted for since Program Review was implemented in 1994-1995.

(Annex, ex. 32 at pp. 1-2, 5)

[266] Similarly, the 2005 National Program Manual, at page 14, section 2.2.3, outlines some of the cost pressures experienced by FNCFS Agencies in terms of their operational funding:

> Although the authorities are clear on what to be included in the operations formula, First Nations have expressed a concern that because the formula was developed in the late 1980's, legislation, standards and practices have changed significantly. Although the following items are included in the Operations, First Nations have stated that Recipients are under increasing pressures due to changes over time with respect to:
> - Information Technology: In the late 1980's, use of computers was limited. Today, however, they are vital to operating social programs and services.
> - Prevention (Least disruptive measures): Recent trends in provincial and territorial legislation have placed a greater emphasis on prevention. Although prevention resources were included in the current formula, the level of funding may not provide enough resources to meet current needs.
> - Liability Insurance: As with prevention, the Operations formula includes funding for insurance. However, since September 11, 2001 (9/11) insurance costs have increased dramatically.
> - Legal Costs: Although legal costs are included in the Operations formula, they have become a larger issue than planned for when the formula was developed. A higher incidence of contested cases plus changes in provincial practice requiring cases to be presented by legal representatives rather than social workers has resulted in higher costs. Further, litigation on behalf of injured children can be very expensive, even when adequate liability insurance is carried.
> It is anticipated that the review of the Operational formula will address these issues. At the present time, however, the current authorities must be applied.

[267] In another document dealing with AANDC's expenditures on Social Development Programs on reserves it states that, despite the federal government acting as a province in the provision of social development programs on reserve, federal policy for social programs has not kept pace with provincial proactive measures and thus perpetuates the cycle of dependency (see Annex, ex. 33 at pp. 1-2 [Explanations on Expenditures of Social Development Programs document]). The document describes AANDC's social programs as "…limited in scope and not designed to be as effective as they need to be to create positive social change or meet basic needs in some circumstances" (Explanations on Expenditures of Social Development Programs document at p. 2). It goes on to say that if its current social programs were administered by the provinces this would result in a significant increase in costs for AANDC. The document provides the example of the Kasohkowew Child Wellness Society in Alberta, where it would cost an additional $2.2 million beyond what AANDC currently funds if social services on that reserve reverted back to the province of Alberta (see Explanations on Expenditures of Social Development Programs document at p. 2).

[268] Correspondingly, a 2006 presentation regarding AANDC social programs on reserves, including the FNCFS Program, describes those programs as being remedial in focus, not always meeting provincial/territorial rates and standards, and not well-integrated across jurisdictions (see Annex, ex. 34 at p. 5 [Social Programs presentation]). With specific regard to the FNCFS Program, the presentation states that "efforts have been concentrated on child protection and removal of the child from the parental home with the result that the children in care rate continues to increase" (see Social Programs presentation at p. 5).

[269] In general, the Social Programs presentation states that "[m]any First Nation and Inuit children and families are not receiving services reasonably comparable to those provided to other Canadians" (at p. 3). Relatedly, the presentation notes that "[p]rovinces/territories have been critical of [AANDC] funding levels as they do not enable First Nation service providers to meet the standards stipulated in provincial/territorial legislation" (Social Programs presentation at p. 6). According to the presentation, the delivery of social programs on reserves is hampered by the absence of legislation, inadequate funding and a division of responsibilities between federal departments which impedes comprehensive program responses (see Social Programs presentation at p. 3).

> The current system is BROKEN, i.e. piecemeal and fragmented
>
> The current system contributes to dysfunctional relationships, i.e. jurisdictional issues (at federal and provincial levels), lack of coordination, working at cross purposes, silo mentality
> […]
>
> The current program focus is on protection (taking children into care) rather than prevention (supporting the family)
>
> Early intervention/prevention has become standard practice in the provinces/territories, numerous U.S. states, and New Zealand
>
> INAC CFS has been unable to keep up with the provincial changes
>
> Where prevention supports are common practice, results have demonstrated that rates of children in care and costs are stabilized and/or reduced
> (Annex, ex. 35 at pp. 2-3 [Putting Children and Families First in Alberta presentation])

[271] The Putting Children and Families First in Alberta presentation touts prevention as the ideal option to address these problems at page 4:

> Early prevention and child-centered outcomes are the missing pieces of the puzzle for FN children and families living on reserve
>
> Early prevention supports the agenda for improving quality of life for children and families thereby leading to improved outcomes in the areas of early childhood development, education, and health

[272] Finally, the Putting Children and Families First in Alberta presentation states at page 5:

> The facts are clear:
>
> - Wen:De Report - Early intervention/prevention is KEY

- First Nation agencies have been lobbying Canada since 1998 to change the system

[273] AANDC's Departmental Audit and Evaluation Branch also performed its own evaluation of the FNCFS Program in 2007 (see Annex, ex. 14 [2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program]). The findings and recommendations of the 2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program reflect those of the NPR and Wen:De reports. Of note, at page ii, the 2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program makes the following findings:

> Although the program has met an increasing demand for services, it is not possible to say that is has achieved its objective of creating a more secure and stable environment for children on reserve, nor has it kept pace with a trend, both nationally and internationally, towards greater emphasis on early intervention and prevention.
> The program's funding formula, Directive 20-1, has likely been a factor in increases in the number of children in care and Program expenditures because it has had the effect of steering agencies towards in-care options - foster care, group homes and institutional care because only these agency costs are fully reimbursed.

[274] In response to these findings, the 2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program made six recommendations at page iii, including that AANDC:

> 1. clarify the department's hierarchy of policy objectives for the First Nations Child and Family Services Program, placing the well-being and safety of children at the top;
> 2. correct the weakness in the First Nations Child and Family Services Program's funding formula, which encourages out-of-home placements for children when least disruptive measures (in-home measures) would be more appropriate. Well-being and safety of children must be agencies' primary considerations in placement decisions;

[275] The 2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program goes on to state that the first step in improving the FNCFS Program is to change Directive 20-1 by providing FNCFS Agencies with a new funding stream that ensures adequate support for prevention work (see at p. 35). In discussing the costs and benefits of increasing the FNCFS Program's focus on prevention, the cost estimates provided in Wen:De Report Three are outlined, including the $22.9 million for new management information systems, capital costs (buildings, vehicles and office equipment), and insurance premiums; and, the $86.4 million for annual funding needs for such things as an inflation adjustment to restore funding to 1995 levels, adjusting the funding formula for small and remote agencies, and increasing the operations base amount from $143,000 to $308,751 (see 2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program at pp. 35-36).

[276] In a September 11, 2009 response to questions raised by the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development, Deputy Minister Michael Wernick described the EPFA as an "…approach that will result in better outcomes for First Nation children" (Annex, ex. 36). Mr. Wernick's response indicates AANDC's awareness of the impacts that the structure and funding for the FNCFS Program under Directive 20-1 has on the outcomes for First Nations children.

> MS MacPHEE: Okay. And I think you touched on this earlier, but I wanted to get you to elaborate a little bit more. Could you tell us a little bit how, more specifically maybe, the new Enhanced Prevention Focused Approach was developed? You know, what was the impetus for developing this new approach?
> MS MURPHY: We weren't getting good outcomes. MS MURPHY: We were having challenges with First Nations, we were having challenges with the number of children in care, and we wanted to reduce that number and we wanted to have kids be safe and we wanted to avoid having kids having to come into care. I mean, the challenge for first Nations communities -- and I'm sure this has already been outlined here by others, is that, especially for small, remote communities, when child needs to be taken into care, sometimes there's not community-based options, so the child may not stay in that community. And taking a child away from their family and from their community has impacts for sure. So we wanted to find community-based solutions so kids could stay in their communities, be close to – and hopefully have the families be able to be reunited. So we wanted to do that early intervention work which would actually avoid having to have the children actually being removed from their parental home and perhaps being located outside at a distance from their community.

[278] However, as the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada, the 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, the 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada, and the 2012 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts pointed out, while the EPFA is an improvement on Directive 20-1, it still relies on the problematic assumptions regarding children in care, families in need, and population levels to determine funding. Furthermore, many provinces and the Yukon remain under Directive 20-1 despite AANDC's commitment to transition those jurisdictions to the EPFA.

[279] AANDC argues the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada, and the 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada, should also be given minimal weight since the authors of the reports were not called to substantiate the documents or provide the context of statements or opinions contained therein. Additionally, AANDC argues these reports are not probative of the facts in issue.

[280] The Panel rejects AANDC's arguments concerning the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada and the 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada. The Auditor General of Canada did not testify before the Tribunal as she or he is not a compellable witness (see section 18.1 of the Auditor General Act). Nevertheless, the Panel is satisfied the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada and 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada are highly reliable, relevant, and clear. They are written to report findings in a comprehensive manner so as to allow Parliament and all Canadians to understand its recommendations. As stated at section 7(2) of the Auditor General Act, reports of the Auditor General of Canada are filed annually with the House of Commons in order to "…call attention to anything that he considers to be of significance and of a nature that should be brought to the attention of the House of Commons…".

[281] Given that the Auditor General is an independent public office in Canada, serving the interests of all Canadians, it would be unreasonable to expect the Panel give little or no weight to the report and findings in the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada and the 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada, especially given the fact that many findings in the reports are specific to the FNCFS Program. In addition, as was outlined above, AANDC publicly accepted the recommendations emanating from the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada and the 2011 Status Report of the Auditor

General of Canada, reinforcing the reports' relevance and reliability in this matter. The Panel accepts the findings of the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada and the 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada.

[282] Similarly, the Panel finds the 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and the 2012 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts to be highly relevant and reliable in this case. In addition to the fact that the reports relate directly of the FNCFS Program, they are also authored by elected officials performing public duties for the benefit of all Canadians. High ranking officials from AANDC were able to testify before the Committee and, in doing so, acknowledged the findings in those reports. Again, the Panel accepts the findings of the 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts and the 2012 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

[283] The statements of the Deputy Minister and Assistant Deputy Minister before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts also indicate that they viewed the EPFA as the solution to address the flaws in Directive 20-1. Again, internal AANDC documents support the findings in the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada, the 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, the 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada and the 2012 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, regarding the need to transition those jurisdictions still under Directive 20-1 to the EPFA, while also acknowledging the need to improve the EPFA.

[284] In 2010, AANDC's Evaluation, Performance Measurement and Review Branch did its own evaluation of the implementation of the EPFA in Alberta (see Annex, ex. 37 [AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Alberta]). The evaluation found that the design of the EPFA was a move in the right direction with potential for positive outcomes. However, it identified some challenges with the EPFA model, including: timing, provincial requirements, human resources shortages, salaries, support from government/agency management, community linkages, training and geographical isolation. All these were considered by FNFCS Agencies to be essential to the successful implementation of the approach. An additional challenge identified is ensuring that reliable data is collected to allow for accurate performance measurement and some comparability of prevention services (see AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Alberta at pp. vi, 11,16-17, 21-24).

[285] Moreover, the evaluation noted that, as the EPFA is based on an annual allocation for most aspects and some pieces being determined by a formula, "there is not the flexibility to respond quickly to changes in provincial policy or other external drivers…" (AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Alberta at p. 27). According to the evaluation, this lack of flexibility "…is common to INAC programs that adhere to provincial legislation and […] [is] an in-built risk to the program" (AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Alberta at p. 27).

[286] Furthermore, several jurisdictional issues were identified as challenging the effectiveness of service delivery, notably the availability and access to supportive services for prevention. In this regard, the evaluation noted that a common implementation challenge for FNCFS Agencies was the need for specialized services at the community level (for example, Fetal Alcohol Spectrum Disorder assessments, therapy, counselling and addictions support). Moreover, the evaluation found of key importance the availability and access to supportive services for prevention. According to the evaluation, these services are not available through AANDC funding, though they are provided by other government departments and programs either on reserve or off reserve (see AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Alberta at pp. 16-18, 21-24).

[287] The evaluation recommended revisiting the EPFA funding model within the next year to learn from the past two years of implementation and to incorporate additional resources to address some of the issues faced by rural and remote communities. As part of this review, it recommended AANDC also determine if the calculations that are based on assumed population of children in care are relevant in achieving desired outcomes (see AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Alberta at p.i).

[288] In 2012, the Evaluation, Performance Measurement and Review Branch of AANDC also did its own evaluation of the implementation of the EPFA in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia (see Annex, ex. 38 [AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia]; see also, Annex, ex. 39). Again, the findings are in line with those of the other reports on the FNCFS Program.

[289] The 2012 evaluation found it was unclear whether the EPFA is flexible enough to accommodate provincial funding changes (see AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia at p. 51). It noted both the Saskatchewan and Atlantic regional offices struggle to effectively perform their work given staffing limitations, including staffing shortages, caseload ratios that exceed the provincial standard, and difficulty recruiting and retaining qualified staff, particularly First Nation staff (see AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia at p. 51). Capital expenditures on new buildings, new vehicles and computer hardware were identified as being necessary to achieve compliance with provincial standards, but also as making FNCFS Agencies a more desirable place to work. However, these expenditures were not anticipated when implementing the EPFA and were identified as often being funded through prevention dollars (see AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia at p. 49).

[290] One of the main challenges identified in the implementation of the EPFA in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia was unrealistic expectations, largely by community leadership, of what agencies are able to achieve with the funding they receive. According to the evaluation, community leadership occasionally expect agencies to cover costs that are social in nature but that do not fall under the agency's eligible expenditures. That is, the conditions which contribute most to a child's risk are conditions that the child welfare system itself does not have the mandate or capacity to directly address, including economic development, health programing, education and cultural integrity (see AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia at pp. 35, 49, 51). The AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia states, at page 49: "AANDC could improve its efficiency by having a better understanding of other AANDC or federal programming that affect children and parents requiring child and family services and facilitating the coordination of these programs".

[291] Difficulties based on remoteness were also identified as a main challenge in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia. One third of agencies reported high cost and time commitments required to travel to different reserves, along with the related risks associated with not reaching high-risk cases in a timely manner. In Nova Scotia, where there is only one FNCFS Agency with two offices throughout the province, the evaluation noted it can take two to three hours to reach a child in the southwestern part of the province. On the other hand, the provincial model is structured so that its agencies are no more than a half-hour away from a child in urgent need. In extreme cases, the Nova Scotia FNCFS Agency has had to rely on the provincial agencies for assistance. According to the evaluation, because of these issues the province of Nova Scotia has recommended that AANDC provide funding to support a third office in the southwestern part of the province (see AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia at pp. 35-36).

[292] In an August 2012 presentation, entitled "First Nations Child and Family Services Program (FNCFS) The Way Forward", Ms. Odette Johnson, Director of the Children and Family Services Directorate of AANDC outlined to Françoise Ducros, Assistant Deputy Minister, ESDPPS, the need to reassess the EPFA (see Annex, ex. 40 [the Way Forward presentation]). The purpose of the presentation was "[t]o provide options and seek approval for next steps in the reform of the FNCFS Program" (Way Forward presentation at p. 2). It identifies the drivers behind this reform as: the provincial/territorial shift to prevention, the high numbers/costs of First Nation children in care, AANDC internal audits and evaluations of the FNCFS (along with those of the Auditor General), the reports of Parliamentary Committees, the human rights complaint, and child advocate reports and other research (see the Way Forward presentation at p. 5).

[293] According to the Way Forward presentation, "[a]udits and evaluations of between 2008 and 2012 demonstrate a need for the EPFA, but also a need to annually review the EPFA formula as constant provincial changes make it difficult to stay current and enable Agencies to provide a full range of child welfare services" (at p. 9). Furthermore, "[p]rovinces have been shifting their caseloads towards greater emphasis on intake and investigation which may not have been part of original EPFA discussions and are now creating pressures on Agencies" (see the Way Forward presentation at p. 9).

[294] At page 13, the Way Forward presentation provides a comparative table of "where we are" and "where we need to go":

Where we are		Where we need to go
Taking children into care and some work with families in the home	→	Taking children in care for critical cases but more with the families in the home.
Fund agencies and provinces for basic protection services and some prevention with families in the home.	→	Either fund full range of services provided by provinces (differs among jurisdictions) OR transfer child welfare on reserve to the Provincial/Territorial governments.
Initial investments in EPFA in 6 jurisdictions but not necessarily addressing all aspects of child welfare.	→	EPFA in all jurisdictions fully costed at $108.13M, supporting all aspects of child welfare including intake, early intervention and allowing for developmental phase.
Developing some capacity for prevention in communities.	→	All communities have capacity in prevention.

[295] The presentation proposes three options to address these issues: (1) implement EPFA in the remaining jurisdictions; (2) expand the EPFA with increased investments to address cost drivers, including implementing the model in the remaining jurisdiction; and, (3) transfer the program to the provinces/territories.

[296] Under option 1, the costs of transferring the remaining jurisdictions to EPFA are estimated at: $21 million for British Columbia; $2 million for the Yukon; $5 million for Ontario; $2 million for New Brunswick; and, $2 million for Newfoundland and Labrador. (see Way Forward presentation at p. 15). There is also an additional $4 million listed for "Maintenance" which Ms. Murphy explained as an infusion of additional funds to avoid having to re-allocate money from elsewhere in AANDC to cover additional costs that go beyond the standard funding formula (see Transcript Vol. 54 at pp. 167-168). Furthermore, an additional $2 million is estimated for "Strength and Accountability" to allow AANDC to better administer the FNCFS Program internally (see testimony of S. Murphy, Transcript Vol. 54 at pp. 168).

[297] The presentation lists as a "PRO" for this option the recognition that the FNCFS Program cannot address all root causes of the over-representation of children in care.

Under “CONS” it states the “5-year EPFA funding envelope may not be addressing provincial cost drivers or funding pressures related to the operational efficiencies of Agencies” (Way Forward presentation at p. 15). According to Ms. Murphy, who stated she had signed off on the presentation, the major cost drivers are increases in the rates for maintaining children in care, growth in the number of children that come into care and salary increases (see Transcript Vol. 54 at pp. 158-159, 179 and 181). She elaborated on the “CON” for option 1 as follows:

> So with this option we were talking about maintenance, but we weren't necessarily dealing with all of the cost drivers that we were observing.
> So, as an example, we know that the cost of foster care is going up and so, Agencies are trying to pay those bills and we hadn't properly calculated that in our model.
>
> This option wasn't trying to re-stabilize the existing EPFA jurisdictions for the cost changes that had happened since we introduced the funding models, it was really about the five. So it was sort of the minimum option at the time.

[298] For option 2, the implementation of the expanded EPFA in the remaining jurisdictions is estimated at $65.03 million, while topping-up the existing EPFA jurisdictions is estimated at $43.10 million, for a total of $108.13 million. In addition to these amounts, the presentation indicates that a 3% escalator will be required every year. The “PROS” of this option are that it ensures agencies are able to meet changing provincial standards and salary rates while maintaining a high level of prevention programming; and, that funding remains reasonably comparable with provinces and territories. Under “CONS”, the presentation states: “Option 2 is more costly than Status Quo EPFA implementation” (Way Forward presentation at p. 16). During testimony, Ms. Murphy was asked whether the “PROS” of this option suggest that AANDC is not able to provide a reasonably comparable level of services under the FNCFS Program. Ms. Murphy responded:

> It has always been our intention to provide reasonably comparable services.

> We were noticing trends in increasing kids in care and we were having stresses in our budget to be able to maintain those levels and, of course, the Department's doing re-allocations, but we weren't – we noticed changes for sure and we needed to keep up with those changes and we weren't necessarily being successful in all cases of being able to do that.

[299] Finally, the third option of transferring child welfare on reserve to the provinces/territory does not have an estimated cost, but the presentation indicates there is "[p]otential for dramatic increases in costs" (Way Forward presentation at p. 17). As Ms. Murphy put it:

> it's certainly expected that if you were to ask someone else to start to take on the delivery of a program, they're going to have their administrative cost structure, they're going to potentially look for funds to offset the cost of them assuming that role.
>
> It doesn't mean that it would. We didn't -- necessarily hadn't costed any of that, but we wanted to at least highlight that there might be a potential for an increase in costs because we might have to absorb, for instance, increased administrative costs that weren't necessarily there right now in the way that we're funding individual Agencies.
>
> And other costs, we don't know. They may want to negotiate other things as part and parcel of taking on that responsibility and we wouldn't wait until you got to negotiation to find out what that was.

[300] The "PROS" of option 3 include: comparability issue would be resolved and better oversight/compliance of child and family services on reserve. Along with the potential for a dramatic increase in costs, the presentation also includes as "CONS" for this option that support for all First Nations is uncertain, and that it involves complimentary programs, therefore, it is a big task to implement and involves cost implications beyond AANDC (Way Forward presentation at p. 17).

[301] Following on the Way Forward presentation, in two similar presentations in October and November 2012, Ms. Murphy expanded on the options for reforming the FNCFS Program (see testimony of S. Murphy, Transcript Vol. 55 at p. 199). In these presentations Ms. Murphy proposed that AANDC complete the reform of the FNCFS Program to EPFA in the remaining jurisdictions (estimated at $139.7 million over 5 years and $36.6 million ongoing); stabilize pressures in existing EPFA jurisdictions (estimated at 164.1 million over 5 years); add a 3% escalator per year for all jurisdictions to ensure provincial/territorial comparability (estimated at $105.5 million over 5 years and $23.9 million ongoing); and seek additional resources for increased program management and strengthened accountability (estimated at $11.2 million over 5 years and $2.3 million ongoing) (see Annex, ex. 41 at p. 2 [the Renewal of the First Nations Child and Family Services Program (October 31, 2012) presentation]; and, Annex, ex. 42 at pp. 2, 5 [the Renewal of the First Nations Child and Family Services Program (November 2, 2012) presentation]).

[302] The need for this increased funding is explained as:

> Maintenance rate increases for children in care have far exceeded the two percent AANDC receives annually. As a result, the Department must reallocate funds from other program areas to cover the deficit.
>
> AANDC must pay the costs to support children in care and these costs are still rising dramatically. As maintenance rates are essentially dictated by provinces, AANDC has no choice but to support the costs of children in care based on these rates.
>
> In addition, no program escalator was approved for any funding model used by the FNCFS Program to help address increased costs over time and to ensure that prevention-based investments more closely match the full continuum of child welfare services provided off reserve.
>
>
> Currently, AANDC has very limited human resources dedicated to the FNCFS Program.
>
> No funding for strengthened accountability for results was provided when EPFA was approved in 2007.
>
> AANDC's activities have increased dramatically with the implementation of EPFA in the 6 jurisdictions.
>
> AANDC is currently limited in how effectively it can manage and monitor the program while developing tripartite partnerships to fully implement EPFA.

> (Renewal of the First Nations Child and Family Services Program (October 31, 2012) presentation at pp. 5-6)

[303] In Ms. Murphy's view, while positive outcomes from the EPFA have been identified, "the program is losing ground due to increasing provincial costs" (Renewal of the First Nations Child and Family Services Program (November 2, 2012) presentation at p. 3). Furthermore, she views her proposal as addressing "…rising maintenance costs in all jurisdictions", it "allows the program to accommodate provincial rate changes thereby maintaining comparability", and "will allow agencies to devote appropriate resources to prevention, which will lead to a decrease in long term care placements in the medium to longer term" (Renewal of the First Nations Child and Family Services Program (November 2, 2012) presentation at p. 6). The impacts of no new investments in the FNCFS Program would, according to Ms. Murphy, "…not advance improved outcomes for First Nations children and their families" and "[t]he Government of Canada will not be able to sustain reasonable provincial comparability for child welfare support" (Renewal of the First Nations Child and Family Services Program (November 2, 2012) presentation at p. 8). At the hearing, Ms. Murphy was asked to expand on this last point:

> MEMBER BELANGER: "The Government of Canada will not be able to sustain reasonable provincial comparability for child welfare support." What are we comparing here?
> MS MURPHY: I think what we were saying there was that we were starting to have issues in terms of being able to match salaries and the costs of keeping children in care, those other elements that I have laid out, and that so we may have trouble paying those bills.
>
> We are paying those bills now, but if you keep going, at some point you hit the wall and you don't have the ability to continue to reallocate, you put at risk that policy concept of comparability.

[304] For reasons that were not elaborated upon at the hearing, the above options and recommendations were not implemented in AANDC's 2013 or 2014 budgets (see Transcript Vol. 55 at pp. 206-208, 221; see also Transcript Vol. 61 at pp. 159-162).

[305] Overall, on the issue of the relevance and reliability of the reports on the FNCFS Program, the Panel finds that from the years 2000 to 2012 many reliable sources have identified the adverse effects of the funding formulas and structure of the FNCFS Program. AANDC was involved in the NPR and Wen:De reports, and acknowledged and accepted the findings and recommendations in the Auditor General and Standing Committee on Public Account's reports, including developing an action plan to address those recommendations. As the internal evaluations and other relevant and reliable AANDC documents demonstrate, those studies and reports became the basis for reforming Directive 20-1 into the EPFA and, subsequently, recommendations to reform the EPFA. It is only now, in the context of this Complaint, that AANDC raises concerns about the reliability and weight of the various reports on the FNCFS Program outlined above. Moreover, the internal documents discussed above support those reports and are AANDC's own evaluations, recommendations and presentations prepared by its high ranking employees. For these reasons, the Panel does not accept AANDC's argument that the reports on the FNCFS Program have little or no weight and accepts the findings in those reports, along with the corroborating information in documents relied on above.

b. The choices of FNCFS Agencies and additional funding provided [306] AANDC argues the difference between the level of services and programs offered on and off reserve may have little to do with funding and more to do with the choices made by FNCFS Agencies about the type of services and programs they want to provide and other administrative issues affecting the overall budget. For example, some agencies decide to allocate funds to the salaries of their board members when the budget should be spent on front line services. Also, AANDC points out that some agencies are successful with their budget, including some agencies who have posted surpluses. AANDC submits it also provides additional funding or reallocates funds where FNCFS Agencies require further funding. Therefore, if there are gaps in funding, AANDC contends it has bridged those gaps through additional funds.

[307] As outlined above, Directive 20-1 and the EPFA have certain assumptions built into their funding formulas. In general, that the child population they serve is 1000 children aged 0-18, that 6% of the total on reserve child population is in care, and that 20% of families are in need of services. Ms. D'Amico explained the use of assumptions as providing stability for FNCFS Agencies. That is, even if less than 6% of its children are in care and 20% of its families are in need of services, it would not reduce the agency's budget. That may indeed be a beneficial situation for agencies where these assumptions accurately reflect their clientele and may even result in the agency receiving a surplus of funding. However, on this last point, the Panel notes Wen:De Report Two stated: "Not surprisingly, it was only BC agencies that advised that they had surpluses and, in almost all cases, the surplus came from the maintenance per diem arrangement" (at p. 213). More fundamentally though, where the assumptions do not accurately reflect the clientele of an FNCFS Agency - where the percentage of children in care and families in need of services is higher than 6% and 20% respectively - the funding formula is bound to provide inadequate funding.

[308] In 2006, 18 FNCFS Agencies had over 10% of their children in care out of the parental home (see Social Programs presentation at p. 13). In the same year, there were 257 First Nations communities on reserves with no access to child care and many more communities did not have enough resources to support 20% of children from birth to six years of age (see Social Programs presentation at p. 14).

[309] For Alberta, Ms. Schimanke indicated that most FNCFS Agencies have around 6% of children in care, but there are some that have anywhere from 11 to 14% (see Transcript Vol. 61 at pp. 113-115). Also, as stated above in the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada, in the five provinces covered by the report, the percentage of children in care ranged from 0 to 28%.

[310] In Manitoba, Ms. Elsie Flette, Chief Executive Office of the First Nations of Southern Manitoba Child and Family Services Authority (since retired), described the effects of the assumptions on FNCFS Agencies:

> If you're an Agency that has, you know, five percent of its child population in care, you benefit from that assumption, you're being paid by AANDC as if seven percent of your kids were in care. So, you're getting more money and you don't have the cases, you don't have the children in > care that you have to spend that money on and, so, you have some flexibility for how else to use that money.

> But if you're an Agency that has more than seven percent of its children in care, you have a problem. And we have in the Southern Authority I believe right now four Agencies that exceed those assumptions. And one of them in particular, they have -- 14 percent of their child population is in care, so, they have exactly half of the kids in care for which they receive no money.
>
> When we look at the families and prevention services, I believe there's about five Agencies that exceed that 20 percent. The same Agency that has the 14 percent children has a 40 percent families, so, 40 percent of their families on- Reserve are getting service.
>
> They're funded for 20 percent. So, half their workload both for families and for kids is completely unfunded, they get no money. So, anything they might have for prevention they can't do because all their money has to go – they have these kids, they need workers, they have to service that pop -- that workload and there's no way -- under the funding model itself, there's no way to adjust for that.
>
>
> So, it's not an accurate -- it is an accurate average percent, but for individual Agencies it's often inaccurate, you can have lower numbers or, in particular, if you have higher than seven percent you have unfunded workload.

[311] While additional funds have been provided or reallocated to cover maintenance expenditures and/or some ad hoc exceptional circumstances, FNCFS Agencies are expected to cover their operations and prevention costs within their fixed budgets, including using those funds to cover any deficits in maintenance expenditures. Those budgets are based on the formulas that, again, do not account for the actual needs of the FNCFS Agencies. They are also static formulas. That is, as the years go by, the formulas become more and more disconnected from the actual needs of FNCFS Agencies and the children and families they serve. Specifically, the formulas do not apply an escalator for regular increases in costs, including for salaries, where the bulk of funding is spent. While Directive 20-1 calls for a cost of living increase of 2% every year, that increase has not been applied since 1995-1996. Similarly, once EPFA is implemented in a jurisdiction, aside from adjustments for population size, yearly increases in costs are not accounted for in the funding formula. In Alberta for example, as indicated above, funding under EPFA is provided based on provincial rates from 2006. According to an AANDC official, it is up to FNCFS Agencies to work with the budgets they have:

> MR. POULIN: So for an Agency that is over 6 percent, where you need more protection workers, that component, all that component will be eaten up, that operations budget will be eaten up with what is essential to meet your immediate needs, and so that leaves very little for anything like brief services.
> MS SCHIMANKE: It could be. It depends how they set their budget and how they set their salary grids. Like, again, that is the Agencies that decide that, right, and how they manage that.
>
> MR. POULIN: That means paying -- you know, that means in effect paying your workers less than what the province does.
>
> MS SCHIMANKE: It could be, yes. That could be one example of things, yes.
>
> MR. POULIN: It could be having less workers and therefore having a higher case ratio than your workers -- than the province does.
>
> MS SCHIMANKE: It could be, yes.
>
> I do have to show, though, that there are Agencies who are above the 6 percent who still show surpluses, so I don't know what they are doing differently. It could be their salaries have been adjusted very low; we don't know what they are doing to make that happen. It may be they're short-staffed and they are just not -- and the staff are carrying higher caseloads, yeah. So there are various examples of what different Agencies are doing, yes.

[312] These last statements highlight the dichotomy between the objective of the FNCFS Program and its actual implementation through Directive 20-1 and the EPFA. While the program is premised upon provincial comparability, the funding mechanisms do not allow many FNCFS Agencies, particularly those agencies that do not match AANDC's assumptions about children in care and families in need, to keep up with provincial standards and changes thereto.

[313] As noted by the reports on the FNCFS Program, given that funding under Directive 20-1 and the EPFA is largely based on population levels, small and remote agencies are also disproportionately affected by AANDC's funding formulas. In British Columbia for example, small agencies are the norm, not the exception, including many that serve rural and isolated communities. Their challenges include added costs for travel, accessing the communities they serve and getting and retaining staff (see testimony of W. McArthur, Transcript Vol. 63 at p. 87).

[314] Given these agencies are funded pursuant to Directive 20-1, most do not have the flexibility or resources necessary to provide prevention services, even with additional funds. In these rural and isolated communities, it is also difficult for First Nations people to access services which are available off reserve, including: mental health services; services to strengthen families; and services for family preservation and reunification (see Annex, ex. 43; see also testimony of W. McArthur, Transcript Vol. 63 at p. 87 and Vol. 64 at pp. 6, 167). Despite moving FNCFS Agencies in British Columbia to funding based on actuals in 2011, with the intent to transition them to the EPFA shortly thereafter to address some of these concerns; and, despite the repeated requests of FNFCS Agencies and the province of British Columbia, that transition had yet to occur at the time of the hearing and no announcement was made for EPFA in the 2013-2014 budgets (see testimony of W. McArthur, Transcript Vol. 63 at pp. 96-97, 156, 172-173).

[315] The effects of the population thresholds in Directive 20-1, along with the other assumptions built into Directive 20-1 and the EPFA, indicate that a "one-size fits all" approach does not work for child and family services on reserve. The overwhelming evidence in this case suggests that because AANDC does not fund FNCFS Agencies based on need but, rather, based on assumptions of need and population levels, that funding is inadequate to provide essential child and family services to many First Nations. Moreover, the internal AANDC documents outlined above, namely the Way Forward presentation and the Renewal of the First Nations Child and Family Services Program presentation, indicate that, despite any additional funds provided or reallocated to FNCFS Agencies, there is still quite a significant difference in funding levels to bring the FNCFS Program into comparability with the provinces. This point is addressed in more detail in the following section.

c. Comparator evidence

[316] AANDC contends that comparison is an essential part of the analysis under human rights legislation. It submits that no evidence was advanced by the Complainants regarding how the provincial or territorial funding models work or what their respective child welfare budgets are as compared to the federal government. In this regard, AANDC argues that the Tribunal should draw a negative inference from the fact that the Complainants did not call provincial and territorial witnesses to testify.

[317] According to AANDC, the Complainants' case lacks substantive evidence about the level of provincial funding compared to federal funding, including addressing the nature and extent of any research thereon. Moreover, no provincial or territorial witnesses were called to support the allegation that there is a difference in child welfare funding or service levels on or off reserve. Given that comparison between federal and provincial funding was at the heart of their case, AANDC submits the Complainants had to demonstrate how much funding is provided by the federal government and each provincial/territorial government for child welfare services. Only if the amount of funding for both was reliably established, could the Tribunal determine if there is a difference and whether that difference amounts to adverse differentiation or a denial of services. According to AANDC, perceived differences in services on and off reserve are not sufficient to substantiate the Complainants' claims.

[319] AANDC's argument regarding the need for comparative evidence, and that comparing the federal and provincial/territorial funding systems is not valid under the CHRA, has already been rejected by the Federal Court, the Federal Court of Appeal and this Tribunal. In setting aside the Tribunal's decision on AANDC's jurisdictional motion > the Tribunal erred in concluding that the ordinary meaning of the term "differentiate adversely" in subsection 5(b) requires a comparator group in every case in order to establish discrimination in the provision of services. This conclusion is unreasonable as it flies in the face of the scheme and purpose of the Act, and leads to patently absurd results that could not have been intended by Parliament.

(2011 CHRT 4), which advanced this same argument, the Federal Court in Caring Society FC found at paragraph 251:

[320] The Federal Court explained some of the patently absurd results of requiring a comparator group in every case:

> [256] On the Tribunal's analysis, the employer who consciously decides to pay his or her only employee less because she is a woman, or black, or Muslim, would not have committed a discriminatory practice within the meaning of subsection 7(b) of the Act because there is no other employee to whom the disadvantaged employee could be compared.
> [257] Similarly, the shopkeeper who forces his or her employee to work in the back of the shop after discovering that the employee is gay would not have committed a discriminatory practice if no one else was employed in the store.
>
>
> [259] In the examples cited above, individuals are clearly being treated in an adverse differential manner in their employment because of their membership in a protected group. However, according to the Tribunal's interpretation, no recourse would be available to these individuals under the Act. Such an interpretation does not accord with the purpose of the legislation and is unreasonable.
> (Caring Society FC at paras. 256-257, 259)

[321] After examining the role of comparator groups in a discrimination analysis and the Supreme Court's decision in Withler v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 12 (Withler), the Federal Court made the following statements with regard to the use of comparator groups in analyzing alleged discrimination against Aboriginal peoples:

> [332] Aboriginal people occupy a unique position within Canada's constitutional and legal structure.

> [337] By interpreting subsection 5(b) of the Canadian Human Rights Act so as to require a mirror comparator group in every case in order to establish adverse differential treatment in the provision of services, the Tribunal's decision means that, unlike other Canadians, First Nations people will be limited in their ability to seek the protection of the Act if they believe that they have been discriminated against in the provision of a government service on the basis of their race or national or ethnic origin. This is not a reasonable outcome.
>
> [340] I also agree with the applicants that an interpretation of subsection 5(b) that accepts the sui generis status of First Nations, and recognizes that different approaches to assessing claims of discrimination may be necessary depending on the social context of the claim, is one that is consistent with and promotes Charter values.

[322] On appeal, the Federal Court of Appeal accepted the Federal Court's reasoning regarding the use of comparator groups in a discrimination analysis. In fact, it noted that cases postdating the Federal Court's decision confirmed the reduced role of comparator groups in the analysis:

> In Moore v. British Columbia (Education), 2012 SCC 61, the Supreme Court reiterated that the existence of a comparator group does not determine or define the presence of discrimination, but rather, at best, is just useful evidence. It added that insistence on a mirror comparator group would return us to formalism, rather than substantive equality, and "risks perpetuating the very disadvantage and exclusion from mainstream society the [Human Rights] Code is intended to remedy" (at paragraphs 30-31). The focus of the inquiry is not on comparator groups but "whether there is discrimination, period" (at paragraph 60).
> In Quebec (Attorney General) v. A., 2013 SCC 5 at paragraph 346 (per Abella J. for the majority), the Supreme Court has reaffirmed that "a mirror comparator group analysis may fail to capture substantive equality, may become a search for sameness, may shortcut the second stage of the substantive equality analysis, and may be difficult to apply": Withler, supra at paragraph 60. The Supreme Court went so far as to cast doubt on the authority of Nova Scotia (Attorney General) v. Walsh, 2002 SCC 83, [2002] 4 S.C.R. 325, an earlier case in which an unduly influential or determinative > role was given to the existence of a comparator group – similar to what the Tribunal did here.

> (Caring Society FCA at para. 18)

[323] The Panel agrees with the Federal Court and Federal Court of Appeal's reasoning on the role of comparator groups in a discrimination analysis. AANDC's argument regarding the need for comparative evidence in this case is inconsistent with the Caring Society FC and Caring Society FCA decisions. Furthermore, there is no authority for its proposition that interjurisdictional comparisons are not valid under the CHRA.

[324] While the Supreme Court has previously stated that equality is a comparative concept, it has also recognized that "…every difference in treatment between individuals under the law will not necessarily result in inequality and, as well, that identical treatment may frequently produce serious inequality" (Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 SCR 143 at p. 164 [Andrews]). With regard to this last statement, the Supreme Court in Withler, at paragraph 2, stated that equality is about substance, not formalism:

> In our view, the central issue in this and others. 15(1) cases is whether the impugned law violates the animating norm of s. 15(1), substantive equality: Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 143. To determine whether the law violates this norm, the matter must be considered in the full context of the case, including the law's real impact on the claimants and members of the group to which they belong. The central s. 15(1) concern is substantive, not formal, equality. A formal equality analysis based on mirror comparator groups can be detrimental to the analysis. Care must be taken to avoid converting the inquiry into substantive equality into a formalistic and arbitrary search for the "proper" comparator group. At the end of the day there is only one question: Does the challenged law violate the norm of substantive equality in s. 15(1) of the Charter?

[325] As noted by the Federal Court of Appeal in Caring Society FCA, the decisions in Moore and Quebec (Attorney General) v. A., 2013 SCC 5 (A), echo the approach to comparator groups enunciated in Withler. That is, while the use of comparative evidence may be useful in analyzing a claim of discrimination, it is not determinative of the issue. In fact, as the Supreme Court noted in Withler, at paragraph 59: "finding a mirror group may be impossible, as the essence of an individual's or group's equality claim may be that, in light of their distinct needs and circumstances, no one is like them for the purposes of comparison".

[326] Rather, the full context of the case and all relevant evidence, including any comparative evidence, must be considered (see Withler at para. 2). As the Federal Court of Appeal noted in Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 FCA 154 at paragraph 27 (Morris), the legal definition of a prima facie case does not require a complainant to adduce any particular type of evidence to prove the existence of a discriminatory practice under the CHRA. It is a question of mixed fact and law whether the evidence adduced in any given case is sufficient to prove a discriminatory practice. The Federal Court of Appeal in Morris, at paragraph 28, concluded that:

> A flexible legal test of a prima facie case is better able than more precise tests to advance the broad purpose underlying the Canadian Human Rights Act, namely, the elimination in the federal legislative sphere of discrimination from employment, and from the provision of goods, services, facilities, and accommodation. Discrimination takes new and subtle forms.

[327] In this vein, the Panel notes the present Complaint was brought under both subsections 5(a) and (b) of the CHRA. The interpretation of the wording of subsection 5(b), "to differentiate adversely", has largely been the basis for arguing the need for comparative evidence. That is, "to differentiate" is to treat someone differently in comparison to others. Aside from the French version of subsection 5(b) not having the same comparative connotation, as it simply uses the term "défavoriser", subsection 5(a) also does not use wording implying a comparison. It speaks only of being denied a good or a service. As the Federal Court noted in Caring Society FC, requiring comparator evidence under 5(b), but not under 5(a), would create an internal incoherence between the subsections by establishing different legal and evidentiary requirements in order to establish discrimination under each provision (see Caring Society FC at paras. 276-279).

[328] Similarly, AANDC's argument that there can be no cross-jurisdictional comparisons or comparisons between different service providers is not supported by anything found in the CHRA or in the jurisprudence regarding comparator evidence outlined in the preceding paragraphs. In fact, section 50(3)(c) of the CHRA allows the Panel to receive and accept any evidence and information that is sees fit, as long as it is not privileged information [s. 50(4)] or the testimony of a conciliator appointed to settle the complaint [s. 50(5)]. Furthermore, reasonable comparability with provincial/territorial standards is part of AANDC's own objective in implementing the FNCFS Program and negotiating the other provincial/territorial agreements. While AANDC argues "reasonable comparability" is an administrative term and not a legal term requiring mirror services are provided on and off reserve, that argument has no bearing on the Complainants' ability to bring evidence related thereto. AANDC undertook to ensure First Nations on reserve receive reasonably comparable child and family services to those provided off reserve in similar circumstances. It is unreasonable and unfounded to argue the Complainants should not be able to bring evidence related thereto.

[329] While there is no obligation to bring forward comparative evidence to substantiate a discrimination complaint, there was some comparative evidence brought forward in this case demonstrating a difference between child and family services funding and service levels provided on and off reserve. First, the FNCFS Agencies still under Directive 20-1 receive less funding than those who have transitioned to the EPFA. As indicated in the 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada, funding for operations and prevention services increased between 50 and 100% in each of the provinces that transitioned to EPFA (see at p. 25, s. 4.54). Furthermore, as indicated above, AANDC has estimated the difference in annual funding to transfer the remaining jurisdictions to the EPFA as $21 million for British Columbia; $2 million for the Yukon; $5 million for Ontario; $2 million for New Brunswick; and, $2 million for Newfoundland and Labrador (see Way Forward presentation at p. 15). As Ms. D'Amico stated at the hearing:

> MEMBER LUSTIG: Okay. So is it fair to say then that while your best efforts are underway and you are attempting to address on various front [the shortcomings in the funding formulas], there isn't comparability yet; this is something you are trying to attain?
> MS. D'AMICO: In six jurisdictions, I can tell you that there is comparability. In the other jurisdictions, because we haven't moved to EPFA, the amounts that they are receiving are more than 20-1, but I could not tell you definitively that it is comparable with the province in terms of the funding ratios because 20-1, even with the added dollars, we have run most of the formulas with the > remaining jurisdictions and they would receive more under EPFA based on all of those ratios.

[330] Second, AANDC has identified that increases in funding are even necessary in EPFA jurisdictions to ensure reasonable comparability with the provinces. Again, in the Way Forward presentation, it states the "EPFA funding envelope may not be addressing provincial cost drivers or funding pressures related to the operational efficiencies of Agencies" (at p. 15). To address this, the presentation presents the option of adjusting the EPFA costing model with increased investments to address cost drivers: "EPFA Plus". To implement this increased investment in the jurisdictions that do not function under the EPFA, the Way Forward presentation estimates the cost to be $65.03 million. To top-up the existing EPFA jurisdictions, EPFA Plus is estimated to cost $43.10 million. According to the Way Forward presentation, EPFA Plus "[e]nsures funding remains reasonably comparable with provinces and territories…" (at p. 16). While AANDC witnesses testified that the amounts in the Way Forward presentation are rough estimates that err on the size of magnitude, the Panel still finds they are indicative of the type of investments required to provide more meaningful services to First Nations children and families on reserve and in the Yukon.

[331] Moreover, these amounts are similar to those recommended in Wen:De Report Three (see at p. 33). Wen:De Report Three also cautioned against implementing its recommendations in a piece meal fashion as doing so would undermine the overall efficacy of its proposed changes (see at p. 15). However, by not addressing all the shortcomings of Directive 20-1 in implementing the EPFA, the overall efficacy of the EPFA model is now undermined as indicated in the Way Forward presentation.

[332] A third comparison also arises from the Way Forward presentation. To resolve comparability, the presentation recommends AANDC transfer child welfare services on reserve to the provinces/territory. It recognizes that the provinces and territories have expertise in child welfare and that there would be better oversight and compliance of child and family services on reserve if they are given the full range of responsibilities, including the responsibility for funding. However, the presentation notes that this option has the

"[p]otential for dramatic increases in costs" for AANDC (Way Forward presentation at p. 17).

[333] In this same vein, another useful comparison in this case is the difference between the delivery of child and family services through the FNCFS Program against the delivery of those services through the Alberta Reform Agreement, BC MOU and BC Service Agreement. AANDC argues these agreements are not evidence of how the province funds the off reserve population or evidence that AANDC underfunds FNCFS Agencies. However, these arguments do not address the fact that FNCFS Agencies are funded in a different manner than the reimbursements provided by AANDC to the provinces. The funding provided to Alberta and British Columbia under these agreements is not based on population levels or assumptions about children in care and families in need. Rather, those provinces are reimbursed for the actual costs or an agreed upon share of the costs for providing child and family services. They receive adjustments for inflation and increases in the costs of services, whereas FNCFS Agencies do not. Most importantly, because of the payment of actuals and adjustments thereof annually, there is a more direct connection between the child and family services standards of those provinces and the delivery of those services to the First Nation communities they serve.

[334] By comparison, neither Directive 20-1 nor the EPFA provide adjustments for the cost of living or for changes in provincial legislation and standards. Both types of adjustments were identified by Wen:De Report Two as major flaws in Directives 20-1 and, despite these findings, the EPFA model incorporated these same flaws. As Wen:De Report Two specified, not adjusting funding for increases in the cost of living leads to both under-funding of services and to distortion in the services funded (see at p. 45). Furthermore, by not providing adjustments for changing provincial legislation and standards, the FNCFS Program still contains no mechanism to ensure child and family services provided on reserve are reasonably comparable to those provided to children in similar circumstances off reserve (see Wen:De Report Two at p. 50).

[335] AANDC's argument about the Complainants' lack of comparative evidence also ignores the fact that the NPR, Wen:De reports, Auditor General and Standing Committee reports have all identified a need for AANDC to do this analysis and recommended they do so. Moreover, in response to the Auditor General and Standing Committee reports recommending AANDC perform a comparative analysis of child welfare services provided on and off reserve, AANDC indicated that it has not done so because of inherent difficulties in doing so. Despite said difficulties, "reasonable comparability" remains AANDC's standard for the FNCFS Program.

[336] The difficulties in performing this comparative analysis were also identified in a document entitled Comparability of Provincial and INAC Social Programs Funding, authored by AANDC employees and to be included in a Ministerial Briefing Binder (see Annex, ex. 44). The document explains that for a number of reasons, such as differences in the way social programs are delivered in the provinces in terms of types of services, the number of services and the allocation of funding, it is difficult to arrive at conclusive and comparable numbers (see Comparability of Provincial and INAC Social Programs Funding at p. 1). In addition, provincial data may not be directly comparable as it could include costs such as overhead or program costs not funded through the FNCFS Program (see Comparability of Provincial and INAC Social Programs Funding at p. 4). Where total expenditures per child in care are compared, there is some indication that AANDC funds child and family services at higher levels compared to some provinces. However, the Comparability of Provincial and INAC Social Programs Funding document, at page 4, notes that funding levels do not relate to the real needs of children and their families:

> this analysis is not able to recognize that disadvantaged groups may have higher levels of need for services (due to poverty, poor housing conditions, high levels of substance abuse, and exposure to family violence) or that the services or placement options they require may be at a substantially higher cost for services.

[337] Ms. D'Amico also testified about the difficulty in comparing services provided by FNCFS Agencies to those provided by the provinces:

> MS CHAN: […] Can you tell, or is there a way for the Program to know if they are comparable in terms of the services that are being provided on-Reserve?
>
> MS D'AMICO: I don't believe that we can.
>
>
> Because we are talking about different types of communities, different types of systems and different types of services that are being administered by different service delivery agents. So what I mean by this is, one First Nation community off-Reserve who looks exactly the same as an off-Reserve community isn't actually going to get the same services as that other community, they are going to get culturally specific services that that Agency deems appropriate for the children and families that they are serving.

[338] Because of these difficulties, Ms. D'Amico indicated that AANDC's funding is not premised on comparability of service levels between on and off reserve child and family services, but simply on maintaining comparable funding levels with the province:

> MS D'AMICO: Because in the case of EPFA we have -- we are currently funding at the same salaries and staffing ratios as the province, and that is the only comparable variables that we could find. So it has nothing to do with the service delivery, it has to do with the funding, and that -- and so we have found comparable variables that the province how the province funds is how we fund.

[339] However, as indicated above, even salaries are fixed when the EPFA is implemented and in Alberta, for example, they are still using 2006 salary rates in 2014. Furthermore, as indicated in the Comparability of Provincial and INAC Social Programs Funding document, an approach to comparability based on funding and not service levels does not recognize the higher levels of need for services for First Nations or that the services or placement options they require may be at a substantially higher cost.

[340] This last point allows the Panel to make an effective comparison between the child and family services offered on and off reserve based on the principle of the best interest of the child.

iv. Best interest of the child and Jordan's Principle

[341] There is a focus on service levels and the needs of children and families off reserve, namely an emphasis on least disruptive/intrusive measures. On the other hand, under the federal FNCFS Program, there is a focus on funding levels and the application of funding formulas, where funds for prevention/least disruptive measures are fixed and funds to bring a child into care are covered at cost.

[342] Provincial child welfare legislation and standards focus on prevention and least disruptive measures (see for example Ontario's Child and Family Services Act at s. 1; Alberta's Child, Youth and Family Enhancement Act at s. 2; The Child and Family Services Act in Manitoba at Declaration of Principles and s. 2; The Child and Family Services Act in Saskatchewan at ss. 3-5; Nova Scotia's Children and Family Services Act at Preamble and ss. 2, 13, 20; British Columbia's Child, Family and Community Service Act at ss.2-4, 30; and, Quebec's Loi sur la Protection de la Jeunesse at ss. 1-4). These statutes recognize that removing a child from his or her family, home or community should only be done when all other least disruptive measures have been exhausted and there is no other alternative.

> The most disruptive form of intervention is a court order giving the agency temporary or permanent guardianship of a child. Particularly in the case of a permanent order, this may sever legal ties between parent and child forever. To make such an order, a court must find that the child is in need of protection within the meaning of the applicable statute. In addition, the court must find that the "best interests of the child" dictate a temporary or permanent transfer of guardianship. As Lamer C.J. observed in G. (J.), > supra, at para. 76: "Few state actions can have a more profound effect on the lives of both parent and child."

[344] As indicated above, the provinces' legislation and standards dictate that all alternatives measures should be explored before bringing a child into care, which is consistent with sound social work practice as described earlier. However, by covering maintenance expenses at cost and providing insufficient fixed budgets for prevention, AANDC's funding formulas provide an incentive to remove children from their homes as a first resort rather than as a last resort. For some FNCFS Agencies, especially those under Directive 20-1, their level of funding makes it difficult if not impossible to provide prevention and least disruptive measures. Even under the EPFA, where separate funding is provided for prevention, the formula does not provide adjustments for increasing costs over time for such things as salaries, benefits, capital expenditures, cost of living, and travel. This makes it difficult for FNCFS Agencies to attract and retain staff and, generally, to keep up with provincial requirements. Where the assumptions built into the applicable funding formulas in terms of children in care, families in need and population levels are not reflective of the actual needs of the First Nation community, there is even less of a possibility for FNCFS Agencies to keep pace with provincial operational requirements that may include, along with the items just mentioned, costs for legal or band representation, insurance premiums, and changes to provincial/territorial service standards.

[345] AANDC officials working in the FNCFS Program have indicated that they are not experts in the field of child welfare and, instead, rely on provincial legislation and standards to dictate the level of funding that should be provided on reserves. Yet, they apply a formula to fund FNCFS Agencies that does not take into account the standards for least disruptive measures set by provincial legislation. Tellingly, in funding child and family services, the provinces do not apply a funding formula:

> MS CHAN: In terms of funding, have you seen provincial funding formulas to calculate child welfare payment that is made by the province?
> MS D'AMICO: Not to date.

> MS CHAN: What difficulties does this cause for the Program, if any, in determining how you are going to fund?
>
> MS D'AMICO: So this has been our primary challenge, to try and figure out how to fund equitably or comparably because we have consistently asked the province, give us a funding formula for an Agency or for a regional office in your jurisdiction and show us what that is and we will see if we can replicate it, then we would be assured that, you know, infamous provincial comparability.
>
> The provinces don't have that, they have a chart of accounts, they fund based on a variety of different things. You know, an example would be British Columbia, they have five different regional offices; those five different regional offices have different salary grids, they have different operational budgets that are not based on any particular formula.
>
> So it has been incredibly challenging to find those comparable pieces so that we can ensure comparability. It has just been -- it's literally apples and oranges.
>
> So, like I said, it's those variables […] that we have been able to find with the province to be able to inject in our formula so that at least we could have, first of all, a consistent formula across the country, but one that is tailored to every single jurisdiction based on provincial comparability, provincial variables.
>
> So it's not absolute in terms of service. If a service is provided in one community, it's not necessarily being provided in another community even off-Reserve. It's very difficult and the services vary, there is so many different things that child protection and other community partners provide in the vast spectrum of the social safety net.

[346] A focus on prevention services and least disruptive measures in the provincial statutes mentioned above is inextricably linked to the concept of the best interest of the child: a legal principle of paramount importance in both Canadian and international law (see Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Lawv. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 4 at para. 9; and, Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [1999] 2 SCR 817 at para. 75 [Baker]). As explained by Professor Nicholas Bala:

> [L]eading Canadian precedents, federal and provincial statutes and international treaties are all premised on the principle that decisions about children should be based on an assessment of their best interests. This is a central concept for those who are involved making decisions about children, not only for judges and lawyers, but for also assessors and mediators.

[347] With regard to the FNCFS Program, there is discordance between on one hand, its objectives of providing culturally relevant child and family services on reserve, that are reasonably comparable to those provided off reserve, and that are in accordance with the best interest of the child and keeping families together; and, on the other hand, the actual application of the program through Directive 20-1 and the EPFA. Again, while maintenance expenditures are covered at cost, prevention and least disruptive measures funding is provided on a fixed cost basis and without consideration of the specific needs of communities or the individual families and children residing therein.

[348] The discordance between the objectives and the actual implementation of the program is also exemplified by the lack of funding in Ontario, for Band Representatives under the 1965 Agreement. Not only does the Band Representative address the need for culturally relevant services, but it also addresses the goal of keeping families and communities together and is directly provided for in Ontario's Child and Family Services Act.

[349] The adverse impacts outlined throughout the preceding pages are a result of AANDC's control over the provision of child and family services on First Nations reserves and in the Yukon by the application of the funding formulas under the FNCFS Program and 1965 Agreement. Those formulas are structured in such a way that they promote negative outcomes for First Nations children and families, namely the incentive to take children into care. The result is many First Nations children and families are denied the opportunity to remain together or be reunited in a timely manner.

[350] In this regard, and in addressing the difference between the allocation of funding by AANDC for First Nations child and family services and that of the provinces, another important consideration brought forward by the Complainants and in the evidence is the application of Jordan's Principle.

[351] Jordan's Principle is a child-first principle and provides that where a government service is available to all other children and a jurisdictional dispute arises between Canada and a province/territory, or between departments in the same government regarding services to a First Nations child, the government department of first contact pays for the service and can seek reimbursement from the other government/department after the child has received the service. It is meant to prevent First Nations children from being denied essential public services or experiencing delays in receiving them.

[352] Jordan's Principle is in recognition of Jordan River Anderson, a child who was born to a family of the Norway House Cree Nation in 1999. Jordan had a serious medical condition, and because of a lack of services on reserve, Jordan's family surrendered him to provincial care in order to get the medical treatment he needed. After spending the first two years of his life in a hospital, he could have gone into care at a specialized foster home close to his medical facilities in Winnipeg. However, for the next two years, AANDC, Health Canada and the Province of Manitoba argued over who should pay for Jordan's foster home costs and Jordan remained in hospital. They were still arguing when Jordan passed away, at the age of five, having spent his entire life in hospital.

[353] On October 31, 2007, Ms. Jean Crowder, the Member of Parliament for Nanaimo-Cowichan, brought forward motion 296 in the House of Commons:

> That, in the opinion of the House, the government should immediately adopt a child first principle, based on Jordan's Principle, to resolve jurisdictional disputes involving the care of First Nations children.

The motion was unanimously passed on December 12, 2007 (see Annex, ex. 45).

[354] In response, AANDC and Health Canada entered into the Memorandum of Understanding on the Federal Response to Jordan's Principle (see Annex, ex. 46 [2009 MOU on Jordan's Principle]; see also testimony of C. Baggley, Transcript Vol. 57 at pp. 9-13, 23, 40-41, 84-85). In the 2009 MOU on Jordan's Principle, signed by an Assistant Deputy Minister for each department, both AANDC and Health Canada acknowledge that they have a role to play in Jordan's Principle and a shared responsibility in working together to develop and implement a federal response (see at p. 1). The purpose of the memorandum is to act as a guide for the two departments in addressing/resolving funding disputes as they arise between the federal and provincial governments, as well as between the two departments, "…ensuring that services to children identified in a Jordan's Principle case are not interrupted as a result of disputes" (2009 MOU on Jordan's Principle at p. 1).

[355] The memorandum also serves as a guide for AANDC and Health Canada to collaborate on the federal implementation of Jordan's Principle. In this regard, the memorandum indicates that Health Canada's role in responding to Jordan's Principle is by virtue of the range of health-related services it provides to First Nations people, including: nursing services; home and community care; community programs; and, medically necessary non-insured health benefits. AANDC's role in responding to Jordan's Principle is by virtue of the range of social programs it provides to First Nations people, including: special education; assisted living; income assistance; and, the FNCFS Program (see 2009 MOU on Jordan's Principle at pp. 1-2).

[356] Once a possible Jordan's Principle case is identified, the 2009 MOU on Jordan's Principle provides for a review of existing federal authorities and program policies to determine whether the expenditures are eligible under an existing program and can be paid through existing departmental funds. If the dispute over funding arises between the federal and provincial governments, Health Canada and AANDC are to work together to engage and collaborate with the province and First Nations representatives to resolve the dispute through a case management approach. To ensure there is no disruption/delay in service, Health Canada was allocated $11 million to fund goods/services while the dispute is being resolved (see 2009 MOU on Jordan's Principle at p. 2). The funds were provided annually, in $3 million increments, from 2009 to 2012. The funds were never accessed and have since been discontinued (see testimony of C. Baggley, Transcript Vol. 57 at pp. 123-125).

[357] According to the 2009 MOU on Jordan's Principle, a governance structure has been developed to support communication and information-sharing between the two departments on matters related to Jordan's Principle. This governance structure includes "…supporting the resolution of departmental disputes where HC and AANDC are uncertain or do not agree on which department/jurisdiction is responsible for funding the goods/services based on their respective mandates, policies and authorities" (2009 MOU on Jordan's Principle at p. 2). The governance structure was also established to ensure that funding disputes are addressed and coordinated in a timely manner: timing to address case needs and make decisions being "…crucial to ensuring that funding disputes do not disrupt services provided to a child (2009 MOU on Jordan's Principle at p. 3).

[358] Health Canada and AANDC renewed their Memorandum of Understanding on the Federal Response to Jordan's Principle in January 2013 (see Annex, ex. 47 [2013 MOU on Jordan's Principle]). Again, signed by an Assistant Deputy Minister from each department, the 2013 MOU on Jordan's Principle acknowledges that Health Canada and AANDC "…have a role to play in supporting improved integration and linkages between federal and provincial health and social services" (2013 MOU on Jordan's Principle at p. 1). The 2013 MOU on Jordan's Principle now provides that during the resolution of a Jordan's Principle case, the federal department within whose mandate the implicated programs or service falls will seek Assistant Deputy Minister approval to fund on an interim basis to ensure continuity of service.

[359] Ms. Corinne Baggley, Senior Policy Manager for the Children and Family Directorate of the Social Policy and Programs branch of AANDC indicated that the federal response to Jordan's Principle is focused on cases involving a jurisdictional dispute between a provincial government and the federal government and on children with multiple disabilities requiring services from multiple service providers. Furthermore, the service in question must be a service that would be available to a child residing off reserve in the same location (see Transcript Vol. 57 at pp. 9-13; see also Annex, ex. 48). While she estimated that approximately half of the cases tracked under the Jordan's Principle initiative involved disputes between federal departments, she indicated that the policy was built specifically around Jordan's case (see Transcript Vol. 58 pp. 24-25, 40-41).

[360] The Complainants claim AANDC and Health Canada's formulation of Jordan's Principle has narrowly restricted the principle. Whereas the motion was framed broadly in terms of services needed by children, AANDC and Health Canada's formulation applies only to inter-governmental disputes and to children with multiple disabilities.

[361] On the other hand, AANDC is of the view that Jordan's Principle is not a child welfare concept and is not a part of the FNCFS Program. Therefore, it is beyond the scope of this Complaint. AANDC also argues that the FNCFS Program does not aim to address all social needs on reserve as there are a number of other social programs that meet those needs and are available to First Nations on reserve. Moreover, the FNCFS Program authorities do not allow them to pay for an expense that would normally be reimbursed by another program (i.e. the stacking provisions in the 2012 National Social Programs Manual at p. 10, section 11.0). In any event, AANDC argues there is no evidence to suggest that its approach to Jordan's Principle results in adverse impacts.

[362] In the Panel's view, while not strictly a child welfare concept, Jordan's Principle is relevant and often intertwined with the provision of child and family services to First Nations, including under the FNCFS Program. Wen:De Report Three specifically recommended the implementation of Jordan Principle on the following basis, at page 16:

> Jurisdictional disputes between federal government departments and between federal government departments and provinces have a significant and negative effect on the safety and well-being of Status Indian children […] the number of disputes that agencies experience each year is significant. In Phase 2, where this issue was explored in more depth, the 12 FNCFSA in the sample experienced a total of 393 jurisdictional disputes in the past year alone. Each one took about 50.25 person hours to resolve resulting in a significant tax on the already limited human resources.

[363] Wen:De Report Two indicated that 36% of jurisdictional disputes are between federal government departments, 27% between provincial departments and only 14% were between federal and provincial governments (see at p. 38). Some of these disputes took up to 200 hours of staff time to sort out: "[t]he human resource costs related to resolving jurisdictional disputes make them an extraordinary cost for agencies which is not covered in the formula" (Wen:De Report Two at p. 26).

[364] Jordan's Principle also relates to the lack of coordination of social and health services on reserve. That is, like Jordan, due to a lack of social and health services on reserve, children are placed in care in order for them to access the services they need. As noted in the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada, at pages 12 and 17:

> 4.20 Child welfare may be complicated by social problems or health issues. We found that First Nations agencies cannot always rely on other social and health services to help keep a family together or provide the necessary services. Access to such services differs not only on and off reserves but among First Nations as well. INAC has not determined what other social and health services are available on reserves to support child welfare services. On-reserve child welfare services cannot be comparable if they have to deal with problems that, off reserves, would be addressed by other social and health services.
> 4.40 First Nations children with a high degree of medical need are in an ambiguous situation. Some children placed into care may not need protection but may need extensive medical services that are not available on reserves. By placing these children in care outside of their First Nations communities, they can have access to the medical services they need. INAC is working with Health Canada to collect more information about the extent of such cases and their costs.

[365] The 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada, at page 16, also found that coordination amongst AANDC programs, and between AANDC and Health Canada programs, is poor:

> 4.38 As the protection and well-being of First Nations children may require support from other programs, we expected that INAC would facilitate coordination between the [FNCFS] Program and other relevant INAC programs, and facilitate access to other federal programs as appropriate.
> 4.39 We found fundamental differences between the views of INAC and Health Canada on responsibility for funding Non-Insured Health Benefits for First Nations children who are placed in care. According to INAC, the services available to these children before they are placed in care should continue to be available. According to Health Canada, however, an on> reserve child in care should have access to all programs and services available to any child in care in a province, and INAC should take full financial responsibility for these costs in accordance with federal policy. INAC says it does not have the authority to fund services that are covered by Health Canada. These differences in views can have an impact on the availability, timing, and level of services to First Nations children. For example, it took nine months for a First Nations agency to receive confirmation that an $11,000 piece of equipment for a child in care would be paid for by INAC.

[366] For example, a four-year-old First Nations child suffered cardiac arrest and an anoxic brain injury during a routine dental examination. She became totally dependent for all activities of daily living. Before being discharged from hospital, she required significant medical equipment, including a specialized stroller, bed and mattress, a portable lift and a ceiling track system. A request was made to Health Canada's Non-Insured Health Benefits Program requesting approval for the medical equipment. However, the equipment was not eligible under the program and required approval as a special exemption.

[367] An intake form disclosed during the hearing and prepared by provincial authorities in Manitoba, but which accords with AANDC's records of the incident, documents how the case proceeded thereafter (see Annex, ex. 49 [Intake Form]; see also Annex, ex. 50; and, testimony of C. Baggley, Transcript Vol. 58 at pp. 58-60). Initial contact was made with AANDC on November 29, 2012. A conference call was held on December 4, 2012, where Health Canada accepted to pay for the portable lift, but would "absolutely not" pay for the specialized bed and mattress. On December 19, 2012, the child was discharged from hospital. Over a month later, the specialized bed and mattress were provided, but only as a result of an anonymous donation. In the concluding remarks of the Intake Form, where it asks "[p]lease provide details on the barriers experienced to access the required services" it states at page 8:

> Health Canada does not have the authority to fund hospital or specialized beds and mattresses. NIHB said "absolutely not".
> AANDC ineligible through In Home Care (only provide for non medical supports) and family not in receipt of Income Assistance Program to access special needs funding.

> Southern Regional Health Authority (provincial) was approached but indicated they are unable to fund the hospital bed.
>
> Sandy Bay First Nation does not have the funding or has limited funding and is unable to purchase bed.
> Jurisdictions lacking funding authority to cover certain items which result in gaps and disparities.

[368] The lack of integration between federal government programs on reserve, in more areas than only with children with multiple disabilities, is highlighted in an AANDC document entitled INAC and Health Canada First Nation Programs: Gaps in Service Delivery to First Nation Children and Families in BC Region (see Annex, ex. 51 [Gaps in Service Delivery to First Nation Children and Families in BC Region]). As indicated in the accompanying email message attaching the document, under the subject line "Jordan's Principle: Parallel work with HC", the document represents the views of AANDC's British Columbia regional office, including its Director of Intergovernmental Affairs, and is informed by other experienced officials within the regional office.

> The work of the two departments on Jordan's Principle has highlighted what all of us knew from years of experience: that there are differences of opinion, authorities and resources between the two departments that appear to cause gaps in service to children and families resident on reserve. The main programs at issue include INAC's Income Assistance program and the Child and Family Services program; for Health Canada, it is Non-Insured Health Benefits program.

[370] The document goes on to identify gaps based on the first-hand experience of AANDC officials and FNCFS Agencies. For example, once a child is in care, the FNCFS Program cannot recover costs for Non-Insured Health Benefits from Health Canada. In that situation, Health Canada deems that there is another source of coverage (the FNCFS Program); however, AANDC does not have authority to pay for medical-related expenditures. Generally, there is confusion in how to access non-insured health benefits (i.e. where to get the forms; where to send the forms and who to call for questions given the official website does not give contact information) (see Gaps in Service Delivery to First Nation Children and Families in BC Region at pp. 1-2).

[371] Dental services are also identified as an area of contention for FNCFS Agencies and First Nations individuals. Even in emergency situations, basic dental care is denied by the Non-Insured Health Benefits program if pre-approval is not obtained. If pressed, Health Canada advises clients to appeal the decision which can create additional delays. When a child in care is involved however, the FNCFS Agency has no choice but to pay for the work (see Gaps in Service Delivery to First Nation Children and Families in BC Region at p. 2).

[372] Another medical related expenditure identified as a concern is mental health services. Health Canada's funding for mental health services is for short term mental health crises, whereas children in care often require ongoing mental health needs and those services are not always available on reserve. Therefore, children in care are not accessing mental health services due to service delays, limited funding and time limits on the service. To exacerbate the situation for some children, if they cannot get necessary mental health services, they are unable to access school-based programs for children with special needs that require an assessment/diagnosis from a psychologist (see Gaps in Service Delivery to First Nation Children and Families in BC Region at pp. 2-3).

[373] In some cases, the FNCFS Program is paying for eligible Non-Insured Health Benefits expenditures even though they are not eligible expenses under the FNCFS Program (see Gaps in Service Delivery to First Nation Children and Families in BC Region at pp. 2-3). This is problematic considering AANDC has to reallocate funds from some of its other programs - which address underlying risk factors for First Nations children - in order to pay for maintenance costs. Again, as the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada pointed out at page 25:

> 4.72 Because the program's expenditures are growing faster than the Department's overall budget, INAC has had to reallocate funding from other programs. In a 2006 study, the Department acknowledged that over the past decade, budget reallocations—from programs such as community infrastructure and housing to other programs such as child welfare—have > meant that spending on housing has not kept pace with growth in population and community infrastructure has deteriorated at a faster rate.

> 4.73 In our view, the budgeting approach INAC currently uses for this type of program is not sustainable. Program budgeting needs to meet government policy and allow all parties to fulfill their obligations under the program and provincial legislation, while minimizing the impact on other important departmental programs. The Department has taken steps in Alberta to deal with these issues and is committed to doing the same in other provinces by 2012.

[374] As mentioned above, AANDC's own evaluations of the FNCFS Program have also identified this issue. The 2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program identified the FNCFS Program as one of five AANDC programs that have the potential to improve the well-being of children, families and communities. The other four are the Family Violence Prevention Program, the Assisted Living Program, the National Child Benefit Reinvestment Program and the Income Assistance Program. According to the evaluation, "[i]t is possible that, with better coordination, these programs could be used more strategically to support families and help them address the issues most often associated with child maltreatment" (2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program at p. 38). In addition, the evaluation identifies other federal programs for First Nations who live on reserve offered by Human Resources and Social Development Canada, Justice Canada and Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness Canada, along with Health Canada, that also directly contribute to healthy families and communities (see 2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program at pp. 39-45). On this basis, the 2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program, at pages 47-48, proposes three approaches to FNCFS Program improvement:

> Approach A: Resolve weaknesses in the current FNCFS funding formula, Program Directive 20-1, because in its current form, it discourages agencies from a differential response approach and encourages out-of-home child placements.
> Approach B: Besides resolving weaknesses in Program Directive 20-1, encourage First Nations communities to develop comprehensive community plans for involving other INAC social programs in child maltreatment prevention. The five INAC programs (the FNCFS Program, the Assisted Living Program, the National Child Benefit Reinvestment Program, the Family Violence Prevention Program, and the Income Assistance Program) all target the same First Nations communities, and they all have a role to > play in improving outcomes for children and families, so their efforts should be coordinated and a performance indicator for all of them under INAC's new performance framework for social programs should be the rate of child maltreatment in on-reserve First Nation communities.

> Approach C: In addition to approaches A and B, improve coordination of INAC social programs with those of other federal departments that are directed to First Nations on reserve, for example health and early childhood development programs. With greater coordination and a stronger focus on the needs of individual communities, these programs could make a greater contribution to child maltreatment prevention, and could be part of a broader healthy community initiative.

[375] Similarly, the 2010 AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Alberta found several jurisdictional issues as challenging the effectiveness of service delivery, notably the availability and access to supportive services for prevention. In 2012, the AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia found that "[t]here is a need to better coordinate federal programming that affects children and parents requiring child and family services" (at p. 49). The AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia, at page 49, goes on to state:

> It is clear that the FNCFS Program does not and cannot work in isolation from other programming. Too many factors affect the overall need for child and family services programming, and it would be unrealistic to assume that agencies can fully deliver services related to all of them. AANDC could improve its efficiency by having a better understanding of other AANDC or federal programming that affect children and parents requiring child and family services and facilitating the coordination of these programs. Economic development, health promotion, education and cultural integrity are key areas where an integration of programming and services has been noted as potentially addressing community well-being in a way that is both effective and necessary for positive long-term outcomes, and ultimately a sustained reduction in the number of children coming into care.

[376] Jordan's Principle was also considered by the Federal Court in Pictou Landing Band Council v. Canada (Attorney General), 2013 FC 342. The Pictou Landing Band Council (the PLBC) applied for judicial review of an AANDC decision not to reimburse them for in-home health care to one of its members. The PLBC indicated that Jordan's Principle was at issue. However, after case conferencing with the provincial government and officials from the PLBC, AANDC and Health Canada determined there was no jurisdictional dispute in the matter as both levels of government agreed that the funding requested was above what would be provided to a child living off reserve.

[377] The Federal Court found AANDC's interpretation of Jordan's Principle to be narrow and the finding that it was not engaged to be unreasonable:

> [96] In this case, there is a legislatively mandated provincial assistance policy regarding provision of home care services for exceptional cases concerning persons with multiple handicaps which is not available on reserve.
> [97] The Nova Scotia Court held an off reserve person with multiple handicaps is entitled to receive home care services according to his needs. His needs were exceptional and the [Social Assistance Act] and its Regulations provide for exceptional cases. Yet a severely handicapped teenager on a First Nation reserve is not eligible, under express provincial policy, to be considered despite being in similar dire straits. This, in my view, engages consideration under Jordan's Principle which exists precisely to address situations such as Jeremy's.

[378] In determining that AANDC and Health Canada did not properly assess the PLBC request for funding to meet its member's needs, the Federal Court concluded that:

> [111] I am satisfied that the federal government took on the obligation espoused in Jordan's Principle. As result, I come to much the same conclusions as the Court in Boudreau. The federal government contribution agreements required the PLBC to deliver programs and services in accordance with the same standards of provincial legislation and policy. The [Social Assistance Act] and Regulations require the providing provincial department to provide assistance, home services, in accordance with the needs of the person who requires those services. PLBC did. Jeremy does. As a consequence, I conclude AANDC and Health Canada must provide reimbursement to the PLBC.
> [116] Jordan's Principle is not an open ended principle. It requires complimentary social or health services be legally available to persons off reserve. It also requires assessment of the services and costs that meet the needs of the on reserve First Nation child.

[379] Jordan's Principle is designed to address issues of jurisdiction which can result in delay, disruption and/or denial of a good or service for First Nations children on reserve. The 2009 and 2013 Memorandums of Understanding have delays inherently built into them by including a review of policy and programs, case conferencing and approvals from the Assistant Deputy Minister, before interim funding is even provided. It should be noted that the case conferencing approach was what was used in Jordan's case, sadly, without success (see testimony of Dr. Cindy Blackstock, Transcript Vol. 48 at p. 104).

[380] It also unclear why AANDC`s position focuses mainly on inter-governmental disputes in situations where a child has multiple disabilities requiring services from multiple service providers. The evidence above indicates that a large number of jurisdictional disputes occur between federal departments, such as AANDC, Health Canada and others. Tellingly, the $11 million Health Canada fund to address Jordan's Principle cases was never accessed. According to Ms. Baggley, the reasons for this were that the cases coming forward did not meet the criteria for the application of Jordan's Principle; or, were resolved before having to access the fund (see Transcript Vol. 57 at pp. 123-125).

[381] In the Panel's view, it is Health Canada's and AANDC's narrow interpretation of Jordan's Principle that results in there being no cases meeting the criteria for Jordan's Principle. This interpretation does not cover the extent to which jurisdictional gaps may occur in the provision of many federal services that support the health, safety and well-being of First Nations children and families. Such an approach defeats the purpose of Jordan's Principle and results in service gaps, delays and denials for First Nations children on reserve. Coordination amongst all federal departments and programs, especially AANDC and Health Canada programs, would help avoid these gaps in services to First Nations children in need.

[382] More importantly, Jordan's Principle is meant to apply to all First Nations children. There are many other First Nations children without multiple disabilities who require services, including child and family services. Having to put a child in care in order to access those services, when those services are available to all other Canadians is one of the main reasons this Complaint was made.

v. Summary of findings

[383] The FNCFS Program, corresponding funding formulas and other related provincial/territorial agreements intend to provide funding to ensure the safety and well-being of First Nations children on reserve by supporting culturally appropriate child and family services that are meant to be in accordance with provincial/territorial legislation and standards and be provided in a reasonably comparable manner to those provided off-reserve in similar circumstances. However, the evidence above indicates that AANDC is far from meeting these intended goals and, in fact, that First Nations are adversely impacted and, in some cases, denied adequate child welfare services by the application of the FNCFS Program and other funding methods.

[384] Under the FNCFS Program, Directive 20-1 has a number of shortcomings and creates incentives to remove children from their homes and communities. Mainly, Directive 20-1 makes assumptions based on population thresholds and children in care to fund the operations budgets of FNCFS Agencies. These assumptions ignore the real child welfare situation in many First Nations' communities on reserve. Whereas operations budgets are fixed, maintenance budgets for taking children into care are reimbursable at cost. If an FNCFS Agency does not have the funds to provide services through its operations budget, often times the only way to provide the necessary child and family services is to bring the child into care. For small and remote agencies, the population thresholds of Directive 20-1 significantly reduce their operations budgets, affecting their ability to provide effective programming, respond to emergencies and, for some, put them in jeopardy of closing.

[385] Directive 20-1 has not been significantly updated since the mid-1990's resulting in underfunding for FNCFS agencies and inequities for First Nations children and families on reserves and in the Yukon. In addition, Directive 20-1 is not in line with current provincial child welfare legislation and standards promoting prevention and least disruptive measures for children and families. As a result, many First Nations children and their families are denied an equitable opportunity to remain with their families or to be reunited in a timely manner. In 2008, at the time of the Complaint, the vast majority of FNCFS Agencies across Canada functioned under Directive 20-1. At the conclusion of the hearing in 2014, Directive 20-1 was still applicable in three provinces and in the Yukon Territory.

[386] AANDC incorporated some of the same shortcomings of Directive 20-1 into the EPFA, such as the assumptions about children in care and population levels, along with the fixed streams of funding for operations and prevention. Despite being aware of these shortcomings in Directive 20-1 based on numerous reports, AANDC has not followed the recommendations in those reports and has perpetuated the main shortcoming of the FNCFS Program: the incentive to take children into care - to remove them from their families.

[387] Furthermore, like Directive 20-1, the EPFA has not been consistently updated in an effort to keep it current with the child welfare legislation and practices of the applicable provinces. Once EPFA is implemented, no adjustments to funding for inflation/cost of living or for changing service standards are applied to help address increased costs over time and to ensure that prevention-based investments more closely match the full continuum of child welfare services provided off reserve. In contrast, when AANDC funds the provinces directly, things such as inflation and other general costs increases are reimbursed, providing a closer link to the service standards of the applicable province/territory.

[388] In terms of ensuring reasonably comparable child and family services on reserve to the services provided off reserve, the FNCFS Program has a glaring flaw. While FNCFS Agencies are required to comply with provincial/territorial legislation and standards, the FNCFS Program funding authorities are not based on provincial/territorial legislation or service standards. Instead, they are based on funding levels and formulas that can be inconsistent with the applicable legislation and standards. They also fail to consider the actual service needs of First Nations children and families, which are often higher than those off reserve. Moreover, the way in which the funding formulas and the program authorities function prevents an effective comparison with the provincial systems. The provinces/territory often do not use funding formulas and the way they manage cost variables is often very different. Instead of modifying its system to effectively adapt it to the provincial/territorial systems in order to achieve reasonable comparability; AANDC maintains its funding formulas and incorporates the few variables it has managed to obtain from the provinces/territory, such as salaries, into those formulas.

[389] Given the current funding structure for the FNCFS Program is not adapted to provincial/territorial legislation and standards, it often creates funding deficiencies for such items as salaries and benefits, training, cost of living, legal costs, insurance premiums, travel, remoteness, multiple offices, capital infrastructure, culturally appropriate programs and services, band representatives, and least disruptive measures. It is difficult, if not impossible, for many FNCFS Agencies to comply with provincial/territorial child and family services legislation and standards without appropriate funding for these items; or, in the case of many small and remote agencies, to even provide child and family services. Effectively, the FNCFS funding formulas provide insufficient funding to many FNCFS Agencies to address the needs of their clientele. AANDC's funding methodology controls their ability to improve outcomes for children and families and to ensure reasonably comparable child and family services on and off reserve. Despite various reports and evaluations of the FNCFS Program identifying AANDC's "reasonable comparability" standard as being inadequately defined and measured, it still remains an unresolved issue for the program.

[390] Notwithstanding budget surpluses for some agencies, additional funding or reallocations from other programs, the evidence still indicates funding is insufficient. The Panel finds AANDC's argument suggesting otherwise is unreasonable given the preponderance of evidence outlined above. In addition, the reallocation of funds from other AANDC programs, such as housing and infrastructure, to meet the maintenance costs of the FNCFS Program has been described by the Auditor General of Canada as being unsustainable and as also negatively impacting other important social programs for First Nations on reserve. Again, recommendations by the Auditor General and Standing Committee on Public Accounts on this point have largely gone unanswered by AANDC.

[391] Furthermore, in areas where the FNCFS Program is complemented by other federal programs aimed at addressing the needs of children and families on reserve, there is also a lack of coordination between the different programs. The evidence indicates that federal government departments often work in silos. This practice results in service gaps, delays or denials and, overall, adverse impacts on First Nations children and families on reserves. Jordan's Principle was meant to address this issue; however, its narrow interpretation by AANDC and Health Canada ignores a large number of disputes that can arise and need to be addressed under this Principle.

[392] While seemingly an improvement on Directive 20-1 and more advantageous than the EPFA, the application of the 1965 Agreement in Ontario also results in denials of services and adverse effects for First Nations children and families. For instance, given the agreement has not been updated for quite some time, it does not account for changes made over the years to provincial legislation for such things as mental health and other prevention services. This is further compounded by a lack of coordination amongst federal programs in dealing with health and social services that affect children and families in need, despite those types of programs being synchronized under Ontario's Child and Family Services Act. The lack of surrounding services to support the delivery of child and family services on-reserve, especially in remote and isolated communities, exacerbates the gap further. There is also discordance between Ontario's legislation and standards for providing culturally appropriate services to First Nations children and families through the appointment of a Band Representative and AANDC's lack of funding thereof. Tellingly, AANDC's position is that it is not required to cost-share services that are not included in the 1965 Agreement.

[393] Overall, AANDC's method of providing funding to ensure the safety and well-being of First Nations children on reserve and in the Yukon, by supporting the delivery of culturally appropriate child and family services that are in accordance with provincial/territorial legislation and standards and provided in a reasonably comparable manner to those provided off reserve in similar circumstances, falls far short of its objective. In fact, the evidence demonstrates adverse effects for many First Nations children and families living on reserve and in the Yukon, including a denial of adequate child and family services, by the application of AANDC's FNCFS Program, funding formulas and other related provincial/territorial agreements. These findings are consistent with those of the NPR, Wen:De reports, Auditor General of Canada reports and Standing Committee on Public Accounts reports. Again, the Panel accepts the findings in those reports and has relied on them to make its own findings. Those findings are also corroborated by the other testimonial and documentary evidence outlined above, including the internal documents emanating from AANDC.

[394] As will be seen in the next section, the adverse effects generated by the FNCFS Program, corresponding funding formulas and other related provincial/territorial agreements perpetuate disadvantages historically suffered by First Nations people.

C. Race and/or national or ethnic origin is a factor in the adverse impacts or denials [395] As mentioned above, there is no dispute in this case that First Nations possess the characteristics of race and/or national or ethnic origin. Discrimination claims regarding Aboriginal peoples have been founded on both grounds (see for example The Queen v. Drybones, [1970] SCR 282; Bear v. Canada (Attorney General), 2003 FCA 40; Bignell-Malcolm v. Ebb and Flow Indian Band, 2008 CHRT 3; and Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse c. Blais, 2007 QCTDP 11).

[396] The provision of child and family services under the FNCFS Program and the other provincial agreements are specifically aimed at First Nations living on reserve. Under the Yukon Agreement, the services are aimed at all First Nations living in the territory. That is, the determination of the public to which the services are offered is based uniquely on the race and/or ethnic origin of the service recipients. Pursuant to the application of the FNCFS Program, corresponding funding formulas and the other provincial/territorial agreements, First Nations people living on reserve and in the Yukon are prima facie adversely differentiated and/or denied services because of their race and/or national or ethnic origin in the provision of child and family services.

[397] AANDC argues there is no evidence that any changes to the FNCFS Program and corresponding funding formulas or the other related provincial/territorial agreements would lead to better outcomes for First Nations children and families. Therefore, it argues the Complainants have failed to establish a prima facie case of discrimination. In any event, the question of whether federal funding is sufficient to meet a perceived need is beyond the scope of an investigation into discrimination under section 5 of the CHRA.

[398] The prima facie discrimination analysis is not concerned with proposed outcomes. It is concerned with adverse impacts and whether a prohibited ground is a factor in any adverse impacts. Proposed outcomes only come into play if the complaint is substantiated and an order from the Tribunal is required to rectify the discrimination under section 53(2) of the CHRA. The Panel also disagrees that the question of whether funding is sufficient to meet a perceived need is beyond the scope of an investigation into discrimination under the CHRA. That question and evidence related thereto informs the ultimate determination to be made in this case: whether First Nations children and families residing on-reserve have an opportunity equal with other individuals in accessing child and family services. That is, it addresses the issue of substantive equality.

i. Substantive equality

[399] The purpose of the CHRA is to give effect to the principle of equality. That "all individuals should have an opportunity equal with other individuals to make for themselves the lives that they are able and wish to have and to have their needs accommodated, consistent with their duties and obligations as members of society" (CHRA at s. 2, emphasis added). The equality jurisprudence under section 15 of the Charter informs the content of the CHRA's equality statement (see Caring Society FCA at para. 19). In this regard, the Supreme Court has consistently held that equality is not necessarily about treating everyone the same. As mentioned above, "identical treatment may frequently produce serious inequality" (Andrews at p. 164).

[400] As articulated in Vriend v. Alberta, [1998] 1 SCR 493 at para. 69, "[i]t is easy to say that everyone who is just like "us" is entitled to equality […] it is more difficult to say that those who are "different" from us in some way should have the same equality rights that we enjoy". In other words, true equality and the accommodation of differences, what is termed 'substantive equality', will frequently require the making of distinctions (see Andrews at pp. 168-169). That is, in some cases "discrimination can accrue from a failure to take positive steps to ensure that disadvantaged groups benefit equally from services offered to the general public" (see Eldridge at para. 78).

[401] In Eldridge, the issue was whether the failure to provide sign language interpreters for hearing impaired persons as part of a publicly funded scheme for the provision of medical care was in violation of section 15 of the Charter. The Supreme Court held that discrimination stemmed from the actions of subordinate authorities, such as hospitals, who acted as agents of the government in providing the medical services set out in legislation. However, the Legislature, in defining its objective as guaranteeing access to a range of medical services, could not evade its obligations under section 15 of the Charter to provide those services without discrimination by appointing hospitals to carry out that objective. The medical care system applied equally to the entire population of the province, but the lack of interpreters prevented hearing impaired persons from benefitting from the system to the same extent as hearing persons. The legislation was discriminatory because it had the effect of denying someone the equal protection or benefit of the law.

[402] In determining whether there has been discrimination in a substantive sense, the analysis must also be undertaken in a purposive manner "…taking into account the full social, political and legal context of the claim" (see Law v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1999] 1 SCR 497 at para. 30). For Aboriginal peoples in Canada, this context includes a legacy of stereotyping and prejudice through colonialism, displacement and residential schools (see R. v. Turpin, [1989] 1 SCR 1296 at p. 1332; Corbiere v. Canada (Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs), [1999] 2 SCR 203 at para. 66; Lovelace v. Ontario, [2000] 1 SCR 950 at para. 69; R. v. Kapp, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 483 at para. 59; and, R. v. Ipeelee, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 433 at para. 60).

[403] In providing the benefit of the FNCFS Program and the other related provincial/territorial agreements, AANDC is obliged to ensure that its involvement in the provision of child and family services does not perpetuate the historical disadvantages endured by Aboriginal peoples. If AANDC's conduct widens the gap between First Nations and the rest of Canadian society rather than narrowing it, then it is discriminatory (see A at para. 332; and, Eldridge at para. 73).

[404] The evidence in this case not only indicates various adverse effects on First Nations children and families by the application of AANDC's FNCFS Program, corresponding funding formulas and other related provincial/territorial agreements, but also that these adverse effects perpetuate historical disadvantages suffered by Aboriginal peoples, mainly as a result of the Residential Schools system.

ii. Impact of the Residential Schools system

[405] Please note that the information below contains graphic facts about Residential Schools. If this information causes distress, especially for survivors and their families, a 24-hour Indian Residential Schools Crisis Line has been set up to provide support, including emotional and crisis referral services:

a. History of Residential Schools

[406] Dr. John Milloy, a historian and author of A National Crime, The Canadian Government and the Residential School System, 1879 to 1986 (Winnipeg: University of Manitoba Press, 2006) [A National Crime]), was qualified as an expert on the history of Residential Schools before the Tribunal. His evidence was uncontroverted and supported by official archives and other documents referenced in his book. As such, the Panel accepts Dr. Milloy's evidence as fact.

[407] During the Residential Schools era, Aboriginal children were removed from their homes, often forcibly, and brought to residential schools to be "civilized". Living conditions in many cases were appalling, giving place to disease, hunger, stress, and despair. Children were often cold, overworked, shamed and could not speak their native language for fear of severe punishment, including some students who had needles inserted into their tongues. Many children were verbally, sexually and/or physically abused. There were instances where students were forced to eat their own vomit. Some children were locked in closets, cages, and basements. Others managed to run away, but some of those who did so during the winter months died in the cold weather. Many children committed suicide as a result of attending a Residential School.

[408] Overall, a large number of Aboriginal children under the supervision of the Residential Schools system died while "in-care" (see A National Crime at p. 51). Many of those who managed to survive the ordeal are psychologically scarred as a result. In addition to the impacts on individuals, Dr. Milloy also explained how the Residential Schools affected First Nations communities as a whole. In losing future generations to the Residential Schools, the culture, language and the very survival of many First Nations communities was put in jeopardy.

[409] Elder Robert Joseph, from the Kwakwaka'wakw community, gave a very moving and detailed account of his personal experience in the Residential Schools system. According to Elder Joseph, abuse, strip searches, withholding gifts and visits from family members, and public shaming were very commonplace. In his view, some of the strip searches were actually veiled instances of sexual assault. In one instance, as a form of punishment, he recounted being stripped naked in front of the boys' division of the school and told to bend over. He also spoke of children being locked in closets and cages and the prevalence of racist remarks.

[410] Elder Joseph's experience gave him a deep sense of loneliness and he turned to alcohol to cope with the despair. He has since turned his life around and is now an advocate for reconciliation and healing for Aboriginal people.

[411] The Government of Canada has recognized the impacts and consequences of the Residential Schools system. In a 2008 Statement of Apology to former students of Residential Schools (see Annex, ex. 52), former Prime Minister Stephen Harper stated:

> The treatment of children in Indian Residential Schools is a sad chapter in our history.
> For more than a century, Indian Residential Schools separated over 150,000 Aboriginal children from their families and communities. In the 1870's, the federal government, partly in order to meet its obligation to educate Aboriginal children, began to play a role in the development and administration of these schools. Two primary objectives of the Residential Schools system were to remove and isolate children from the influence of their homes, families, traditions and cultures, and to assimilate them into the dominant culture. These objectives were based on the assumption Aboriginal cultures and spiritual beliefs were inferior and unequal. Indeed, some sought, as it was infamously said, "to kill the Indian in the child". Today, we recognize that this policy of assimilation was wrong, has caused great harm, and has no place in our country.

The government now recognizes that the consequences of the Indian Residential Schools policy were profoundly negative and that this policy has had a lasting and damaging impact on Aboriginal culture, heritage and language. While some former students have spoken positively about their experiences at residential schools, these stories are far overshadowed by tragic accounts of the emotional, physical and sexual abuse and neglect of helpless children, and their separation from powerless families and communities.

The legacy of Indian Residential Schools has contributed to social problems that continue to exist in many communities today.

To the approximately 80,000 living former students, and all family members and communities, the Government of Canada now recognizes that it was wrong to forcibly remove children from their homes and we apologize for having done this. We now recognize that it was wrong to separate children from rich and vibrant cultures and traditions that it created a void in many lives and communities, and we apologize for having done this. We now recognize that, in separating children from their families, we undermined the ability of many to adequately parent their own children and sowed the seeds for generations to follow, and we apologize for having done this. We now recognize that, far too often, these institutions gave rise to abuse or neglect and were inadequately controlled, and we apologize for failing to protect you. Not only did you suffer these abuses as children, but as you became parents, you were powerless to protect your own children from suffering the same experience, and for this we are sorry.

The burden of this experience has been on your shoulders for far too long. The burden is properly ours as a Government, and as a country. There is no place in Canada for the attitudes that inspired the Indian Residential Schools system to ever prevail again. You have been working on recovering from this experience for a long time and in a very real sense, we are now joining you on this journey. The Government of Canada sincerely apologizes and asks > the forgiveness of the Aboriginal peoples of this country for failing them so profoundly.

[412] In the spirit of reconciliation, the Panel also acknowledges the suffering caused by Residential Schools. Rooted in racist and neocolonialist attitudes, the individual and collective trauma imposed on Aboriginal people by the Resident Schools system is one of the darkest aspects of Canadian history. As will be explained in the following section, the effects of Residential Schools continue to impact First Nations children, families and communities to this day.

b. Transformation of Residential Schools into an aspect of the child welfare system [413] Residential Schools operated as a "school system" from the 1880's until the 1960's, when it became a marked component of the child welfare system. In about 1969, the Church's involvement in the Residential Schools system ceased, and the federal government took over sole management of the institutions. At around the same time, new regulations came into effect outlining who could attend Residential Schools, placing an emphasis on orphans and "neglected" children. The primary role of many Residential Schools changed from a focus on "education" to a focus on "child welfare". Despite this, many children were not sent home, because their parents were assessed as not being able to assume the responsibility for the care of their children (see A National Crime at pp. 211-212; and, testimony of Dr. Milloy, Transcript Vol. 34 at pp. 19-20).

[414] Over a 50-year period, between the 1930's to the 1980's, the number of schools declined steadily from 78 schools in 1930 down to 12 schools in 1980. The last school closed in 1986. The FNCFS Program is then implemented in 1990.

c. Intergenerational trauma of Residential Schools

[415] Dr. Amy Bombay, Ph.D. in neuroscience and M.Sc. in psychology, was qualified as an expert on the psychological effects and transmission of stress and trauma on wellbeing. She spoke about the intergenerational transmission of trauma among the offspring of Residential School survivors. The Panel finds Dr. Bombay's evidence reliable and helpful in understanding the impacts of the individual and collective trauma experienced by Aboriginal peoples and finds her evidence highly relevant to the case at hand.

[416] Dr. Bombay explained how Residential Schools fits into the larger traumatic history that Aboriginal peoples have been exposed to:

> …for indigenous groups in Canada and worldwide, colonialism has comprised multiple collective traumas […] these include things like military conquest, epidemic diseases and forced relocation.
>
> So Indian residential schools is really just one example of one collective trauma which is part of a larger traumatic history that aboriginal peoples have already been exposed to.

[417] According to Dr. Bombay, these collective traumas have had a cumulative effect over time, namely on individual and community health (see Transcript Vol. 40 at p. 83). In her words: "these collective effects are greater than the sum of the individual effects" (Transcript Vol. 40 at p. 82). Similar effects have been shown in other populations and in other groups who have undergone similar collective traumas, such as Holocaust survivors, Japanese Americans subjected to internment during World War II, and survivors of the Turkish genocide of Armenians (see Transcript Vol. 40 at pp. 111-112). To measure and describe the fact that some groups have undergone this chronic exposure to collective traumas, Dr. Maria Yellow Horse Brave Heart of the University of New Mexico coined the term "historical trauma", which is defined as "…the cumulative emotional and psychological wounding over the lifespan across generations emanating from massive group trauma" (see testimony of Dr. Bombay, Transcript Vol. 40 at pp. 94-95).

[418] For Residential School survivors, Dr. Bombay indicated that they are more likely to suffer from various physical and mental health problems compared to Aboriginal adults who did not attend. For example, Residential School survivors report higher levels of psychological distress compared to those who did not attend, and they are also more likely to be diagnosed with a chronic physical health condition (see Transcript Vol. 40 at pp. 109-110).

[419] With respect to social outcomes, Dr. Bombay explained some of the intergenerational impacts of Residential Schools as follows:

> …numerous qualitative research studies have shown that the lack of traditional parental role models in residential schools impeded the transmission of traditional positive childrearing practices that they otherwise would have learned from their parents, and that seeing -- being exposed to the neglect and abuse and the poor treatment that a lot of the caregivers in residential schools -- how they treated the children, actually instilled negative -- a lot of negative parenting practices, as this was the only models of parenting that they were exposed to.

[420] Generationally, the above noted impacts could descend from the Residential School survivor, to their children and then to their grandchildren. In this regard, Dr. Bombay indicated, relying on the 2002-2003 Regional Health Survey, that 43% of First Nations adults on-reserve perceived that their parents' attendance at Residential School negatively affected the parenting that they received while growing up; 73.4% believed that their grandparents' attendance at Residential School negatively affected the parenting that their parents received; 37.2% of First Nations adults whose parents attended Residential School had contemplated suicide in their life versus 25.7% whose parents did not; and, the grandchildren of survivors were also at an increased risk for suicide as 28.4% had attempted suicide versus only 13.1% of those whose grandparents did not attend Residential School (see Transcript at Vol. 40 pp. 110-11, 114-115).

[421] In her own recent comprehensive research assessing the health and well-being of First Nations people living on reserve, Dr. Bombay found that children of Residential School survivors reported greater adverse childhood experiences and greater traumas in adulthood, all of which appeared to contribute to greater depressive symptoms in Residential School offspring (see Annex, ex. 53 at p. 373; see also Transcript Vol. 40 at pp. 69, 71).

funding formulas and other related provincial/territorial agreements perpetuate the damage done by Residential Schools rather than attempting to address past harms. The history of Residential Schools and the intergenerational trauma it has caused is another reason - on top of some of the other underlying risk factors affecting Aboriginal children and families such as poverty and poor infrastructure - that exemplify the additional need of First Nations people to receive adequate child and family services, including least disruptive measures and, especially, services that are culturally appropriate.

[423] AANDC submits that in determining what services to provide and how to deliver them, the FNCFS Agencies decide what is "culturally appropriate" for their community. The definition of what is culturally appropriate depends on the specific culture of each First Nation community. According to AANDC, this is best left to the discretion of the FNCFS Agencies or First Nations leadership.

[424] However, in the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada, the Auditor General indicated that "[t]o deliver this program as the policy requires, we expected that the Department would, at a minimum know what "culturally appropriate services" means" (at s. 4.18, p. 12). That is, AANDC had no assurances that the FNCFS Program funds child welfare services that are culturally appropriate. In response, AANDC developed a guiding principle for what it understands culturally appropriate services to be:

> the Government of Canada provides funding, as a matter of social policy, to support the delivery of culturally appropriate services among First Nation communities that acknowledge and respect values, beliefs and unique circumstances being served. As such, culturally appropriate services encourage activities such as kinship care options where a child is placed with an extended family member so that cultural identity and traditions may be maintained.
> (see AANDC's Response to the 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, emphasis added)

[425] Even with this guiding principle, if funding is restricted to provide such services, then the principle is rendered meaningless. A glaring example of this is the denial of funding for Band Representatives under the 1965 Agreement in Ontario. Another is the assumptions built into Directive 20-1 and the EPFA. If funding does not correspond to the actual child welfare needs of a specific First Nation community, then how is it expected to provide services that are culturally appropriate? With unrealistic funding, how are some First Nations communities expected to address the effects of Residential Schools? It will be difficult if not impossible to do, resulting in more kids ending up in care and perpetuating the cycle of control that outside forces have exerted over Aboriginal culture and identity.

[426] Similar to the Residential Schools era, today, the fate and future of many First Nations children is still being determined by the government, whether it is through the application of restrictive and inadequate funding formulas or through bilateral agreements with the provinces. The purpose of having a First Nation community deliver child and family services, and to be involved through a Band Representative, is to ensure services are culturally appropriate and reflect the needs of the community. This in turn may help legitimize the child and family services in the eyes of the community, increasing their effectiveness, and ultimately help rebuild individuals, families and communities that have been heavily affected by the Residential Schools system and other historical trauma.

[427] In this regard, it should be noted again that the federal government is in a fiduciary relationship with Aboriginal peoples and has undertaken to improve outcomes for First Nations children and families in the provision of child and family services. On this basis, more has to be done to ensure that the provision of child and family services on First Nations reserves is meeting the best interest of those communities and, in the particular context of this case, the best interest of First Nations children. This also corresponds to Canada's international commitments recognizing the special status of children and Indigenous peoples.

iii. Canada's international commitments to children and Indigenous peoples

[428] As stated earlier, Amnesty International was granted "Interested Party" status to assist the Tribunal in understanding the relevance of Canada's international human rights obligations to the Complaint. Amnesty International argues that the interpretation and application of the CHRA, and in particular of section 5, must respect Canada's international obligations as enunciated in various international United Nations instruments, such as the Convention on the Rights of the Child, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the Convention on Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination, the Universal Declaration on Human Rights and the Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples.

[429] Amnesty International also refers to the views of treaty bodies, such as the United Nations Human Rights Committee (UNHRC), the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR), the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) and the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) in support of its argument that when a treatment discriminates both on the basis of First Nations identity and because of residency, it constitutes multiple violations of the prohibition of discrimination, which is a peremptory norm of international law. Specifically, Amnesty International points to these bodies' recommendations that special attention must be given to the prohibition of discrimination against children.

[430] In AANDC's view, the international law concepts and arguments advanced by Amnesty International do not assist the Tribunal in interpreting and applying the CHRA to the facts of this Complaint. Rather, they see Amnesty International's arguments as a claim that the Government of Canada is in violation of its international obligations, which is beyond the purview of the Complaint.

[431] In order to form part of Canadian law, international treaties need national legislative implementation, unless they codify norms of customary international law that are already found in Canadian domestic law. However, when a country becomes party to a treaty or a covenant, it clearly indicates its adherence to the contents of such a treaty or covenant and therefore makes a commitment to implement its principles in its national legislation. This public engagement is solemn and binding in international law. It is a declaration from the country that its national legislation will reflect its international commitments. Therefore, international law remains relevant in interpreting the scope and content of human rights in Canadian law, as was underlined by the Supreme Court on numerous occasions since Chief Justice Dickson's dissent in Reference Re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), [1987] 1 SCR 313.

[432] The basic principle, which is not limited to Charter interpretation, is that "the Charter should generally be presumed to provide protection at least as great as that afforded by similar provisions in international human rights documents which Canada has ratified" (Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, [1989] 1 SCR 1038 at p. 1056). That is so because Parliament and the provincial legislatures are presumed to respect the principles of international law (see Baker at para. 81).

[433] This approach often leads the Supreme Court to look at decisions and recommendations of human right bodies to interpret the scope and content of domestic law provisions in the light of international law (see for example Canada (Human Rights Commission) v. Taylor, [1990] 3 SCR 892 at p. 920; B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 SCR 315 at pp. 149-150; Divito v. Canada (Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness), 2013 SCC 47 at paras 26-27; and, Saskatchewan Federation of Labour v. Saskatchewan, 2015 SCC 4 at paras 154-160).

[434] In recent years, the Supreme Court has been willing to expand the relevance of international law and to give effect to Canada's role and actions in the development of norms of international law, particularly in the area of human rights (see United States v. Burns, 2001 SCC 7 at para. 81 [Burns]; and, Canada (Justice) v. Khadr, 2008 SCC 28 at paras. 2-3). In Burns, the Supreme Court found that Canada's advocacy for the abolition of the death penalty, and efforts to bring about change in extradition arrangements when a fugitive faces the death penalty, prevented it from extraditing someone to the United States facing the same sentence without obtaining assurance that it would not be carried out. The same reasoning applies to the case at hand as Canada has expressed its views internationally on the importance of human rights on numerous occasions.

[435] Indeed, since the foundation of the United Nations (the UN), Canada has been actively involved in the promotion of human rights on the international scene. This began with the participation of the Canadian Director of the UN Secretariat's Division for Human Rights, Mr. John Humphrey, in writing the preliminary draft of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (the Universal Declaration), in 1947. Today, Canada still voices itself as a strong supporter of human rights at the international level.

[436] Canada's international human rights obligations with respect to equality and non-discrimination stem from various legal instruments. Similarities can be seen in the wording of both domestic and international human rights instruments and in the scope and content of their provisions. The close relationship between Canadian and international human rights law can also be seen both in the periodic reports submitted by Canada to various international treaty monitoring bodies on the steps taken domestically to give effect to the obligations flowing from the treaties and in the monitoring bodies' recommendations to Canada.

[438] Initially, the Universal Declaration was intended as a guide for governments in their efforts to guarantee human rights domestically. It was also meant to enunciate human rights principles that would be further developed into a legally binding convention. This eventually led to the adoption of two covenants and two optional protocols that, along with the Universal Declaration, are considered to form the International Bill of Rights.

[439] The first of those two covenants was the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 999 U.N.T.S. 171 (the ICCPR), entered into force by Canada on August 19, 1976. At the same time, Canada recognized the jurisdiction of the UNHRC to hear individual complaints by ratifying the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 999 U.N.T.S. 302. Articles 2 and 26 of the ICCPR guarantee equality and prohibit discrimination in terms that are similar to those of the Universal Declaration.

[440] In General Comment 18, thirty-seventh session, 10 November 1989 at paragraph 7, the UNHRC stated that the term "discrimination" as used in the ICCPR should be understood to imply:

> any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference which is based on any ground such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status, and which has the purpose or effect of nullifying or impairing the recognition, enjoyment or exercise by all persons, on an equal footing, of all rights and freedoms.

The UNHRC went on to state that the aim of the protection is substantive equality, and to achieve this aim States may be required to take specific measures (see at paras. 5, 8, and 12-13).

[441] The second of the two covenants that stem directly from the Universal Declaration is the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 993 U.N.T.S. 3 (the ICESCR), which Canada entered into force on August 19, 1976. Article 2(2) guarantees the exercise of the rights protected without discrimination. Article 10 provides that special measures of protection and assistance should be taken on behalf of all children and young persons without any discrimination for reasons of parentage or other conditions.

[442] The ICESCR is considered to be of progressive application. However, in General Comment No. 20, 2 July 2009 (E/C.12/GC/20), the CESCR stated that, given their importance, the principles of equality and non-discrimination are of immediate application, notwithstanding the provisions of article 2 of the ICESR (see paras. 5 and 7). The CESCR also affirmed that the aim of the ICESCR is to achieve substantive equality by "…paying sufficient attention to groups of individuals which suffer historical or persistent prejudice instead of merely comparing the formal treatment of individuals in similar situations" (at paras. 8; see also paras. 9 and 10). It added that the exercise of covenant rights should not be conditional on a person's place of residence (see at para. 34).

[443] In a report to the CESCR outlining key measures it adopted for the period of January 2005 to December 2009 to enhance its implementation of the ICESCR, Canada reported on the FNCFS Program and declared that "[t]he anticipated result is a more secure and stable family environment and improved outcomes for Indian children ordinarily resident on reserve" (see Canada's Sixth Report on the United Nations' International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (Minister of Public Works and Government Services, 2013) at para. 103). Canada also reported that it had begun transitioning the FNCFS Program to a more prevention based model, the EPFA, "…on a jurisdiction-by-jurisdiction basis with ready and willing First Nations and provincial/territorial partners […] with the goal to have all jurisdictions on board by 2013" (at paras. 105-106). While the Government of Canada made this undertaking, the evidence is clear that this goal was not met.

[444] In addition to the covenants that protect human rights in general, Canada is a party to legal instruments that focus on specific issues or aim to protect specific groups of persons. Canada is a party to the International Convention for the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination, 660 U.N.T.S. 195 (the ICERD), ratified in 1970. The ICERD clarifies the prohibition of discrimination found in the Universal Declaration, to which it refers to in its preamble. Articles 1 and 2 define racial discrimination and direct States to take all necessary measures to ensure the adequate development and protection of certain racial groups or individuals belonging to them. The purpose is to guarantee them the full and equal enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms, including special measures whenever warranted. Article 5 further highlights rights whose enjoyment must be free of discrimination, including the right to social services, which includes public health, medical care and social security.

[445] The monitoring body of the ICERD, the CERD, has discussed the meaning and scope of special measures in the ICERD. It has expressed a similar understanding of substantive equality as Canadian courts (see CERD, General Recommendation No. 32, September 24, 2009 (CERD/C/GC/32) at para. 8). In addition, it recognized that "special measures" that may be called for in order to achieve effective equality "…include the full span of legislative, executive, administrative, budgetary and regulatory instruments, at every level in the State apparatus…" (at para. 13).

[446] In 2011, Canada reported to the CERD on the measures taken domestically to implement the ICERD. The CERD made several recommendations, including: "[d]iscontinuing the removal of Aboriginal children from their families and providing family and child care services on reserves with sufficient funding" [see Consideration of reports submitted by States parties under article 9 of the convention, Concluding observations of the CERD, 9 March 2012 (CERD/C/CAN/CO/19-20) at para. 19(f)].

[447] Although AANDC argues that the federal government is merely funding child welfare services on-reserve as a matter of social policy, budgetary measures in and of themselves are an important component of the steps to be taken in order to achieve substantive equality for First Nations children. The recommendation of the CERD, read with the views it expressed in General Recommendation No. 32, indicate that the CERD sees insufficient funding of child care services on reserve as inhibiting substantive equality for First Nations in the provision of child and family services.

[448] Another important international instrument aiming at the protection of a specific group of persons that is relevant to the present case is the Convention on the Rights of the Child, Can. T.S. 1992 No. 3 (the CRC), entered into force by Canada on January 12, 1992. Children have the same human rights as adults. However, they are more vulnerable and in need of protection that addresses their special needs. Consequently, the CRC focuses on giving them the special care, assistance and legal protection that they need (see in particular articles 2, 3, 5, 7.1, 8.1, 9, 9.1, 18.1, 20, 25 and 30). Furthermore, when it ratified the CRC, Canada made a Statement of Understanding expressing its view that, in assessing what measures are appropriate to implementing the rights recognized in the CRC, the rights of Aboriginal children to enjoy their own culture, to profess and practice their own religion and to use their own language must not be denied (Convention on the Rights of the Child, Declarations and Reservations, Canada, online: United Nations <http://www.treaties.un.org>).

[449] The CRC's monitoring body, the CRC Committee, stressed the importance of culturally appropriate social services for indigenous children (see General Comment No. 11, February 12, 2009 (CRC/C/GC/11) at para. 25). With respect to childcare and support services, Canada reported that "[t]he Government of Canada plays a supporting role by providing a range of child and family benefits and transferring funds to other governments in Canada based on shared goals and objectives" (Canada's Third and Fourth Reports on the Convention on the Rights of the Child, 20 November 2009 at para. 49). Canada also reported, as it did to the CESCR, that it is incrementally shifting its child welfare programs for Aboriginal children to a prevention-focused approach and that it expected that all agencies would be using the prevention-focused approach by 2013 (see at para. 98).

[450] In response to Canada, the CRC Committee expressed deep concern "…at the high number of children in alternative care and at the frequent removal of children from their families as a first resort in cases of neglect or financial hardship or disability" (Concluding observations on the combined third and fourth periodic report of Canada, adopted by the Committee at its sixty-first session (17 September – 5 October 2012), 6 December 2012 (CRC/C/CAN/CO/3-4) at para. 55). Among other things, the CRC Committee recommended that Canada intensify cooperation with communities and community leaders to find suitable alternative care solutions for children in these communities [see at para. 56(f)]. It further recommended that Canada "[e]nsure that funding and other support, including welfare services, provided to Aboriginal, African-Canadian, and other minority children, including welfare services, is comparable in quality and accessibility to services provided to other children in the State party and is adequate to meet their needs" [see at para. 68(c)].

[451] Again, the recommendations of the CRC Committee reinforce the need for adequate funding, linked to the needs of First Nations children and families, in order to achieve substantive equality in the provision of child and family services on-reserve.

[452] Finally, the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, GA Res. 61/295, UN GAOR, 61st Sess., Supp. No 49 Vol III, UN Doc A/61/49 (2007) (the UNDRIP), which was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on September 13, 2007, was endorsed by Canada on November 12, 2010. Article 2 provides that Indigenous peoples and individuals are free and equal to all other peoples and individuals and have the right to be free from any kind of discrimination, in the exercise of their rights, in particular rights based on their indigenous origin or identity. Although this international instrument is, at the time being, a declaration and not a treaty or a covenant, and is not legally binding except to the extent that some of its provisions reflect customary international law, when Canada endorsed it, it reaffirmed its commitment to "…improve the well-being of Aboriginal Canadians"(Canada's Statement of Support on the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, November 12, 2010, online: Indigenous and Northern Affairs Canada <http://www.aadnc-aandc.gc.ca>).

[453] The international instruments and treaty monitoring bodies referred to above view equality to be substantive and not merely formal. Consequently, they consider that specific measures, including of a budgetary nature, are often required in order to achieve substantive equality. These international legal instruments also reinforce the need for due attention to be paid to the unique situation and needs of children and First Nations people, especially the combination of those two vulnerable groups: First Nations children.

[454] The concerns expressed by international monitoring bodies mirror many of the issues raised in this Complaint. The declarations made by Canada in its periodic reports to the various monitoring bodies clearly show that the federal government is aware of the steps to be taken domestically to address these issues. Canada's statements and commitments, whether expressed on the international scene or at the national level, should not be allowed to remain empty rhetoric.

[455] Substantive equality and Canada's international obligations require that First Nations children on-reserve be provided child and family services of comparable quality and accessibility as those provided to all Canadians off-reserve, including that they be sufficiently funded to meet the real needs of First Nations children and families and do not perpetuate historical disadvantage.

VI. Complaint substantiated

[456] In light of the above, the Panel finds the Complainants have presented sufficient evidence to establish a prima facie case of discrimination under section 5 of the CHRA. Specifically, they prima facie established that First Nations children and families living on reserve and in the Yukon are denied [s. 5(a)] equal child and family services and/or differentiated adversely [s. 5(b)] in the provision of child and family services.

[457] Through the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements, AANDC provides a service intended to "ensure", "arrange", "support" and/or "make available" child and family services to First Nations on reserve. With specific regard to the FNCFS Program, the objective is to ensure culturally appropriate child and family services to First Nations children and families on reserve and in the Yukon that are intended to be in accordance with provincial/territorial legislation and standards and provided in a reasonably comparable manner to those provided off reserve in similar circumstances. However, the evidence in this case demonstrates that AANDC does more than just ensure the provision of child and family services to First Nations, it controls the provision of those services through its funding mechanisms to the point where it negatively impacts children and families on reserve.

[458] AANDC's design, management and control of the FNCFS Program, along with its corresponding funding formulas and the other related provincial/territorial agreements have resulted in denials of services and created various adverse impacts for many First Nations children and families living on reserves. Non-exhaustively, the main adverse impacts found by the Panel are:

- The design and application of the Directive 20-1 funding formula, which provides funding based on flawed assumptions about children in care and population thresholds that do not accurately reflect the service needs of many on-reserve communities. This results in inadequate fixed funding for operation (capital costs, multiple offices, cost of living adjustment, staff salaries and benefits, training, legal, remoteness and travel) and prevention costs (primary, secondary and tertiary services to maintain children safely in their family homes), hindering the ability of FNCFS Agencies to provide provincially/territorially mandated child welfare services, let alone culturally appropriate services to First Nations children and families and, providing an incentive to bring children into care because eligible maintenance expenditures are reimbursable at cost.

- The current structure and implementation of the EPFA funding formula, which perpetuates the incentives to remove children from their homes and incorporates the flawed assumptions of Directive 20-1 in determining funding for operations and prevention, and perpetuating the adverse impacts of Directive 20-1 in many on-reserve communities.

- The failure to adjust Directive 20-1 funding levels, since 1995; along with funding levels under the EPFA, since its implementation, to account for inflation/cost of living;

- The application of the 1965 Agreement in Ontario that has not been updated to ensure on-reserve communities can comply fully with Ontario's Child and Family Services Act.

- The failure to coordinate the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements with other federal departments and government programs and services for First Nations on reserve, resulting in service gaps, delays and denials for First Nations children and families.

- The narrow definition and inadequate implementation of Jordan's Principle, resulting in service gaps, delays and denials for First Nations children.

[459] The FNCFS Program, corresponding funding formulas and other related provincial/territorial agreements only apply to First Nations people living on-reserve and in the Yukon. It is only because of their race and/or national or ethnic origin that they suffer the adverse impacts outlined above in the provision of child and family services. Furthermore, these adverse impacts perpetuate the historical disadvantage and trauma suffered by Aboriginal people, in particular as a result of the Residential Schools system.

[460] AANDC's evidence and arguments challenging the Complainants' allegations of discrimination have been addressed throughout this decision. Overall, the Panel finds AANDC's position unreasonable, unconvincing and not supported by the preponderance of evidence in this case. Otherwise, as mentioned earlier, AANDC did not raise a statutory exception under sections 15 or 16 of the CHRA.

[462] This concept of reasonable comparability is one of the issues at the heart of the problem. AANDC has difficulty defining what it means and putting it into practice, mainly because its funding authorities and interpretation thereof are not in line with provincial/territorial legislation and standards. Despite not being experts in the area of child welfare and knowing that funding according to its authorities is often insufficient to meet provincial/territorial legislation and standards, AANDC insists that FNCFS Agencies somehow abide by those standards and provide reasonably comparable child and family services. Instead of assessing the needs of First Nations children and families and using provincial legislation and standards as a reference to design an adequate program to address those needs, AANDC adopts an ad hoc approach to addressing needed changes to its program.

[463] This is exemplified by the implementation of the EPFA. AANDC makes improvements to its program and funding methodology, however, in doing so, also incorporates a cost-model it knows is flawed. AANDC tries to obtain comparable variables from the provinces to fit them into this cost-model, however, they are unable to obtain all the relevant variables given the provinces often do not calculate things in the same fashion or use a funding formula. By analogy, it is like adding support pillars to a house that has a weak foundation in an attempt to straighten and support the house. At some point, the foundation needs to be fixed or, ultimately, the house will fall down. Similarly, a REFORM of the FNCFS Program is needed in order to build a solid foundation for the program to address the real needs of First Nations children and families living on reserve.

[464] Not being experts in child welfare, AANDC's authorities are concerned with comparable funding levels; whereas provincial/territorial child and family services legislation and standards are concerned with ensuring service levels that are in line with sound social work practice and that meet the best interest of children. It is difficult, if not impossible, to ensure reasonably comparable child and family services where there is this dichotomy between comparable funding and comparable services. Namely, this methodology does not account for the higher service needs of many First Nations children and families living on reserve, along with the higher costs to deliver those services in many situations, and it highlights the inherent problem with the assumptions and population levels built into the FNCFS Program.

[465] AANDC's reasonable comparability standard does not ensure substantive equality in the provision of child and family services for First Nations people living on reserve. In this regard, it is worth repeating the Supreme Court's statement in Withler, at paragraph 59, that "finding a mirror group may be impossible, as the essence of an individual's or group's equality claim may be that, in light of their distinct needs and circumstances, no one is like them for the purposes of comparison". This statement fits the context of this complaint quite appropriately. That is, human rights principles, both domestically and internationally, require AANDC to consider the distinct needs and circumstances of First Nations children and families living on-reserve - including their cultural, historical and geographical needs and circumstances – in order to ensure equality in the provision of child and family services to them. A strategy premised on comparable funding levels, based on the application of standard funding formulas, is not sufficient to ensure substantive equality in the provision of child and family services to First Nations children and families living on-reserve.

[466] As a result, and having weighed all the evidence and argument in this case on a balance of probabilities, the Panel finds the Complaint substantiated.

[467] The Panel acknowledges the suffering of those First Nations children and families who are or have been denied an equitable opportunity to remain together or to be reunited in a timely manner. We also recognize those First Nations children and families who are or have been adversely impacted by the Government of Canada's past and current child welfare practices on reserves.

VII. Order

[468] As the Complaint has been substantiated, the Panel may make an order against AANDC pursuant to section 53(2) of the CHRA. The aim in making an order under section 53(2) is not to punish AANDC, but to eliminate discrimination (see Robichaud at para. 13). To accomplish this, the Tribunal's remedial discretion must be exercised on a principled basis, considering the link between the discriminatory practice and the loss claimed (see Chopra v. Canada (Attorney General), 2007 FCA 268 at para. 37). In other words, the Tribunal's remedial discretion must be exercised reasonably, in consideration of the particular circumstances of the case and the evidence presented (Hughes v. Elections Canada, 2010 CHRT 4 at para. 50).

[469] It is also important to reiterate that the CHRA gives rise to rights of vital importance. Those rights must be given full recognition and effect through the Act. In crafting remedies under the CHRA, the Tribunal's powers under section 53(2) must be given such fair, large and liberal interpretation as will best ensure the objects of the Act are obtained. Applying a purposive approach, remedies under the CHRA should be effective in promoting the right being protected and meaningful in vindicating the rights and freedoms of the victim of discrimination (see CN v. Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission), [1987] 1 SCR 1114 at p. 1134; and, Doucet-Boudreau at paras. 25 and 55).

[470] The Complainants, Commission and Interested Parties request a variety of remedies to address the findings in this Complaint, including declaratory orders; orders to cease the discriminatory practice and take measures to redress or prevent it from reoccurring; and, compensation under sections 53(2)(e) and 53(3) of the CHRA.

[471] Furthermore, unrelated to the remedies requested under section 53(2), the Panel is also seized of a previous motion from the Complainants for costs related to the allegation that AANDC abused the Tribunal's process through its late disclosure of documents.

A. Findings of discrimination

[472] The Caring Society requests several declarations be made by the Tribunal in order to clarify which aspects of the FNCFS Program, corresponding funding formulas and other related provincial/territorial agreements are discriminatory. According to the Caring Society, this Tribunal routinely provides declaratory relief in the form of findings of discrimination.

[473] Indeed, throughout this decision, and generally at paragraph 458 above, the Panel has outlined the main adverse impacts it has found in relation to the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements. As race and/or national or ethnic origin is a factor in those adverse impacts, the Panel concluded First Nations children and families living on reserve and in the Yukon are discriminated against in the provision of child and family services by AANDC. The Panel believes these findings address the Caring Society's request for declaratory relief.

B. Cease the discriminatory practice and take measures to redress and prevent it [474] Section 53(2)(a) of the CHRA allows the Tribunal to order that the person found to be engaging in the discriminatory practice "cease the discriminatory practice and take measures, in consultation with the Commission on the general purposes of the measures, to redress the practice or to prevent the same or a similar practice from occurring in future". Furthermore, section 53(2)(b) allows the Tribunal to order that the person "…make available to the victim of the discriminatory practice, on the first reasonable occasion, the rights, opportunities or privileges that are being or were denied the victim as a result of the practice".

[475] Pursuant to these sections of the CHRA, the Complainants and Commission request immediate relief for First Nations children. In their view, this can be accomplished by ordering AANDC to remove the most discriminatory aspects of the funding schemes it uses to fund FNCFS Agencies under the FNCFS Program and child and family services in Ontario under the 1965 Agreement; and, requiring AANDC to properly implement Jordan's Principle. Moving forward in the long term, the Complainants and Commission request other orders that AANDC reform the FNCFS Program and the 1965 Agreement to ensure equitable levels of service, including funding thereof, for First Nations child and family services on-reserve.

[476] The Caring Society has provided a detailed methodology of how this reform can be achieved. It proposes a three-step process to redesign the FNCFS Program: (1) reconvene the National Advisory Committee to identify discriminatory elements in the provision of funding to FNCFS Agencies and make recommendations thereon; (2) fund tri-partite regional tables to negotiate the implementation of equitable and culturally based funding mechanisms and policies for each region; and, (3) develop an independent expert structure with the authority and mandate to ensure AANDC maintains non-discriminatory and culturally appropriate First Nations child and family services.

[477] Relatedly, the Caring Society also requests the public posting of information regarding the FNCFS Program, Jordan's Principle and children in care to educate FNCFS Agencies and the public about AANDC's child welfare policies, practices and directives and to help prevent future discrimination. Furthermore, it asks that AANDC staff be trained on First Nations culture, historic disadvantage, human rights and social work.

[478] The AFN requests similar reform, including commissioning a study to determine the most effective means of providing care for First Nations children and families and greater performance measurements and evaluations of AANDC employees related to the provision of First Nations child and family services. Similarly, in Ontario, the COO requests that an independent study of funding and service levels for First Nations child welfare in Ontario based on the 1965 Agreement be conducted.

[479] Consistent with Canada's international obligations, Amnesty International stresses the need for a timely and effective remedy to achieve substantive equality for First Nations children and families on reserve, including increased funding, systemic structural changes to the way AANDC provides funding and a comprehensive and systematic monitoring mechanism for assuring non-repetition of breaches of the rights of First Nations children.

[480] AANDC submits that, while the Tribunal may order amendments to policy and provide guidance on the shape of amendments, it cannot prescribe the specific policy that must be adopted. According to AANDC, this is particularly appropriate in this case where the policy at issue is a complex scheme that takes into account competing priorities and must fit within broader governmental policy approaches. Such decisions are entitled to some considerable degree of deference and margin of reasonableness. Furthermore, AANDC argues the proposed remedy would intrude into the executive branch of government's role to establish public policy and direct the spending of public funds in accordance with fiscal priorities. AANDC is also concerned that some of the proposed reform measures are over-broad and beyond the scope of the Complaint. As such, it views aspects of the methodology proposed by the Complainants to be beyond the power of the Tribunal or any other court to order.

[481] The Panel is generally supportive of the requests for immediate relief and the methodologies for reforming the provision of child and family services to First Nations living on reserve, but also recognizes the need for balance espoused by AANDC. AANDC is ordered to cease its discriminatory practices and reform the FNCFS Program and 1965 Agreement to reflect the findings in this decision. AANDC is also ordered to cease applying its narrow definition of Jordan's Principle and to take measures to immediately implement the full meaning and scope of Jordan's principle.

[482] More than just funding, there is a need to refocus the policy of the program to respect human rights principles and sound social work practice. In the best interest of the child, all First Nations children and families living on-reserve should have an opportunity "…equal with other individuals to make for themselves the lives that they are able and wish to have and to have their needs accommodated, consistent with their duties and obligations as members of society" (CHRA at s. 2).

[483] That said, given the complexity and far-reaching effects of the relief sought, the Panel wants to ensure that any additional orders it makes are appropriate and fair, both in the short and long-term. Throughout these proceedings, the Panel reserved the right to ask clarification questions of the parties while it reviewed the evidence. While a discriminatory practice has occurred and is ongoing, the Panel is left with outstanding questions about how best to remedy that discrimination. The Panel requires further clarification from the parties on the actual relief sought, including how the requested immediate and long-term reforms can best be implemented on a practical, meaningful and effective basis.

[484] Within three weeks of the date of this decision, the Panel will contact the parties to determine a process for having its outstanding questions on remedy answered on an expeditious basis.

C. Compensation

[485] Under section 53(2)(e), the Tribunal can order compensation to the victim of discrimination for any pain and suffering that the victim experienced as a result of the discriminatory practice. In addition, section 53(3) provides for the Tribunal to order compensation to the victim if the discriminatory practice was engaged in wilfully or recklessly. Awards of compensation under each of those sections cannot exceed $20,000.

[486] The Caring Society asks the Panel to award compensation under section 53(3) for AANDC's wilful and reckless discriminatory conduct with respect to each First Nations child taken into care since February 2006 to the date of the award. In the Caring Society's view, as early as the 2000 findings of the NPR, AANDC voluntarily and egregiously omitted to rectify discrimination against First Nations children. It also notes that the federal government benefited for many years from the money it failed to devote to the provision of equal child and family services for First Nations children. As a result, it believes the maximum amount of $20,000 should be awarded per child. The Caring Society requests the compensation be placed in an independent trust to fund healing activities for the benefit of First Nations children who have suffered discrimination in the provision of child and family services.

[487] The AFN also requests compensation. It asks for an order that it, AANDC, the Caring Society and the Commission form an expert panel to establish appropriate individual compensation for children, parents and siblings impacted by the child welfare practices on reserve between 2006 and the date of the Tribunal's order.

[488] Amnesty International submits any compensation should address both physical and psychological damages, including the emotional harm and inherent indignity suffered as a result of the breach.

[489] AANDC submits there is insufficient evidence before the Tribunal to award the requested compensation. It argues the Caring Society's request is fundamentally flawed as it depends on the unproven premise that all these children were removed from their homes because of AANDC's funding practices. According to AANDC, the Caring Society's assertions overlook the complex nature of factors that lead to a child being removed from his or her home and, given the absence of individual evidence thereon, it is impossible for the Tribunal to assess compensation on an individual basis. Furthermore, AANDC submits the Complainants' authority to receive and distribute funds on behalf of "victims" has not been established.

[490] Similar to its comments above, the Panel has outstanding questions regarding the Complainants' request for compensation under sections 53(2)(e) and 53(3) of the CHRA. Again, within three weeks of the date of this decision, the Panel will contact the parties to determine a process for having its outstanding questions on remedy answered.

D. Costs for obstruction of process

[491] As part of a motion for disclosure decided in ruling 2013 CHRT 16, the Complainants requested costs from AANDC with respect to its alleged obstruction of the Tribunal's process. At that time, the Panel took the costs request under reserve and indicated the issue would be the subject of a subsequent ruling. The Complainants have reiterated their request for costs as part of their closing submissions on this Complaint. In response, AANDC reaffirmed its assertion that the Tribunal does not have the authority to award such costs.

[492] The Panel continues to reserve its ruling on the Complainants' request for costs in relation to the motion for disclosure decided in ruling 2013 CHRT 16. A ruling on the issue will be provided in due course.

E. Retention of jurisdiction

[493] The Complainants, Commission and Interested Parties request the Panel retain jurisdiction over this matter until any orders are fully implemented.

[494] As indicated above, the Panel has outstanding questions on the remedies being sought by the Complainants and Commission. A determination on those remedies is still to be made. As such, the Panel will maintain jurisdiction over this matter pending the determination of those outstanding remedies. Any further retention of jurisdiction will be re-evaluated when those determinations are made.

I. Introduction

> We believe that the Creator has entrusted us with the sacred responsibility to raise our families…for we realize healthy families are the foundation of strong and healthy communities. The future of our communities lies with our children, who need to be nurtured within their families and communities. (see 1996 report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples (RCAP), Gathering strength, vol. 3, p. 10 part of the Tribunal's evidence record).

[1] The Special Place of Children in Aboriginal Cultures

> Children hold a special place in Aboriginal cultures (...) They must be protected from harm (…). They bring a purity of vision to the world that can teach their elders. They carry within them the gifts that manifest themselves as they become teachers, mothers, hunters, councillors, artisans and visionaries. They renew the strength of the family, clan and village and make the elders young again with their joyful presence.
> Failure to care for these gifts bestowed on the family, and to protect children from the betrayal of others, is perhaps the greatest shame that can befall an Aboriginal family. It is a shame that countless Aboriginal families have experienced, some of them repeatedly over generations. (see RCAP, Gathering strength vol. 3, p. 21).

[2] This Panel recognizes the shame and the pain and suffering experienced by children, who were deprived of this vital right to live in their families and communities and, also the shame, pain and suffering, that their families and communities experienced as a result of colonization, racism and racial discrimination.

[3] This shame is not for you to bear, it is one for the entire Nation of Canada to bear, in the hope of rebuilding together and achieving reconciliation.

II. Context

[4] In First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada), 2016 CHRT 2 [the Decision], this Panel found the Complainants had substantiated their complaint that First Nations children and families living on reserve and in the Yukon are denied equal child and family services, and/or differentiated adversely in the provision of child and family services, pursuant to section 5 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, RSC 1985 c H-6 (the CHRA or the Act).

[5] The Panel generally ordered Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada (AANDC), now Department of Indigenous Services Canada (DISC), to cease its discriminatory practices and reform the First Nations Child and Family Services (FNCFS) Program and the Memorandum of Agreement Respecting Welfare Programs for Indians applicable in Ontario (the 1965 Agreement) to reflect the findings in the Decision. Indigenous and Northern Affairs Canada (INAC) was also ordered to cease applying its narrow definition of Jordan's Principle and to take measures to immediately implement the full meaning and scope of the principle.

[6] In the 2016 CHRT 2 Decision, at para. 485, the Panel wrote:

> Under section 53(2)(e), the Tribunal can order compensation to the victim of discrimination for any pain and suffering that the victim experienced as a result of the discriminatory practice. In addition, section 53(3) provides for the Tribunal to order compensation to the victim if the discriminatory practice was engaged in willfully or recklessly. Awards of compensation under each of those sections cannot exceed $20,000 under the statute.

[7] The Panel had outstanding questions for the parties in regards to compensation and deferred its ruling to a later date after its questions had been answered. Given the complexity and far-reaching effects of these orders, the Panel requested further clarification from the parties on how these orders could best be implemented on a practical, meaningful and effective basis, both in the short and long-term. It also requested further clarification with respect to the Complainants' requests for compensation under sections 53(2)(e) and 53(3) of the CHRA. The Panel retained jurisdiction to deal with these outstanding issues following further clarification from the parties.

[8] The Panel advised the parties it would address the outstanding questions on remedies in three steps.

> Other mid to long-term reforms to the FNCFS Program and the 1965 Agreement, along with other requests for training and ongoing monitoring > will be dealt with as a second step. Finally, the Panel will address the requests for compensation under ss. 53(2)(e) and 53(3) of the CHRA. (see 2016 CHRT 10 at, paras. 4-5).

[9] The Panel reiterated its desire to move on to the issue of compensation in a 2018 ruling and wrote as follows:

> The Panel reminds Canada that it can end the process at any time with a settlement on compensation, immediate relief and long-term relief that will address the discrimination identified and explained at length in the Decision. Otherwise, the Panel considers this ruling to close the immediate relief phase unless its orders are not implemented. The Panel can now move on to the issue of compensation and long-term relief. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 385).
>
> Parties will be able to make submissions on the process, clarification of the relief sought, duration in time, etc. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 386).
> Moreover, the Panel added that it took years for the First Nations children to get justice. Discrimination was proven. Justice includes meaningful remedies. Surely Canada understands this. The Panel cannot simply make final orders and close the file. The Panel determined that a phased approach to remedies was needed to ensure short term relief was granted first, then long term relief, and reform which takes much longer to implement. The Panel understood that if Canada took 5 years or more to reform the Program, there was a crucial need to address discrimination now in the most meaningful way possible with the evidence available now. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 387).

[10] The Panel also said:

> Akin to what was done in the McKinnon case, it may be necessary to remain seized to ensure the discrimination is eliminated and mindsets are also changed. That case was ultimately settled after ten years. The Panel hopes this will not be the case here. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 388).

[11] In terms of the impacts of this case on First Nations children and their families the Panel added:

> In any event, any potential procedural unfairness to Canada is outweighed by the prejudice borne by the First Nations' children and their families who suffered and, continue to suffer, unfairness and discrimination. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 389).

[12] After having addressed other pressing matters in this case, the Panel provided clarification questions to the parties on the issue of compensation. The Panel allowed the parties to answer those questions, to file additional submissions and to make oral arguments on this issue. The purpose of this ruling is to make a determination on the issue of compensation to victims/survivors of Canada's discriminatory practices.

III. The Panel's summary reasons and views on the issue of compensation

[13] This ruling is dedicated to all the First Nations children, their families and communities who were harmed by the unnecessary removal of children from your homes and your communities. The Panel desires to acknowledge the great suffering that you have endured as victims/survivors of Canada's discriminatory practices. The Panel highlights that our legislation places a cap on the remedies under sections 53 (2) (e) and 53 (3) of the CHRA for victims the maximum being $40,000 and that this amount is reserved for the worst cases. The Panel believes that the unnecessary removal of children from your homes, families and communities qualifies as a worst-case scenario which will be discussed further below and, a breach of your fundamental human rights. The Panel stresses the fact that this amount can never be considered as proportional to the pain suffered and accepting the amount for remedies is not an acknowledgment on your part that this is its value. No amount of compensation can ever recover what you have lost, the scars that are left on your souls or the suffering that you have gone through as a result of racism, colonial practices and discrimination. This is the truth. In awarding the maximum amount allowed under our Statute, the Panel recognizes, to the best of its ability and with the tools that it currently has under the CHRA, that this case of racial discrimination is one of the worst possible cases warranting the maximum awards. The proposition that a systemic case can only warrant systemic remedies is not supported by the law and jurisprudence. The CHRA regime allows for both individual and systemic remedies if supported by the evidence in a particular case. In this case, the evidence supports both individual and systemic remedies. The Tribunal was clear from the beginning of its Decision that the Federal First Nations child welfare program is negatively impacting First Nations children and families it undertook to serve and protect. The gaps and adverse effects are a result of a colonial system that elected to base its model on a financial funding model and authorities dividing services into separate programs without proper coordination or funding and was not based on First Nations children and families' real needs and substantive equality. Systemic orders such as reform and a broad definition of Jordan's Principle are means to address those flaws.

[15] When the discriminatory practice was known or ought to have been known, the damages under the wilful and reckless head send a strong message that tolerating such a practice of breaching protected human rights is unacceptable in Canada. The Panel has made numerous findings since the hearing on the merits contained in 10 rulings. Those findings were made after a thorough review of thousands of pages of evidence including testimony transcripts and reports. Those findings stand and form the basis for this ruling. It is impossible for the Panel to discuss the entirety of the evidence before the Tribunal in a decision. However, compelling evidence exists in the record to permit findings of pain and suffering experienced by a specific vulnerable group, namely First Nations children and their families. While the Panel encourages everyone to read the 10 rulings again to better understand the reasons and context for the present orders, some ruling extracts are selected and reproduced in the pain and suffering, Jordan's Principle and Special compensation sections below for ease of reference in elaborating this Panel's reasons. The Panel finds the Attorney General of Canada's (AGC's) position on compensation unreasonable in light of the evidence, findings and applicable law in this case. The Panel's reasons will be further elaborated below.

IV. Parties' positions

[16] The Panel carefully considered all submissions from all the parties and interested parties and in the interest of brevity and conciseness, the parties' submissions will not be reproduced in their entirety.

[17] The First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada (Caring Society) states that the evidence in this case is overwhelming: Canada knew about, disregarded, ignored or diminished clear, cogent and well researched evidence that demonstrated the FNCFS Program's discriminatory impact on First Nations children and families. Canada also ignored evidence-informed solutions that could have redressed the discrimination well before the complaint was filed, and certainly in advance of the hearings. Indeed, the Tribunal's findings are clear that Canada was reckless and was often more concerned with its own interests than the best interests of First Nations children and their families.

[18] The Caring Society submits that this case embodies the "worst case" scenario that subsection 53(3) was designed for, and is meant to deter. Multiple experts and sources, including departmental officials, alerted Canada to the severe and adverse effects of its FNCFS Program. Over many years, Canada knowingly failed to redress its discriminatory conduct and thus directly and consciously contributed to the suffering of First Nations children and their families. The egregious conduct is more disturbing given Canada's access to evidence-based solutions that it ignored or implemented in a piecemeal and inadequate fashion.

[19] The Caring Society further argues that the evidence is clear that the maximum amount of $20,000 in special compensation is warranted for every First Nations child affected by Canada's FNCFS Program and taken into out-of-home care since 2006. The Government of Canada willfully and recklessly discriminated against First Nations children under the FNCFS Program and it was not until the Tribunal's decision and subsequent compliance orders (2016 CHRT 10, 2016 CHRT 16, 2017 CHRT 14 (as amended by 2017 CHRT 35), 2018 CHRT 4 and 2019 CHRT 7) that Canada has slowly started to remedy the discrimination.

[20] As such, the Caring Society submits that Canada ought to pay $20,000 for every First Nations child affected by Canada's FNCFS Program who has been taken into out-of-home care since 2006 through to the point in time when the Panel determines that Canada is in full compliance with the January 26, 2016 Decision.

[21] Also, the Caring Society adds that every First Nations child affected by Canada's FNCFS Program who has been taken into out-of-home care between 2006 and the point when the FNCFS Program is free from perpetuating adverse impacts is entitled to $20,000 in special compensation under subsection 53(3) of the CHRA. Canada is keenly aware that many of the discriminatory aspects of the FNCFS Program remain unchanged and until long-term reform is complete, First Nations children will continue to experience discrimination. Those children deserve to be recognized and acknowledged, and Canada's continuation of this conduct in this program should be denounced, to (in the words of Mandamin J.) "provide a deterrent and discourage those who deliberately discriminate" (Canada (Attorney General) v. Johnstone, 2013 FC 113 at, para. 115) in order to prevent continuation and recurrence of such discriminatory conduct in future, including generally in other programs.

[22] The Caring Society contends that from the moment that the House of Commons unanimously passed Motion 296, Canada knew that failing to implement Jordan's Principle would cause harm and adverse impacts for First Nations children. Nonetheless, Canada did not take meaningful steps to implement Jordan's Principle for nearly another decade, after this Tribunal's numerous decisions and non-compliance orders requiring it to do so. By failing to implement it and making the informed choice to deny the true meaning of Jordan's Principle, Canada knowingly and recklessly discriminated against First Nations children. The Caring Society submits that the evidence in this case supports an award for special compensation pursuant to subsection 53(3) of the CHRA for the victims of Canada's willfully reckless discriminatory conduct in relation to Jordan's Principle from December 2007 to November 2017.

[23] The Caring Society is of the view that the special compensation ordered for (i) each First Nations individual affected by Canada's FNCFS Program who, as a child, was been taken into out-of-home care, since 2006; and (ii) for every First Nations individual who, as a child, did not receive an eligible service or product pursuant to Canada's willful and/or reckless discriminatory approach to Jordan's Principle from December 2007 to November 2017, should be paid into a trust for the benefit of those children.

[24] The Caring Society is requesting an order similar to that granted by this Tribunal in 2018 CHRT 4: an order under section 53(2)(a) of the CHRA for the Caring Society, the Assembly of First Nations (AFN), the Commission, Chiefs of Ontario, Nishnawbe Aski Nation and Canada to consult on the appointment of seven Trustees. If the parties cannot agree on who the trustees should be, the seven trustees of the Trust would be appointed by order of the Tribunal. The mandate of the Trustees will be to develop a trust agreement in accordance with the Panel's reasons, outlining among other things: (i) the purpose of the Trust; (ii) who the beneficiaries are; (iii) how a beneficiary qualifies for a distribution; (iv) programs that will be eligible and in keeping with the objective of the Trust; (v) how decisions of the Board of Trustees shall be made; and (vi) how the Trust will be administered.

[25] The Caring Society further requests an order that the parties report back within three months of the Panel's decision, with respect to the progress of the appointment of the Trustees. The Caring Society believes that an in-trust remedy will provide a meaningful remedy for First Nations children and families impacted by the willfully reckless discriminatory impact of the FNCFS Program and Jordan's Principle. It enables persons who were victims of Canada's discriminatory conduct to access services to remediate, in part, the impacts of discrimination.

[26] The Caring Society supports AFN's request for compensation in relation to both pain and suffering (section 53(2)(e)) and willful and reckless discrimination (section 53(3)) of the CHRA. Certainly, the victims in this case have experienced pain and suffering, with some First Nations children losing their families forever and some First Nations children losing their lives. In addition, on a principled basis, the Caring Society agrees with the AFN's request for individual compensation. We also recognize that an individual compensation process will require special and particular sensitivities regarding the significant issues of consent, eligibility and privacy. Many of the victims of Canada's discriminatory conduct are children and young adults who are more likely to experience historical disadvantage and trauma.

[27] According to the Caring Society, any process that is put in place will need to adopt a culturally informed child-focused approach that attends to these realities. Such persons may also have their own claims against Canada, whether individually or as part of a representative or class proceeding, and it is not possible for the parties to ascertain the views of all such potential claimants on individual compensation through the Tribunal's process. The Caring Society is also aware of the significant and complex assessment processes required to administer and deliver individual compensation. Best estimates suggest that an order for individual compensation for those taken into out-of-home care could affect 44,000 to 54,000 people. In terms of Jordan's Principle, after the Tribunal issued its May 26, 2017 Order, the number of approvals significantly increased (indeed, over 84,000 products/services were approved in fiscal year 2018-2019), and Canada's witness regarding Jordan's Principle has acknowledged that these requests reflected unmet needs.

[28] Regarding the Panel's question of "who should decide for the victims", the Caring Society respectfully advances that the Tribunal, assisted by all of the parties, is in the best position to decide the financial remedy at this stage of the proceeding. The Tribunal has experience in awarding financial compensation to victims of discrimination and has a sense, through a common-sense approach, of what is and what is not reasonable. Indeed, this Panel is expertly immersed in this case. It understands the FNCFS Program and Jordan's Principle, the impacts experienced by First Nations children and the importance of ensuring long-term reform. It has also demonstrated that the centrality of children's best interests in decision-making which is essential to justly determining how the victims of discrimination in this case ought to be compensated.

[29] The victims' rights belong to the victims. While the Caring Society supports the request made by the AFN, the Caring Society's request for an in-trust remedy does not detract or infringe on victims' rights to directly seek compensation or redress in another forum. It is for this reason that the Caring Society respectfully seeks an order under subsection 53(3) that Canada pay an amount of $20,000 as compensation, plus interest pursuant to s. 53(4) of the CHRA and Rule 9(12) of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal Rules of Procedure, for every First Nations child affected by Canada's FNCFS Program who has been taken into out-of-home care since 2006 until long-term reform is in place and for every First Nations child who did not receive an eligible service or product pursuant to Canada's discriminatory approach to Jordan's Principle since December 12, 2007 to November 2017.

[30] The Assembly of First Nations (AFN) is requesting an order for compensation to address the discrimination experienced by vulnerable First Nations children and families in need of child and family support services on reserve.

[31] The AFN submits that the Panel stated in the main decision: "Rooted in racist and neocolonialist attitudes, the individual and collective trauma imposed on Aboriginal people by the Residential Schools system is one of the darkest aspects of Canadian history….the effects of Residential Schools continue to impact First Nations children, families and communities to this day"(see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 412).

[32] The AFN submits the pain and suffering of the victimized children and families is significant according to the Affidavit of Dr. Mary Ellen Turpel-Lafond affirmed April 3, 2019, and it is also directly linked to the Respondent's discriminatory practice. Based on the circumstances in this case, the AFN seeks on behalf of individual First Nations children and families the maximum compensation available under s. 53(2)(e) and 53(3) of the CHRA, on a per individual basis for any pain and suffering. Given the voluminous evidentiary record before the Tribunal in this matter, and the particular experience to date this Panel has had presiding over this matter, as well as the Panel's expertise under the CHRA, the AFN believes the Tribunal is the appropriate forum to address individual compensation given the unique circumstances of this case and based on an expert panel advisory.

[33] Individuals subjected to the Respondent's discriminatory practice experienced a great deal of pain and suffering and should receive compensation, in particular those who were apprehended as a result of neglect. The AFN notes that some individuals were apprehended as a result of abuse and access to prevention programs may have prevented such abuse. Thus, in these circumstances a need for a case-by-case approach becomes apparent thereby lending credibility to the AFN's suggested approach to establishing an expert panel to address individual compensation. With respect to the evidence, the Tribunal is empowered to accept evidence of various forms, including hearsay. Direct evidence from each individual impacted by the Respondent's discriminatory practice is not necessarily required to issue an award for pain and suffering. Therefore, the Tribunal could find that evidence from some individuals could be used to determine pain and suffering of a group.

[34] The AFN has been mandated by resolution following a vote by Chiefs in Assembly to pursue compensation for First Nations children and youth in care, or other victims of discrimination, and to request the maximum compensation allowable under the Act based on the fact that the discrimination was wilful and reckless, causing ongoing trauma and harm to children and youth, resulting in a humanitarian crisis (see Assembly of First Nations' resolution: Special Chiefs Assembly, Resolution No. 85/2018, December 4, 5 and 6, 2018 (Ottawa, ON) re Financial Compensation for Victims of Discrimination in the Child Welfare System).

[35] The AFN submits that compensation be awarded to each sibling, parent or grandparent of a child or youth brought into care as a result of neglect or medical placements resulting from the Respondent's discriminatory practice, and that such compensation be the maximum allowable under the Act.

[36] The AFN submits no further evidence is required from the AFN or other parties to support and award the maximum compensation to the victims of discrimination as requested, but that the Tribunal can rely on its findings to date.

[37] Both the Caring Society and the AFN submit it would be a cruel process to require children to testify about their pain and suffering. Moreover, requiring each First Nations child to testify before the Tribunal is inefficient and burdensome.

[38] The AFN further submits that the effects of the Respondent's discriminatory practices are real and they are significant. As the Panel found, the needs of First Nations children and families were unmet in the Respondent's provision of child and family services which the AFN submits has caused pain and suffering for which compensation ought to be awarded. The discrimination as found by the Panel was occurring across Canada.

[39] The AFN recognizes that the payment of compensation to the victims of discrimination may be a significant endeavor, considering the large number of individuals and time period. An independent body, such as the Commission, could facilitate the compensation scheme and payments. Whichever body is tasked with issuing the compensation, such body will require timely, accurate and all relevant records from the Respondent. Provisions will need to be adopted to protect the victims from unscrupulous money lenders and predatory businesses. Finally, a notice plan may facilitate connecting individuals who are entitled to compensation payments.

[40] The AFN's remedial request suggests that an expert panel be established and mandated to address individual compensation to the victims of the Respondent's discriminatory practice as an option. This function can be carried out by the Canadian Human Rights Commission should they elect to take on this task. If so, the Respondent should be ordered to fund their activities.

[41] Additionally, the AFN states that the request for compensation to be paid directly to the victim of the Respondent's discrimination is not unprecedented, and in fact many parallels can be drawn from the Indian Residential School Settlement Agreement (IRSSA). Parallels such as the Common Experience Payment (CEP) and its surrounding processes, as well as the Independent Assessment Process (IAP), provide guidance in how a body issuing payments could be established to address individual compensation with respect to First Nations children and families discriminated against and victimized in this case.

[42] The AFN also submits that its National Chief and Executive Committee work in collaboration with the Caring Society to ensure the administration and disbursement of any payments to victims of discrimination come from funds other than the awards to the victims, so that no portion of the quantum awarded be rolled back or claimed by lawyers or legal representatives for assisting the victims.

[43] Overall, the AFN is interested in establishing a remedial process that may include both monetary and non-monetary remedies under a process overseen by an independent body. Given the potential for conflicts of interest in such a process, there would be a need to ensure matters dealt with in the remedial process are free from the influence of the parties, in particular Canada. In the IRSSA, the IAP process was isolated from the outside litigation amongst the parties for this reason.

[44] The proposed remedial process to be overseen by the requested independent body would be non-adversarial in nature, which is another hallmark from the IRSSA that the AFN submits could be carried over in this case. Also, it could be based on an application process that is designed to be streamlined and efficient.

[45] The AFN advances that it is aware of the proposed class proceeding filed in Federal Court last month. Currently, the class action is in the beginning stages and is uncertified, and the nature of the action is very similar to the case at hand. The AFN questions the accuracy of paragraph 11 of the statement of claim which reads mid-paragraph: “No individual compensation for the victims of these discriminatory practices has resulted or will result from the Tribunal decision”. It would appear the claimant is anticipating that no individual compensation will result in this case before the Tribunal. In response, the AFN and the other parties have planned all along that compensation was a long-term remedy that should be addressed after the interim and mid-term relief was addressed. The parties are currently carrying out that plan. The AFN submits the Panel ignore that particular submission.

[46] The Chiefs of Ontario (COO) did not make written submissions on the issue of compensation. In their oral submissions, the COO advised it is content with the other parties’ requests for compensation.

[47] The Nishnawbe Aski Nation’s (NAN) goal is to ensure First Nations children receive compensation for the discrimination found by this Tribunal. The NAN is in support of the remedies sought by the Caring Society.

[48] The AGC, relying on a number of cases, makes several arguments that will not be reproduced in their entirety. Rather, given that the Panel considered all of them, it is appropriate to summarize them here and for the same above-mentioned reasons.

[49] The Attorney General of Canada (AGC) submits that remedies must be responsive to the nature of the complaint made, and the discrimination found: that means addressing the systemic problems identified, and not awarding monetary compensation to individuals. Awarding compensation to individuals in this claim would be inconsistent with the nature of the complaint, the evidence, and this Tribunal's past orders. In a complaint of this nature, responsive remedies are those that order the cessation of discriminatory practices, redress those practices, and prevent their repetition.

[50] Moreover, the AGC states that the C*HRA* does not permit the Tribunal to award compensation to the complainant organizations in their own capacities or in trust for victims. The complainants are public interest organizations and not victims of the discrimination; they do not satisfy the statutory requirements for compensation under the Act. A class action claim seeking damages for the same matters raised in this complaint, on behalf of a broader class of complainants and covering a broader period of time, has already been filed in Federal Court (see T-402-19).

[51] The AGC submits this is a Complaint of Systemic Discrimination. In its 2014 written submissions, the Caring Society acknowledged that this is a claim of systemic discrimination, with no individual victims as complainants and little evidence about the nature and extent of injuries suffered by individual complainants. The Caring Society stated that it would be an "impossible task" to obtain such evidence. The absence of complainant victims and the assertion that it would be "impossible" to obtain victims' evidence strongly indicate that this is not an appropriate claim in which to award compensation to individuals. The AFN appears to also acknowledge that this is a claim of systemic discrimination: it alleges that the discriminatory practice is a perpetuation of systemic discrimination and historic disadvantage.

[52] Also, the AGC argues, that complaints of systemic discrimination are distinct from complaints alleging discrimination against an individual and they require different remedies. Complaints of systemic discrimination are not a form of class action permitting the aggregation of a large number of individual complaints. They are a distinct form of claim aimed at remedying structural social harms. This complaint is advanced by two organizations, the AFN and the Caring Society who sought systemic changes to remedy discriminatory practices. It is not a complaint by individuals seeking compensation for the harm they suffered as a result of a discriminatory practice. The complainant organizations were not victims of the discrimination and they do not legally represent the victims.

[53] Additionally, the AGC contends the Canadian Human Rights Commission considers this to be a complaint of systemic discrimination. Then Acting-Commissioner, David Langtry, referred to it as such in his December 11, 2014 appearance before the Senate Committee on Human Rights. In discussing how the Commission allocates its resources, he specifically named this complaint as an example of a complaint of systemic discrimination that merited significant involvement on the part of the Commission.

[54] Furthermore, the AGC submits the evidence of the systemic nature of the complaint is found in the identity of the complainants, the language of the complaint, the Statement of Particulars, and the nature of the evidence provided to the Tribunal. The Tribunal's previous orders in this matter, clearly indicate that the Tribunal also regards this claim as a complaint of systemic discrimination.

[56] Besides, the AGC argues that claims by individual victims provide details of the harms they suffered as a result of the discriminatory practice. If this were a claim alleging discrimination against an individual or individuals, there would be evidence of the harm they suffered as a result of the discrimination to demonstrate that the victims meet the statutory requirements for compensation. No such evidence exists in this case. With respect to child welfare practices, there is very little evidence in the record regarding the impact of the discriminatory funding practice on individuals, particularly regarding causation, that is, evidence of the link between the discriminatory practices and the harms suffered. The AFN acknowledges that awards for pain and suffering require an evidentiary basis outlining the effects of the discriminatory practice on the individual victims.

[57] According to the AGC, this Tribunal has only awarded compensation to individuals in claims of systemic discrimination where they were complainants and where there was evidence of the harm they had suffered. In this claim, the Tribunal lacks the strong evidentiary record required to justify awarding individual remedies. An adjudicator must be able to determine the extent and seriousness of the alleged harm in order to assess the appropriate compensation and the evidence required to do so has not been provided in this claim. The AGC submits further that no case law supports the argument that compensation to individuals can be payable in claims of systemic discrimination without at least one representative individual complainant providing the evidence needed to properly assess their compensable damages.

[58] Moreover, the AGC advances that neither of the tools available to the Tribunal to address the deficiency in evidence are appropriate in the circumstances. The Tribunal is entitled to require better evidence from the parties, and to extrapolate from the evidence of a group of representative complainants. However, there are no representative individual plaintiffs in this complaint and no evidence regarding their experiences from which to extrapolate on a principled and defensible basis. The Tribunal's ability to compel further evidence is also not helpful as the Caring Society has stated that it would be an impossible task to obtain such evidence, and would be inconsistent with the fundamental nature of the complaint. Compensating victims in this claim when they are not complainants would also be contrary to the general objection to awarding compensation to non-complainants in human rights complaints, as recognized by the Federal Court in Canada (Secretary of State for External Affairs) v. Menghani, [1994] 2 FC 102 at para. 62).

[59] The AGC adds that the Commission's submissions on compensation indicate that this Tribunal declined to award compensation in claims where it would have been impractical to have thousands of victims testify, acknowledging that it could not award compensation "en masse" (Public Service Alliance of Canada v. Canada Post Corporation, 2005 CHRT 39 at para. 991, although other aspects of this decision were judicially reviewed, the Tribunal's refusals to award compensation for pain and suffering, or special compensation for wilful and reckless discrimination, were not).

[60] In making its findings, the Tribunal reproduced passages from another pay equity case that had reached similar conclusions: Public Service Alliance of Canada v. Canada (Treasury Board), 1998 CanLII 3995 (CHRT) at paras. 496-498. The Canada Post case involved roughly 2,800 victims. The Treasury Board case involved roughly 50,000 victims.

[61] The AGC further contends that the Complaint is not a class action and the remedies claimed by the parties resemble the sort of remedies that may be awarded by a superior court of general jurisdiction rather than a Tribunal with a specific and limited statutory mandate. A class action claim addressing the subject matter of this complaint has been filed in the Federal Court.

[62] Also, the AGC submits that in Moore v. British Columbia (Education), 2012 SCC 61, [Moore], the B.C. Human Rights Tribunal permitted the complainant to lead evidence regarding systemic issues in a complaint of discrimination against an individual, in that case an individual with dyslexia who claimed discrimination on the basis he was denied access to education. The B.C. Tribunal relied on that evidence to award systemic remedies. However, the Supreme Court of Canada concluded that the systemic remedies are too far removed from the "complaint as framed by the Complainant" (para. 61 [emphasis in original]). The Supreme Court upheld the individual remedies but set aside all of the systemic orders because the remedy must flow from the claim. According to the AGC, while the situation is reversed in this case, the same principle applies. The complainants framed this complaint as one of systemic discrimination and are now bound by that choice. Remedies in this case must be systemic, particularly because there is insufficient evidence to determine appropriate compensation, if any, for individuals. The AGC adds that the lack of evidence of harm suffered by individuals, and the apparent impossibility of obtaining it, clearly indicates that this is not an appropriate claim in which to award individual compensation.

[63] The AGC adds that the Act does not permit complaints on behalf of classes of complainants, nor does it permit remedies to be awarded to those same classes. Section 40(1) of the Act permits individuals or groups of individuals to file a complaint with the Commission while s.40(2) of the Act specifically empowers the Commission to decline to consider complaints, such as this, that are filed without the consent of the actual victims.

The lack of an equivalent provision in the Act indicates that Parliament chose not to permit class action-style complaints, and it certainly did not grant the Tribunal jurisdiction or provide the tools needed to deal with class complaints.

[64] Furthermore, the AGC adds that given its lack of jurisdiction, the Tribunal should not rely on principles from class action jurisprudence. Québec's Tribunal des droits de la personne, whose statute is similar to the Act, addressed the relationship between class actions and human rights in the civil law context in Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse c. Québec (Procureur général), 2007 QCTDP 26 (CanLII). The case concerned a settlement agreement reached by Quebec, the Quebec Commission, and the teachers' union. The parties encouraged the Tribunal to rely on class actions principles and to approve the agreement despite opposition from a group of young teachers who felt the deal was disadvantageous to them. The Tribunal declined to do so, noting that a "class action is an extraordinary procedural vehicle that breaks with the principle that no one can argue on behalf of another. That recourse can be exercised only with the prior authorization of the court." (para. 105). The Tribunal rejected the suggestion that class actions principles could apply in the human rights context, noting that in class actions the judge serves an important role in protecting "absent members" (para. 109). Without these procedural protections, the tribunal process should not be used to dispossess victims of their rights in the dispute. The Tribunal also concluded that the procedural mechanism of class actions is legislative, and can only be exercised where statutory conditions are met and therefore cannot be transplanted into Tribunal proceedings without legislative authority.

[65] The AGC also argues that while not binding on this Tribunal, the Quebec Tribunal's reasoning is compelling. Class action principles do not apply to human rights complaints and should not be injected into them without legislative authority. Where courts are empowered to consider class proceedings, they are equipped with the tools necessary to do so. For example, Rule 334 of the Federal Court Rules, which governs class proceedings in the Federal Court, empowers judges to review and certify class proceedings, dictates the form for a certification order, provides a process for opting out of the class and modifies other processes under the Rules to accommodate class proceedings. The Rule notably requires a class representative, a person who is qualified to act as plaintiff or applicant under the rules. In the absence of such a provision, the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal is not empowered to address class complaints or to treat complaints that purport to be on behalf of unidentified individual complainants like a class claim.

[66] Furthermore, according to the AGC, The Tribunal does not have jurisdiction to award individual compensation in complaints of systemic discrimination, particularly where, as here, there are no individual complainants. The terms of the Act and the jurisprudence of both this Tribunal and the Federal Courts clearly indicate that paying compensation to the complainant organizations or to non-complainant victims would exceed the Tribunal's jurisdiction. Compensation can only be paid where there is evidence of harm suffered by complainant individuals and should only be paid where it advances the goal of ending discriminatory practices and eliminating discrimination.

[67] The AGC contends there is no legal basis for compensating the Complainants. The Tribunal was created by the Act and its significant powers to compensate victims of discrimination can only be exercised in accordance with the Act. The Tribunal's task is to adjudicate the claim before it. Its inquiry must focus on the complaint and any remedies ordered must flow from the complaint. The requirements of s. 53(2)(e) or 53(3) must be satisfied for the Tribunal to award compensation under the Act.

[68] In regards to pain and suffering, the AGC adds that section 53(2)(e) of the Act grants the Tribunal jurisdiction to award up to $20,000 to "the victim" of discrimination for any pain and suffering they experienced as a result of the discriminatory practice. However, the complainant organizations are not victims of the discrimination and did not experience pain and suffering as a result of it. The evidence presented to the Tribunal by the complainants did not speak to "either physical or mental manifestations of stress caused by the hurt feelings or loss of respect as a result of the alleged discriminatory practice." (Canada (Attorney General) v. Hicks, 2015 FC 599 at, para. 48). Organizations cannot experience pain and suffering and there is, therefore, no need to "redress the effects of the discriminatory practices'' (Closs v. Fulton Forwarders Incorporated and Stephen Fulton, 2012 CHRT 30 at, para. 84) with regards to the complainants. Redressing the discrimination found was necessary in this case, but the Tribunal's previous orders accomplished this goal.

[69] In regards to pain and suffering, the AGC adds that for discrimination to be found to be willful and reckless, and therefore compensable under s. 53(3) of the Act, evidence is required of a measure of intent or of behavior that is devoid of caution or without regard to the consequences of that behavior. Compensation for willful and reckless discrimination is justified where the Tribunal finds that a party has failed to comply with Tribunal orders in previous matters intended to prevent a repetition of similar events from recurring. As with compensation for pain and suffering, compensation for willful and reckless discrimination can only be paid to "victims" of discrimination. The complainant organizations were not victims of willful and reckless discrimination. Furthermore, there is no evidence of a consistent failure to comply with orders.

[70] The AGC submits this claim raises novel issues. There were no orders requiring the Government to address these issues before the Tribunal's first decision in this matter. The Tribunal's decisions in this matter since 2017 are based on the findings and reasoning of the initial decision and are intended to: "provide additional guidance to the parties" (2017 CHRT 14 at, para. 32). They do not demonstrate that Canada has acted without caution or regard to the consequences of its behavior. Concerns about the adequacy of the Government's response to studies and reports in the past do not provide a basis for awarding compensation under s. 53(3). Canada's funding for child welfare services has consistently changed to address shifts in social work practice and the increasing cost of providing family services. Examples of these changes include the redesign of the funding formula to add an additional funding stream for prevention services and Bill C-92 currently before the House of Commons. Since the AGC's submissions, Bill C-92 received Royal assent.

[71] The AGC argues this Tribunal understands the limitations of its remedial jurisdiction. In its decisions in this matter, the Tribunal has shown a nuanced understanding of both its powers and of the limitations of its remedial jurisdiction. The Tribunal should follow its own guidance in deciding the issue of compensation in this case. In 2016 CHRT 2, the Tribunal concluded that its remedial discretion must be exercised reasonably and on a principled basis considering the link between the discriminatory practice and the loss claimed, the particular circumstances of the case and the evidence presented. In reaching its conclusion, it stated that the goal of issuing an order is to eliminate discrimination and not to punish the government.

[72] Moreover, in 2016 CHRT 16, in declining to order the Government to pay to transfer recordings of the Tribunal hearings into a publicly accessible format at the request of the Aboriginal Persons Television Network (the “APTN”), the Tribunal acknowledged the importance of the link between the discriminatory practice and the loss claimed. The AGC submits that while the Tribunal was respectful of the APTN's mission and recognized the public interest in the recordings, the fact that APTN was neither a party nor a victim meant that the remedial request was not linked to the discrimination and was, therefore, denied.

[73] Also, according to the AGC, the Federal Court of Appeal has recognized that structural and systemic remedies are required in complaints of systemic discrimination. In Re: C.N.R. and Canadian Human Rights Commission, 1985 CanLII 3179 (FCA) [C.N.R.], the Court found that compensation is limited to victims which made it “impossible, or in any event inappropriate, to apply it in cases of group or systemic discrimination” where, as here “by the nature of things individual victims are not always readily identifiable”.

[74] The AGC further submits that remedies in claims of systemic discrimination should seek to prevent the same or similar discriminatory practices from occurring in the future in contrast with remedies for individual victims of discrimination which seek to return the victim to the position they would have been in without the discrimination. As human rights lawyers Brodsky, Day and Kelly state in their article written in support of this complaint: “where the breach of a human rights obligation raises structural or systemic issues --- such as longstanding policy practices that discriminate against Indigenous women - the underlying violations must be addressed at the structural or systemic level" (Gwen Brodsky, Shelagh Day & Frances Kelly, “The Authority of Human Rights Tribunals to Grant Systemic Remedies” (2017) 6:1 Can J Hum Rts 1 at p. 18).

[75] The AGC also argues that any compensation must be paid directly to victims of the discrimination. There is no legal basis for the Caring Society's requests that compensation for willful and reckless discrimination be paid into a trust fund that will be used to access services including: language and cultural programs, family reunification programs, counselling, health and wellness programs, and education programs. Compensation is only payable to victims under the terms of the Act and paying compensation to an organization on behalf of individual victims could bar that individual from vindicating their own rights before the Tribunal and obtaining compensation. It may also prejudice their recovery in a class action claim as any damages awarded to the victims would be offset against the compensation already awarded to the organization by the Tribunal.

[76] Furthermore, the AGC contends that compensation is inappropriate in claims alleging breaches of Jordan's Principle in light of the fact there is no basis to award compensation under the Act to either the complainant organizations or non-complainant individuals for alleged breaches of Jordan's Principle. As the Commission notes in its submissions, where Canada has implemented policies that satisfactorily address the discrimination, no further orders are required.

[77] The AGC submits there is no basis to find that the government discriminated willfully or recklessly in this claim. The Tribunal in the Johnstone decision, relied on by the Caring Society, justified its award of compensation under s. 53(3) of the Act by pointing to disregard for a prior Tribunal decision that addressed the same points and the government's reliance on arbitrary and unwritten policies, among other things, neither of which are the case here.

[78] According to the AGC, the Tribunal has asked whether the expert panel proposed by the AFN is feasible and legal or whether it would be more appropriate for the parties to form a committee (potentially including COO and NAN) to refer individual victims to the Tribunal for compensation. The AGC submits neither of these proposals is feasible or legal. The Tribunal cannot delegate its authority to order remedies to an expert panel and it would not be appropriate to ignore the nature of the complaint by awarding compensation to victims who are not complainants in a claim of systemic discrimination. There are no individual complainants in this claim and little evidence of the harm suffered by victims from which the Tribunal can extrapolate. It would also offend the general objection against awarding compensation to non-complainants in human rights matters.

[79] The Caring Society requests that compensation be paid in to an independent trust similar to the ones established under the IRSSA and the AFN is requesting payment of compensation directly to victims and their families. The AGC says the Tribunal should not, and is not permitted in law, to take either of the approaches proposed by the complainants. As the Tribunal question notes, the Indian Residential Schools settlement is the result of agreement between the parties in settling a class action and the independent trust was not imposed by a Court or tribunal.

[80] Finally, according to the AGC, compensation cannot be paid to victims or their families through this process because there are no victims or family-member complainants in this claim.

[81] The Commission while not making submissions on the remedies sought made helpful legal arguments on the issue of compensation and in response to the AGC's legal position on this issue which will be summarized here. The Commission agrees that any award of financial compensation to victims must be supported by evidence. However, it is important to remember that s. 50(3)(c) of the CHRA expressly allows the Tribunal to "receive and accept any evidence and other information, whether on oath or by affidavit or otherwise, that the member or panel sees fit, whether or not that evidence or information is or would be available in a court of law." As a result, in making decisions under the CHRA, it is open to the Tribunal to rely on hearsay or other information, alongside any direct testimony from the parties, victims or other witnesses (emphasis ours).

[82] The Commission further submits that awards for pain and suffering under the CHRA are compensation for the loss of one's right to be free from discrimination, and for the experience of victimization. The award rightly includes compensation for harm to a victim's dignity interests. The specific amounts to be ordered turn in large part on the seriousness of the psychological impacts that the discriminatory practices have had upon the victim. Medical evidence is not needed in order to claim compensation for pain and suffering, although such evidence may be helpful in determining the amount, where it exists.

[83] Furthermore, the Commission submits the Tribunal has held that a complainant's young age and vulnerability are relevant considerations when deciding the quantum of an award for pain and suffering, at least in the context of sexual harassment. The Commission agrees, and submits that vulnerability of the victim should be a relevant consideration in any context, especially where children are involved. Such a finding would be consistent with (i) approaches taken by human rights decision-makers interpreting analogous remedial provisions in other jurisdictions, and (ii) Supreme Court of Canada case law recognizing that children are a highly vulnerable group.

[84] According to the Commission, the Federal Court of Appeal has confirmed that where the Tribunal finds evidence that a discriminatory practice caused pain and suffering, compensation should follow under s. 53(2)(e) of the CHRA.

[85] Like all remedies under the CHRA, awards for pain and suffering must be tied to the evidence, be proportionate to the nature of the infringement, and respect the wording of the statute. Among other things, this requires that awards for pain and suffering fit within the $20,000 cap set out in s. 53(2)(e) of the CHRA. At the same time, as the Ontario Court of Appeal has cautioned in the context of equivalent head of compensation under the Ontario Human Rights Code, "… Human Rights Tribunals must ensure that the quantum of general damages is not set too low, since doing so would trivialize the social importance of the [Code] by effectively setting a "licence fee" to discriminate" (Strudwick v. Applied Consumer & Clinical Evaluations Inc., 2016 ONCA 520, para. 59).

[86] The Commission adds that the Court of Appeal noted in Lemire v. Canada (Human Rights Commission), 2014 FCA 18, [Lemire], the wording of s. 53(3) of the CHRA does not require proof of loss by a victim. In the context of the former hate speech prohibition under the CHRA, awards of special compensation for wilful or reckless conduct were said to compensate individuals identified in the hate speech for the damage "presumptively caused" to their sense of human dignity and belonging to the community at large.

[87] Additionally, the Commission argues that sections 53(2)(e) and 53(3) of the CHRA each allow the Tribunal to order that a respondent pay financial compensation to the "victim of the discriminatory practice."

[88] Also, the Commission advances the argument that in most human rights proceedings, there is one complainant who is also the alleged victim of the discriminatory practice. However, this is not always the case. The CHRA clearly contemplates that a complaint may be filed by someone who does not claim to have been a victim of the discriminatory practice alleged in the complaint. In such circumstances, s. 40(2) expressly gives the Commission a discretion to refuse to deal with the complaint, unless the alleged victim consents. The existence of this discretion shows Parliament's understanding that "victims" and "complainants" may be different persons.

[89] In light of this potential under the CHRA, the Commission submits that it is within the discretion of the Tribunal to award financial remedies to victims of discriminatory practices, and to determine who those victims are – always having regard to the evidence before it. For example, if the specific identities of victims are known to the Tribunal, it might order payments directly to those victims. If the Tribunal does not have evidence of the specific identities of the victims, but has enough evidence to believe that the parties would be capable of identifying them, it might make orders that (i) describe the class of victims, (ii) give the parties time to collaborate to identify the victims, and (iii) retain the Tribunal's jurisdiction to oversee the process.

[90] The Commission further submits that in Canadian Human Rights Commission v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 FC 1135 (CanLII) at paras. 61 and 67, aff'd 2011 FCA 202 (CanLII) [Walden], the Federal Court (i) took note of this broad discretion with respect to the admissibility of evidence, and (ii) held that the Tribunal does not necessarily need to hear testimony from all alleged victims of discrimination in order to compensate them for pain and suffering. Instead, the Court noted that it could be open to the Tribunal in an appropriate case to rely on hearsay evidence from some individuals to determine the pain and suffering of a group.

[91] The Commission notes that in questions posed to the parties regarding compensation, the Panel Chair appears to have raised concerns about having the Tribunal order the creation of a panel that would effectively be making decisions about appropriate remedies under the CHRA. With the greatest of respect to the AFN, the Commission shares those concerns. Parliament has assigned the responsibility of deciding compensation to the specialized Tribunal, created under the CHRA. Nothing in the statute authorizes the Tribunal to sub-delegate that responsibility to another body. Without statutory authority, any sub-delegation of this kind would likely be contrary to principles of administrative law.

[92] The Commission further notes that in her questions, the Panel Chair asked if it might instead be preferable to have an expert panel do the preliminary work of identifying victims, and present their circumstances to the Tribunal for determination. If the Tribunal is inclined to go in this direction, the Commission simply observes that the Tribunal's remedial powers only allow it to make orders against the person who infringed the CHRA here, Canada. As a result, any order regarding an expert panel should not purport to bind the Commission or any other non-respondent to participate on an expert panel.

[93] Speaking only for itself, the Commission has concerns that it would not have sufficient resources to allow for timely and effective participation in an expert panel procedure of the kind under discussion. An order that allows for the Commission's participation, but does not require it, would allow the Commission to consider the resource implications of any process that may be put in place, and advise at that time of its ability to participate.

V. The Tribunal's authority under the Act and the nature of the claim [94] The Tribunal's authority to award remedies such as compensation for pain and suffering and special damages for wilful and reckless conduct is found in the CHRA characterized by the Supreme Court of Canada on numerous occasions, to be quasi-constitutional legislation (see for example Robichaud v. Canada (Treasury Board), 1987 CanLII 73 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 84 at pp. 89-90 [Robichaud]; Canada (House of Commons) v. Vaid, 2005 SCC 30 (CanLII) at para. 81; and Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 53 (CanLII) at para. 62 [Mowat]).

> The principle that the CHRA is paramount was first enunciated in the Insurance Corporation of British Columbia v. Heerspink 1982 CanLII 27 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 145, 158, and further articulated by the Supreme Court of Canada in Winnipeg School Division No. 1 v. Craton 1985 CanLII 48 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 150, at p. 156 where the court stated:

> Human rights legislation is of a special nature and declares public policy regarding matters of general concern. It is not constitutional in nature in the sense that it may not be altered, amended, or repealed by the Legislature. It is, however, of such a nature that it may not be altered, amended or appealed, nor may exceptions be created to its provisions save by clear legislative pronouncement. (at p. 577) (see also 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 29).

It is through the lens of the CHRA and Parliament's intent that remedies must be considered (…) (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 30).

It is also important to reiterate that the CHRA gives rise to rights of vital importance. Those rights must be given full recognition and effect through the Act. In crafting remedies under the CHRA, the Tribunal's powers under section 53(2) must be given such fair, large and liberal interpretation as will best ensure the objects of the Act are obtained. Applying a purposive approach, remedies under the CHRA should be effective in promoting the right being protected and meaningful in vindicating the rights and freedoms of the victim of discrimination (see CN v. Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission), 1987 CanLII 109 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 1114 at p. 1134; and, in Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62 at, paras. 25 and 55), (see also 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 469).

[98] Moreover, the Tribunal's broad remedial discretion is to be exercised on a principled and reasonable basis, taking into account the circumstances of the case, the link between the discriminatory practices and the losses claimed, and the evidence presented. (see Tanner v. Gambler First Nation, 2015 CHRT 19 at para. 161 (citing Chopra v. Canada (Attorney General), 2007 FCA 268 (CanLII), at para. 37); and Hughes v. Elections Canada, 2010 CHRT 4 at para. 50).

[99] When the Tribunal analyzes the claim, it reviews the complaint and also the elements contained in the Statement of Particulars in accordance with rule 6(1)d) of the Tribunal's rules of procedure (see Lindor c. Travaux publics et Services gouvernementaux Canada, 2012 TCDP 14 at para. 4, Translation).

[100] In fact, when the Tribunal examines the complaint, it does so in light of the principles above mentioned and in a flexible and non-formalistic manner:

> "Complaint forms are not to be perused in the same manner as criminal indictments". (Translation, see Canada (Procureur général) c. Robinson, [1994] 3 CF 228 (CA) cited in Lindor 2012 TCDP 14 at para. 22).

> « Les formules de plainte ne doivent pas être scrutées de la même façon qu'un acte d'accusation en matière criminelle. »

> Pursuant to Rule 6(1) of the Tribunal's Rules of Procedure (03-05-04) (the "Rules"), each party is to serve and file a Statement of Particulars ("SOP") setting out, among other things,
>
> (a) the material facts that the party seeks to prove in support of its case; (b) its position on the legal issues raised by the case (...) (see Kanagasabapathy v. Air Canada, 2013 CHRT 7, at para. 3).
>
> It is important to remember that the original complaint does not serve the purposes of a pleading (Casler v. Canadian National Railway, 2017 CHRT 6 at para. 9 [Casler]; see also Gaucher v. Canadian Armed Forces, 2005 CHRT 1 at para. 10 [Gaucher]). Moreover, as explained in Casler:
>
> > . . [I]t must be kept in mind that filing a complaint is the first step in the complaint resolution process under the Act. … As the Tribunal stated in Gaucher, at paragraph 11, "[i]t is inevitable that new facts and circumstances will often come to light in the course of the investigation. It follows that complaints are open to refinement".
>
> As explained in Gaucher and Casler, cited above, the complaint filed with the Commission only provides a synopsis; it will essentially become clearer during the course of the process. The conditions for the hearing are defined in the Statement of Particulars. (see also Polhill v. Keeseekoowenin First Nation, 2017 CHRT 34 at, paras. 13 and 36).

[103] It is useful to look at the claim in this case which in this case includes the complaint, the Statement of Particulars and the specific facts of the case to respond to the AGC's argument that this is a systemic claim and not suited for awards of individual remedies.

[104] The complaint form in this case alleges that: ''the formula drastically underfunds primary, secondary and tertiary child maltreatment intervention services, including least disruptive measures''. These services are vital to ensuring the First Nations children have the same chance to stay safely at home with support services as other children in Canada (see Complaint form at, pages 2-3).

[105] The Panel already found in past rulings that it is the First Nations children who suffer and are adversely impacted by the underfunding of prevention services within the federal funding formula. The Panel considered the claim including the complaint, Statement of Particulars as well as the entire evidentiary record, arguments, etc. to arrive at its findings. As exemplified by the wording above, the complaint specifically identifies First Nations children and the AFN and the Caring Society advanced the complaint on their behalf.

> Relief requested:
> Pursuant to sections 53(2)(d), (e) and (f), requiring compensation and special compensation in the form of payment of one hundred and twelve million dollars into a trust fund to be administered by FNCFCS and to be used to: (a) As compensation, subject to the limits provided in sections 53(3)(e) and (f) for each First Nation person who was removed from his or her home since 1989 and thereby experienced pain and suffering;

[107] In this case, the fact that there is no section 53 (2) (f) in the CHRA but rather a paragraph 3 is a small error that does not change the nature of the requested remedies. Moreover, this error was later corrected in the Caring Society's final submissions.

[108] It is clear from reviewing the Complainants' Statement of Particulars that they were seeking compensation from the beginning and also before the start of the hearing on the merits. The Tribunal requests parties to prepare statements of particulars in order to detail the claim given that the complaint form is short and cannot possibly contain all the elements of the claim. It also is a fairness and natural justice instrument permitting parties to know their opponents' theory of the cause in advance in order to prepare their case. Sometimes, parties also present motions seeking to have allegations contained in the Statement of Particulars quashed in order to prevent the other party from presenting evidence on the issue.

[109] The AGC responded to these compensation allegations and requests both in its updated Statement of Particulars of February 15, 2013 demonstrating it was well aware that the complainants the Caring Society and the AFN were seeking remedies for pain and suffering and for special compensation for individual children as part of their claim.

> With respect to the relief sought in paragraphs 21(2), 21(3) (insofar as the relief requested in 21(3) seeks the establishment of a trust fund to provide compensation to certain unnamed First Nations persons for pain and suffering and for certain services) and 21(5) of the Complainants Statement of particulars, the requested relief is beyond the jurisdiction of the Tribunal (...) No compensation should be awarded under section 53(2)(e) of Canadian Human Rights Act as neither Complainant meet the definition of victim within the section. In the alternative, any compensation awarded under s.53(2)(e) should be limited to a maximum of $40,000 (calculated as follows: the maximum available, $20,000, multiplied by the number of Complainants, two, equals $40,000). (See AGC particulars at page 15, para. 64 and 66).

[111] The Panel finds this demonstrates that the AGC was fully aware that compensation remedy for victims/survivors who were not the Complainants was part of the Complainants' claim before the Tribunal. Moreover, it admitted that compensation was an issue to be determined by the Tribunal in a Consultation Protocol signed in these proceedings by all parties and by Minister Jane Philpott, as she then was, on behalf of Canada:

> WHEREAS, the Tribunal retained jurisdiction to ensure the implementation of its Decision, and subsequently directed that implementation be done in three steps, namely: (1) immediate relief; (2) mid to long term relief; and (3) compensation, and has reserved its ruling regarding the Complainants' motion for an award against Canada in relation to the costs of its obstruction of the Tribunal's process in relation to document disclosure and production (see Consultation Protocol, signed March 2, 2018 at page. 2)
> The Tribunal has directed that the implementation of its Decision be done in three steps, namely: (1) immediate relief, (2) mid to long term relief and (3) compensation. Canada commits to consult in good faith with the Complainants, the Commission and Interested Parties on all the three steps, to the extent of their respective interests and mandates. (see Consultation Protocol, signed March 2, 2018 at, para. 4, page. 7)

VI. Victims under the CHRA

[112] Nothing in the Act suggests that the Tribunal lacks jurisdiction and cannot order remedies benefitting victims who are not Complainants. The Panel disagrees with the AGC's argument and interpretation including of section 40 paras. (1) and (2) summarized above. Section 40 (1) and (2) is reproduced here:

> 40 (1) Subject to subsections (5) and (7), any individual or group of individuals having reasonable grounds for believing that a person is engaging or has engaged in a discriminatory practice may file with the Commission a complaint in a form acceptable to the Commission.
> Consent of victim
> (2) If a complaint is made by someone other than the individual who is alleged to be the victim of the discriminatory practice to which the complaint relates, the Commission may refuse to deal with the complaint unless the alleged victim consents thereto.

[113] This wording suggests that complaints on behalf of victims made by representatives can occur and the Commission has the discretion to refuse to deal with the complaint if the victim does not consent.

[114] In this case, the Commission referred the complaint to the Tribunal and does not oppose the remedy sought on behalf of victims.

[115] Consequently, the Panel agrees with the Commission that the CHRA clearly contemplates that a complaint may be filed by someone who does not claim to have been a victim of the discriminatory practice alleged in the complaint. In such circumstances, s. 40(2) expressly gives the Commission a discretion to refuse to deal with the complaint, unless the alleged victim consents. The existence of this discretion shows Parliament's understanding that "victims" and "complainants" may be different persons.

[116] Additionally, the Federal Court of Appeal's decision in Singh (Re), [1989] 1 F.C. 430 at 442, discussed the meaning of the term victim where the Court stated:

> The question as to who is the "victim" of an alleged discriminatory practice is almost wholly one of fact. Human rights legislation does not look so much to the intent of discriminatory practices as to their effect. That effect is by no > means limited to the alleged "target" of the discrimination and it is entirely conceivable that a discriminatory practice may have consequences that are sufficiently direct and immediate to justify qualifying as a "victim" thereof persons who were never within the contemplation or intent of its author.

[117] The Tribunal has already distinguished complainants from victims who are not complainants within the CHRA framework:

> On the third ground, I am satisfied that the proceeding will have an impact on the interests of PIPSC's members. PIPSC is the bargaining agent for the Complainants and non-complainant Medical Adjudicators who may be deemed as "victims" under the CHRA and entitled to compensation. On this basis alone, I find that PIPSC has an interest in this phase of the proceeding. (see Walden et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (representing the Treasury Board of Canada and Human Resources and Skills Development Canada), 2011 CHRT 19 at, para. 25).

[118] This speaks against the AGC's argument that the Tribunal cannot make awards to individuals that are not complainants and to the other AGC's argument that the Tribunal has no jurisdiction to award remedies for a "group" of victims represented by an organization.

[119] In Walden, both the Tribunal's liability and remedy decisions were judicially reviewed, unsuccessfully in the case of the former and successfully in the latter. The remedy matter was referred back on two issues to be resolved: one involving compensation for pain and suffering; and the other, involving compensation for wage loss including benefit. The parties have negotiated a settlement on the pain and suffering component and have asked the Tribunal for a Consent Order disposing of this issue (see Walden v. Canada (Social Development), 2011 CHRT 19 (CanLII), at para. 3).

[120] While the end result in that case was a consent order on pain and suffering remedies, the Tribunal could not make orders that would fall outside its jurisdiction under the Act.

[121] The AGC relies also on a Federal Court case to support its position that compensating victims in this claim when they are not complainants would also be contrary to the general objection to awarding compensation to non-complainants in human rights complaints, as recognized by the Federal Court in Canada (Secretary of State for External Affairs) v. Menghani, [1994] 2 FC 102 at para. 62.

[122] The Panel disagrees with the AGC's interpretation and application of the Federal Court decision to our case. The analysis, the factual matrix and the findings from the Federal Court are different from the case at hand. The Panel finds it does not support the AGC's position to bar the Tribunal from awarding compensation to non-complainant victims in this case.

[123] This case was always about children as exemplified by the claim written in the complaint and in the Statement of Particulars and the Tribunal's decisions. Moreover, the AGC is aware that the Tribunal views this case as being about children. What is more, the Panel agrees that AFN and the Caring Society filed the complaint on behalf of a representative group who are identifiable by specific characteristics if not by name. Furthermore, the Panel believes it is important to consider the nature of this case where the victims/survivors are part of a group composed of vulnerable First Nations children.

[124] While there are other forums available for filing representative actions, the AFN stated that Tribunal was carefully chosen in this case due to the nature of the claim, but, also due to the means of redress available under the CHRA for members of a vulnerable group on whose behalf the AFN has advanced a case of discrimination contrary to the Act.

VII. Pain and suffering analysis

[125] Once it is established that discrimination or a loss has been suffered, the Tribunal must consider whether an order is appropriate (see s. 53(2) of the CHRA). In this regard, the Tribunal has the duty to assess the need for orders on the material before it; or, it can refer the issue back to the parties to prepare better evidence on what an appropriate order should be (see Canadian Human Rights Commission v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 FC 1135 (CanLII) at paras. 61 and 67, aff'd 2011 FCA 202 (CanLII) [Walden]). In determining the present motions, this is the situation in which the Panel finds itself. (see 2017 CHRT 14 (CanLII) at para. 27), (see 2019 CHRT 7 at, para. 47). Therefore, in the presence of sufficient evidence and a remedy that flows from the claim, the Tribunal may make the orders it finds appropriate.

[126] In a recent Tribunal decision, Lafrenière v. Via Rail Canada Inc., 2019 CHRT 16, at para. 193 Member Perreault wrote about the pain and suffering award under section 53(2)(e) of the CHRA:

> However, $20,000 is the maximum that may be awarded under the legislation and it is usually awarded by the Tribunal in more serious cases, i.e. when the scope and duration of the Complainant's suffering from the discriminatory practice justify the full amount.

[127] The Federal Court of Appeal has confirmed that where the Tribunal finds evidence that a discriminatory practice caused pain and suffering, compensation should follow under s. 53(2)(e) of the *CHRA (*see Jane Doe v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 FCA 183 [Jane Doe], at para. 29, citing (among others): Grant v. Manitoba Telecom Services Inc., 2012 CHRT 10 at para. 115*; and Alizadeh-Ebadi v. Manitoba Telecom Services Inc*., 2017 CHRT 36 at para. 213).

[128] Furthermore, "when someone endures pain and suffering, there is no amount of money that can remove that pain and suffering from the Complainant. Moral pain related to discrimination (…) varies from one individual to another. Psychological scars often take a long time to heal and can affect a person's self-worth. From the point of view of the person that suffered discrimination, large amounts of money should be granted to reflect what they lived through and to provide justice. This being said, when evidence establishes pain and suffering an attempt to compensate for it must be made. (…) However, $20,000 is the maximum amount that the Tribunal can award under section 53(2)(e) and the Tribunal only awards the maximum amount in the most egregious of circumstances" (see Grant v. Manitoba Telecom Services Inc., 2012 CHRT 10 at, para. 115 recently cited in Jane Doe, at, para. 29).

> Complaint substantiated

> (2) If at the conclusion of the inquiry the member or panel finds that the complaint is substantiated, the member or panel may, subject to section 54, make an order against the person found to be engaging or to have engaged in the discriminatory practice and include in the order any of the following terms that the member or panel considers appropriate:
>
> (a) that the person cease the discriminatory practice and take measures, in consultation with the Commission on the general purposes of the measures, to redress the practice or to prevent the same or a similar practice from occurring in future, including
>
> (i) the adoption of a special program, plan or arrangement referred to in subsection 16(1), or
>
> (ii) making an application for approval and implementing a plan under section 17;
>
> (b) that the person make available to the victim of the discriminatory practice, on the first reasonable occasion, the rights, opportunities or privileges that are being or were denied the victim as a result of the practice;
>
> (c) that the person compensate the victim for any or all of the wages that the victim was deprived of and for any expenses incurred by the victim as a result of the discriminatory practice;
>
> (d) that the person compensate the victim for any or all additional costs of obtaining alternative goods, services, facilities or accommodation and for any expenses incurred by the victim as a result of the discriminatory practice; and
> (e) that the person compensate the victim, by an amount not exceeding twenty thousand dollars, for any pain and suffering that the victim experienced as a result of the discriminatory practice.

[130] Section 53 imposes a logical requirement for any award of remedies that is, the remedy should flow from a finding that the complaint is substantiated. If this is the case, an array of remedies is available to the victim of the discriminatory practice. The wording of section 53(2) is unambiguous and allows the victim of the discriminatory practice to obtain any remedies listed in section 53 as the member or panel finds appropriate: ‘’(..) and include in the order any of the following terms that the member or panel considers appropriate’’. It is clear that the language of the CHRA does not prevent awards of multiple remedies even if systemic remedies have been ordered.

[131] The AGC's argument that systemic discrimination requires systemic remedies is correct. However, the AGC's argument that it precludes other awards of remedies as the Panel deems appropriate in light of the facts and the evidence before the Tribunal is incorrect.

[132] The way to determine the issue is to look at the Statute first:

> The basic rule of statutory interpretation is that "the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context, in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament" (Elmer Driedger, Construction of Statutes, 2nd ed. (Toronto: Butterworths, 1983), at p. 87; see also Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 27, at para. 21, see also First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada), 2015 CHRT 14 at, para. 12).

[133] The special nature of human rights legislation is also taken into account in its interpretation:

> Human rights legislation is intended to give rise, amongst other things, to individual rights of vital importance, rights capable of enforcement, in the final analysis, in a court of law. I recognize that in the construction of such legislation the words of the Act must be given their plain meaning, but it is equally important that the rights enunciated be given their full recognition and effect. We should not search for ways and means to minimize those rights and to enfeeble their proper impact. Although it may seem commonplace, it may be wise to remind ourselves of the statutory guidance given by the federal Interpretation Act which asserts that statutes are deemed to be remedial and are thus to be given such fair, large and liberal interpretation as will best ensure that their objects are attained. First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (see CN v. Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission), 1987 CanLII 109 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 1114, at, p. 1134) cited in 2015 CHRT 14 at, para. 13).

[134] Consequently, analyzing the specific facts of the case and weighing the accepted evidence in the Tribunal record is of paramount importance. Indeed, the Federal Court of Appeal recently described the exercise of statutory interpretation:

> To discern the meaning of "compensate", the Board is therefore required to conduct an exercise in statutory interpretation. For the interpretation to be reasonable, the Board is obliged to ascertain the intent of Parliament by > reading paragraph 53(2)(e) in its entire context, according to the grammatical and ordinary meaning of its text, understood harmoniously with the object and scheme of the Act. The Board must also be mindful that human rights legislation is to be construed liberally and purposively so that protected rights are given full recognition and effect. (see Jane Doe v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 FCA 183 at, paras. 23).

[135] The proper legal analysis is fair, large and liberal and must advance the Act's objective and account for the need to uphold the human rights it seeks to protect. As mentioned above, one should not search for ways and means to minimize those rights and to enfeeble their proper impact.

[136] The AGC relies on the Moore case to support its assertion that individual remedies cannot be awarded in a systemic case. However, the Panel disagrees with the AGC's interpretation of this case.

[137] The Supreme Court decision in Moore did not say that both systemic and individual remedies cannot be awarded to victims of discriminatory practices rather it emphasizes the need for the remedy to be connected to the claim and the need for an evidentiary basis to make orders. The case of Jeffery Moore was a complaint of individual discrimination where the Tribunal went beyond the claim and made findings of systemic discrimination. This is the issue discussed by the Supreme Court which described the case as follows:

> This case is about the education of Jeffrey Moore, a child with a severe learning disability who claims that he was discriminated against because the intense remedial instruction he needed in his early school years for his dyslexia was not available in the public-school system. Based on the recommendation of a school psychologist, Jeffrey's parents enrolled him in specialized private schools in Grade 4 and paid the necessary tuition. The remedial instruction he received was successful and his reading ability improved significantly.

[138] Jeffrey's father, Frederick Moore, filed a human rights complaint against the School District and the British Columbia Ministry of Education alleging that Jeffrey had been discriminated against because of his disability and had been denied a "service (…) customarily available to the public", contrary to s. 8 of the Human Rights Code, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 210 (Code). (see Moore at paras. 1-2).

[139] Additionally, the Supreme Court discussed the remedy as follows: ‘’But the remedy must flow from the claim. In this case, the claim was made on behalf of Jeffrey, and the evidence giving concrete support to the claim all centered on him. While the Tribunal was certainly entitled to consider systemic evidence in order to determine whether Jeffrey had suffered discrimination, it was unnecessary for it to hold an extensive inquiry into the precise format of the provincial funding mechanism or the entire provincial administration of special education in order to determine whether Jeffrey was discriminated against. The Tribunal, with great respect, is an adjudicator of the particular claim that is before it, not a Royal Commission’’. (see Moore at paras. 64).

[140] The case at hand on the contrary, is one of systemic racial discrimination as admitted by Canada in its oral and written submissions on compensation and, also a case where the Tribunal found that the system caused adverse impacts on First Nations children and their families.

[141] It is worth mentioning that the Decision on the merits begins with this important finding: “This decision concerns children. More precisely, it is about how the past and current child welfare practices in First Nations communities on reserves, across Canada, have impacted and continue to impact First Nations children, their families and their communities.” (see 2016 CHRT 2, at para. 1, emphasis added).

[142] In claiming there is no evidence in the record to support compensation to individual victims who are not a complainant in this case, the Panel finds that the AGC does not consider section 50 (3)(c) of the CHRA: “(c) subject to subsections (4) and (5), receive and accept any evidence and other information, whether on oath or by affidavit or otherwise, that the member or panel sees fit, whether or not that evidence or information is or would be admissible in a court of law”. The only limitation in relation to evidence is found at section 50 (4) of the CHRA, the member or panel may not admit or accept as evidence anything that would be inadmissible in a court by reason of any privilege under the law of evidence.

[144] The Panel finds it is unreasonable to require vulnerable children to testify about the harms done to them as a result of the systemic racial discrimination especially when reliable hearsay evidence such as expert reports, reliable affidavits and testimonies of adults speaking on behalf of children and official government documents supports it. The AGC in making its submissions does not consider the Tribunal's findings in 2016 accepting numerous findings in reliable reports as its own. The AGC omits to consider the Tribunal's findings of the children's suffering in past and unchallenged decisions in this case.

[145] In Canada (Social Development) v. Canada (Human Rights Commission), 2011 FCA 202 at para. 73 [Walden FCA], as mentioned by the Commission, the Federal Court (i) took note of this broad discretion with respect to the admissibility of evidence, and (ii) held that the Tribunal does not necessarily need to hear testimony from all alleged victims of discrimination in order to compensate them for pain and suffering. Instead, the Court noted that it could be open to the Tribunal in an appropriate case to rely on hearsay evidence from some individuals to determine the pain and suffering of a group.

[146] The Panel does not accept that a systemic case can only prompt systemic remedies. As mentioned above, nothing in the CHRA prohibits the Tribunal's discretion to order systemic remedies along with individual remedies if the complaint is substantiated and the evidence supports it.

[147] The children who were unnecessarily removed from their homes, will not be vindicated by a system reform nor will their parents. Even the children who are reunified with their families cannot recover the time they lost with their families. The loss of opportunity to remain in their homes, their families and communities as a result of the racial discrimination is one of the most egregious forms of discrimination leading to serious and well documented consequences including harm and suffering found in the evidence in this case.

[149] The use of the “words unnecessarily removed” account for a distinction between two categories of children: those who did not need to be removed from the home and those who did. If the children are abused sexually, physically or psychologically those children have suffered at the hands of their parents/caregivers and needed to be removed from their homes. However, the children should have been placed in kinship care with a family member or within a trustworthy family within the community. Those First Nations children suffered egregious and compound harm as a result of the discrimination by being removed from their extended families and communities when they should have been comforted by safe persons that they knew. This is a good example of violation of substantive equality.

[150] The Panel believes that in those situations only the children should be compensated and not the abusers. The Panel understands that some of the abusers have themselves been abused in residential or boarding schools or otherwise and that these unacceptable crimes of abuse are condemnable. The suffering of First Nations Peoples was recognized by the Panel in the Decision. However, not all abused children became abusers even without the benefit of therapy or other services. The Panel believes it is important for the children victims/survivors of abuse to feel vindicated and not witness financial compensation paid to their abusers regardless of the abusers' intent and history.

[151] Additionally, the Panel also recognizes that the suffering can continue for life for First Nations children and their families even when families are reunited given the gravity of the adverse impacts of breaking families and communities.

[153] Throughout all the Decision and rulings, references were made to First Nations children and their families. The Panel did not focus on the complainants when analyzing the adverse impacts. The Panel analyzed the effects/impacts of the discriminatory practices on First Nations children and clearly expressed this. The findings focused on the agencies’ abilities to deliver services and most importantly, the First Nations children, their families and their communities who are the victims/survivors of the discriminatory practices. First Nations children and families are referenced continuously throughout the Decision. The Decision starts with: "This decision concerns children. More precisely, it is about how the past and current child welfare practices in First Nations communities on reserves, across Canada, have impacted and continue to impact First Nations children, their families and their communities" (para. 1, emphasis added).

[154] Furthermore, an analysis of the Tribunal's findings makes it clear that the Tribunal's orders are aimed at improving the lives of First Nations children and that the First Nations children and families are the ones who suffer from the discrimination. The Tribunal made findings of systemic racial discrimination and agrees this case is a case of systemic racial discrimination. The Panel also made numerous findings of adverse impacts toward First Nations children and families, adverse impacts that cause serious harm and suffering to children: the two are interconnected. While a finding of discrimination and of adverse impacts may not always lead to findings of pain and suffering, in these proceedings it clearly is the case. A review of the 2016 CHRT 2 and subsequent rulings demonstrates this. There is no reason not to accept that both coexist in this case. The individual rights that were infringed upon by systemic racial discrimination warrant remedies alongside systemic reform already ordered by the Tribunal (see 2016 CHRT 2, 10, 16 and 2017 CHRT 7, 14, 35 and 2018 CHRT 4).

[155] Also, the Tribunal has already made numerous findings relating to First Nations children and their families' adverse impacts and suffering in past rulings. Some of these findings can be found in the compilation of citations below:

> The FNCFS Program, corresponding funding formulas and other related provincial/territorial agreements only apply to First Nations people living on-reserve and in the Yukon. It is only because of their race and/or national or ethnic origin that they suffer the adverse impacts outlined above in the provision of child and family services. Furthermore, these adverse impacts perpetuate the historical disadvantage and trauma suffered by Aboriginal people, in particular as a result of the Residential Schools system (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 459). (…)

remain together or to be reunited in a timely manner. We also recognize those First Nations children and families who are or have been adversely impacted by the Government of Canada's past and current child welfare practices on reserves (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 467).

Overall, AANDC's method of providing funding to ensure the safety and well-being of First Nations children on reserve and in the Yukon, by supporting the delivery of culturally appropriate child and family services that are in accordance with provincial/territorial legislation and standards and provided in a reasonably comparable manner to those provided off reserve in similar circumstances, falls far short of its objective. In fact, the evidence demonstrates adverse effects for many First Nations children and families living on reserve and in the Yukon, including a denial of adequate child and family services, by the application of AANDC's FNCFS Program, funding formulas and other related provincial/territorial agreements (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 393).

As will be seen in the next section, the adverse effects generated by the FNCFS Program, corresponding funding formulas and other related provincial/territorial agreements perpetuate disadvantages historically suffered by First Nations people. (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 394).

The evidence in this case not only indicates various adverse effects on First Nations children and families by the application of AANDC's FNCFS Program, corresponding funding formulas and other related provincial/territorial agreements, but also that these adverse effects perpetuate historical disadvantages suffered by Aboriginal peoples, mainly as a result of the Residential Schools system. (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 404).

To the approximately 80,000 living former students, and all family members and communities, the Government of Canada now recognizes that it was wrong to forcibly remove children from their homes and we apologize for having done this. We now recognize that it was wrong to separate children from rich and vibrant cultures and traditions that it created a void in many lives and communities, and we apologize for having done this. We now recognize that, in separating children from their families, we undermined the ability of many to adequately parent their own children and sowed the seeds for generations to follow, and we apologize for having done this (...) (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 411).

In the spirit of reconciliation, the Panel also acknowledges the suffering caused by Residential Schools. Rooted in racist and neocolonialist attitudes, the individual and collective trauma imposed on Aboriginal people by the Resident Schools system is one of the darkest aspects of Canadian history. As will be explained in the following section, the effects of Residential Schools continue to impact First Nations children, families and communities to this day (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 412).

Even with this guiding principle, if funding is restricted to provide such services, then the principle is rendered meaningless (…) With unrealistic funding, how are some First Nations communities expected to address the effects of Residential Schools? It will be difficult if not impossible to do, resulting in more kids ending up in care and perpetuating the cycle of control that outside forces have exerted over Aboriginal culture and identity (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 425).

Similar to the Residential Schools era, today, the fate and future of many First Nations children is still being determined by the government, whether it is through the application of restrictive and inadequate funding formulas or through bilateral agreements with the provinces. The purpose of having a First Nation community deliver child and family services, and to be involved through a Band Representative, is to ensure services are culturally appropriate and reflect the needs of the community. This in turn may help legitimize the child and family services in the eyes of the community, increasing their effectiveness, and ultimately help rebuild individuals, families and communities that have been heavily affected by the Residential Schools system and other historical trauma. (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 426).

(…) On that point, the Panel would like to stress how important it is to address the issue of mass removal of children today. While Indigenous communities may have different views on child welfare, there is no evidence that they oppose actions to stop removing the children from their Nations. Indeed, it would be somewhat surprising if they did as it would amount to a colonial mindset. In any event, assertions from Canada on this point do not constitute evidence and do not assist us in our findings. Moreover, Indigenous communities have obligations to their children such as keeping them safe in their homes whenever possible. While there may be different views from one Nation to another, surely the need to keep the children in their communities as much as possible is the same (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 62).

This being said, the Panel fully supports Parliament's intent to establish a Nation-to-Nation relationship and that reconciliation is Parliament's goal (see Daniels v. Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development, [2016] 1 SCR 99), and commends it for adopting this approach. The Panel ordered that the specific needs of communities be addressed and this involves consulting the communities. However, the Panel did not intend this order to delay addressing urgent needs. It foresaw that while agencies would have more resources to stop the mass removal of children, best practices and needs would be identified to improve the services while the program is reformed, and ultimately child welfare would reflect what communities need and want, and the best interest of children principle would be upheld. It is not one or the other; it is one plus the other. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 66).

This is a striking example of a system built on colonial views perpetuating historical harm against Indigenous peoples, and all justified under policy. While the necessity to account for public funds is certainly legitimate it becomes troubling when used as an argument to justify the mass removal of children rather than preventing it.

There is a need to shift this right now to cease discrimination. The Panel finds the seriousness and emergency of the issue is not grasped with some of Canada's actions and responses. This is a clear example of a policy that was found discriminatory and that is still perpetuating discrimination. Consequently, the Panel finds it has to intervene by way of additional orders. In further support of the Panel's finding, compelling evidence was brought in the context of the motions' proceedings (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 121).

Ms. Lang's evidence, over a year after the Decision, establishes the fact that aside from discussions, no data or short-term plan was presented to address this matter. The focus is on financial considerations and not the best interests of children nor addressing liability and preventing mass removals of children (see 2018 CHRT 2 at, para. 132).

The Panel finds (…) There is a real need to make further orders on this crucial issue to stop the mass removal of Indigenous children, and to assist Nations to keep their children safe within their own communities (…) (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 133).

It is important to remind ourselves that this is about children experiencing significant negative impacts on their lives. It is also urgent to address the underlying causes that promote removal rather than least disruptive measures (see the Decision at paras. 341-347), (see also 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 166).

Canada currently funds payments of actual costs for maintenance expenses when children are apprehended and removed from their homes and families and has developed a methodology to pay for these expenses. Proceeding this way and not doing the same for prevention, perpetuates the historical disadvantage and the legacy of residential schools already explained in the Decision and rulings. It incentivizes the removal of children rather than assisting communities to stay together. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 230).

> It is important to look at this case in terms of bringing Justice and not simply the Law, especially with reconciliation as a goal. This country needs healing and reconciliation and the starting point is the children and respecting their rights. If this is not understood in a meaningful way, in the sense that it leads to real and measurable change, then, the TRC and this Panel's work is trivialized and unfortunately the suffering is born by vulnerable children (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 451).

VIII. The Evidence in the Tribunal record

[156] In order to respond to the AGC's argument that there is a lack of evidence in the record to support a pain and suffering remedy, a review of some relevant elements of the evidence before this Tribunal follows:

> Mr. Dufresne: Why did you file the complaint?
>
> DR. BLACKSTOCK: I filed the complaint as a last resort. I -- I'm one of those people that believes that you have to try and work towards solutions first. And we did that not only once but we did that twice over a period of many years. We got to the place of documenting the inequality. In my view there was consensus that that inequality existed. We talked about and I believe with the respondent agreed with the harms to children that were a result of not taking action, that being there growing numbers of children in care and hardships for families, and the unequal access of services or the denial of services to children.
> We developed solutions to that, first in the National Policy Review and secondly in the Wen:de reports. We even in the Wen:de reports took the time to present those results to central authorities in October of 2005, and nothing had changed remarkably at the level of the child. We felt that there was no other alternative than to bring a human rights complaint. And even as we brought it, I was very hopeful that that would be incentive enough for the respondent to take the action needed on behalf of the children, but we find ourselves here today. (See Testimony of Dr. Cindy Blackstock, StenoTran transcripts February 28, 2013, page 3, lines 17-25 and page 4, lines 1-19 vol 4).

[157] Dr. Blackstock testified before the Tribunal and the Panel finds her testimony to be reliable and to speak to the issue of harm suffered by First Nations children as a result of the discrimination.

[158] Mr. Dubois is the Executive Director, Touchwood Agency and has a Bachelor of Social Work degree from the University of Calgary and also testified before the Tribunal:

> (…) MR. DUBOIS: I raised the issue with Indian Affairs.
>
> MR. POULIN: Why?
> MR. DUBOIS: Because I wanted to get away from just being limited to having to -- it was a situation where you kind of -- you had to break up a family under Directive 20-1 before you could provide the services. It's only when you took a child into care that you could start to rebuild the family. I wanted to be proactive. And this goes back to our history as a First Nations people, including my history where, you know, having to endure boarding school, like my dad, my late father was in boarding school, and the damage it did to us or the interference that back then that the church had on our family systems, so I wanted to get away from that. Like having lived that experience, we don't need more interference. We don't need more -- for lack of a better word, wreaking havoc on our families. I come with the frame of mind that our families need healing and I, as a trained professional, and others out there in Saskatchewan and the other agencies, you know, like there has to be a different way to do child welfare other than breaking families up. We want to heal. We need to heal. We have to do things differently, which is why when I referenced the SDM it was really appealing to me because it focuses on our strengths, you know, it builds on what we are and what we have. (see Testimony of Derald Richard Dubois, April 8, 2013, StenoTran transcript at, pp. 60-61 lines 7-24; 1-11, vol 9). See also testimony of Mr. Derald Richard Dubois, StenoTran transcripts April 8, 2013, at p.2, line 19 to p. 129, line 12 (April 8, 2013); p. 1, line 14 to p. 85, line 11 (April 9, 2013) vol 9).

[159] Mr. Dubois who is a child welfare professional refers to the Federal funding formula Directive 20-1 that was found discriminatory by this Panel causing significant adverse impacts to First Nations children and their families. What is more, he testifies of one of the worst of those adverse impacts being the unnecessary removal of children from their homes, families and communities.

[160] This is a reliable and powerful testimony that exemplifies the pain and suffering and harm done to First Nations children, families and communities as a result of the racial and systemic discrimination that is perpetuating historical wrongs.

[161] The Panel finds that unnecessarily removing a child from their family and community is a serious harm causing great suffering to that child, the family and the community.

[162] There is also evidence of harm/suffering to First Nations children and families in several reports forming part of the evidentiary record already considered and relied upon by the Panel in arriving to its findings of adverse impacts in the 2016 Decision. The Wen:de we are coming to the light of day, 2005 report (Wen:de) was filed into evidence before the Tribunal. The AGC had the opportunity to make submissions on this report and the Panel made findings on the reliability of this report. Moreover, the Tribunal accepted the findings in Wen:de as its own findings (See Decision 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 257): "The Panel finds the NPR and Wen:De reports to be highly relevant and reliable evidence in this case. They are studies of the FNCFS Program commissioned jointly by AANDC and the AFN. They employed a rigorous methodology, in depth analysis of Directive 20-1, and consultations with various stakeholders. The Panel accepts the findings in these reports. There is no indication that AANDC questioned the findings of these reports prior to this Complaint. On the contrary, there are indications that AANDC, in fact, relied on these reports in amending the FNCFS Program" in a piecemeal fashion.

[163] Additionally, Canada was part of this study and fully aware of its findings and impact of its practices on First Nations children which in fact exacerbates Canada's wilful and reckless conduct in not correcting the discriminatory practice identified in the 2005 year of the report which will also be revisited in the wilful and reckless section below. The Panel had reviewed all the Wen:de reports before accepting it as its own and included some references of those findings in the Decision. The following additional findings support the issue of compensation for pain and suffering of children and their families and inform the Panel in drafting its orders:

> Secondary analysis of the Aboriginal data in CIS-98 revealed that although Aboriginal children were less likely to be reported to child welfare authorities for physical or sexual violence they were twice as likely to experience neglect (Blackstock, Trocme & Bennett, 2004). When researchers unpacked neglect by controlling for various care giver functioning and socio-demographic factors – they determined that the key drivers of neglect for First Nations children were poverty, poor housing, and substance misuse (Trocme, Knoke & Blackstock, 2004). It is important to note that two of these three factors are arguably outside of the domain of parental influence – poverty and poor housing. As they are outside of the locus of control of parents is unlikely that parents will be able to redress these risks in the absence of social investments targeted to poverty reduction and housing > improvement. The limited ability for parents to influence the risk factors can mean that their children are more likely to stay in care for prolonged periods of time. This is particularly a concern in regions where statutory limits on the length of time a child is being put in care are being introduced. If parents alone cannot influence the risk and there are inadequate social investments to reduce the risk – children can be removed permanently. The third factor, substance misuse, is within the personal domain for change but requires access to services. Overall, CIS- 98 results suggest that targeted and sustained investments in neglect focused services that specifically consider substance misuse, poverty and poor housing would likely have a positive impact on the safety and well-being of these children. (emphasis ours).

[164] The Panel finds that First Nations children and families are harmed and penalized for being poor and for lacking housing. Those are circumstances that are most of the time beyond the parents' control.

[165] The Wen:de report goes on to say that:

> (...) providing an adequate range of neglect focused services is likely more complicated on reserve than off reserve due to existing service deficits within the government and voluntary sector. A study conducted by the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society in 2003 found that First Nations children and families receive very limited benefit from the over 90 billion dollars in voluntary sector services provided to other Canadians annually. Moreover, there are far fewer provincial or municipal government services than off reserve. This means that First Nations families are less able to access child and family support services including addictions services than their non-Aboriginal counterparts (Nadjiwan & Blackstock, 2003). Deficits in support services funding were also found in the federal government allotment for First Nations child and family services (MacDonald & Ladd, 2000.) This report found that the federal government funding for least disruptive measures (a range of services intended to safely keep First Nations children who are experiencing or at risk of experiencing child maltreatment safely at home) is inadequately funded. When one considers the key drivers resulting in First Nations children entering care (substance misuse, poverty and poor housing) and couples that with the dearth in support services, unfavorable conditions to support First Nations families to care for their children emerges (see Wen:de at, pp.13-14) (emphasis ours).
> Although there has been no longitudinal studies exploring the experiences of Aboriginal children in care throughout the care continuum (from report to continuing custody), data suggests that Aboriginal children are much more likely to be admitted into care, stay in care and become continuing custody

wards. It is possible that the over representation of Aboriginal children in child welfare care is a result of the structural risk factors (poverty, poor housing and substance misuse) not being adequately addressed through the provision of targeted least disruptive measures at both the level of the family and community. The lack of service provision may result in minimal changes to home conditions over the period of time the child remains in care and thus it is more likely the child will not return home (see Wen:de pp.13-14).

The lack of services, opportunities and deplorable living conditions characterizing many of Canada's reserves has led to mass urbanization of Aboriginal peoples (…)

Funding First Nations have made a direct connection between the state of children's health and the colonization and attempted assimilation of Aboriginal peoples: The legacy of dependency, cultural and language impotence, dispossession and helplessness created by residential schools and poorly thought out federal policies continue to have a lasting effect. - Substandard infrastructure and services have been made worse by federal-provincial disagreements over responsibility.

The most profound impact of the lack of clarity relating to jurisdiction results in what many commentators have suggested are gaps in services and funding –resulting in the suffering of First Nations children. As articulated by McDonald and Ladd in their comprehensive Joint Policy Review (prepared for the Assembly of First Nations and DIAND): First Nations agencies are expected through their delegation of authority from the provinces, the expectation of their communities, and by DIAND, to provide a comparable range of services on reserve with the funding they receive through Directive 20.1. The formula, however, provides the same level of funding to agencies regardless of how broad, intense or costly, the range of services is (see Wen:de at, pp.90-91).

The issues raised by FNCFS providers demonstrate the tangible effects of funding limitations on the ability of agencies to address the needs of children. Without funding for provision of preventative services many children are not given the service they require or are unnecessarily removed from their homes and families. In some provinces the option of removal is even more drastic as children are not funded if placed in the care of family members. The limitations placed on agencies quite clearly jeopardize the well-being of their clients, Aboriginal children and families. As a society we have become increasingly aware of the social devastation of First Nations communities and have discussed at length the importance of healing and cultural revitalization. Despite this knowledge, however, we maintain policies which perpetuate the suffering of First Nations communities and greatly disadvantage the ability of the next generation to effect the necessary change. (see Wen:de at, p.93).

[166] The Supreme Court of Canada found that the removal of a child from a parent's custody affects the individual dignity of that parent:

> In Godbout v. Longueuil, La Forest J. held that: …the autonomy protected by the s. 7 right to liberty encompasses only those matters that can properly be characterized as fundamentally or inherently personal such that, by their very nature, they implicate basic choices going to the core of what it means to enjoy individual dignity and independence… choosing where to establish one's home is, likewise, a quintessentially private decision going to the very heart of personal or individual autonomy.
> Although the liberty to choose where one resides is clearly not an inalienable right, it may be considered a strong argument that children should only be forced to leave their family homes in the most extreme circumstances. This is not the case here as Aboriginal children are removed from their homes in far greater numbers than non-Aboriginal children for the purposes of receiving services.
> Alternatively, it may be argued that placement of children in care, due to lack of services, amounts to an infringement of the parent's right to security of the person, under s.7. (see Wen:de at, pp.96-97) (emphasis ours).

[167] According to the Supreme Court of Canada, the removal of a child from a parent's custody adversely impacts the psychological integrity of that parent causing distress, in New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46.

> The Supreme Court of Canada found the right to security of the person encompasses psychological integrity and may be infringed by state action which causes significant emotional distress:
> Moreover, it was held that the loss of a child constitutes the kind of psychological harm which may found a claim for breach of s.7. Lamer J., for the majority, held: I have little doubt that state removal of a child from parental custody pursuant to the state's parens patriae jurisdiction constitutes a serious interference with the psychological integrity of the parent…As an individual's status as a parent is often fundamental to personal identity, the stigma and distress resulting from a loss of parental status is a particularly serious consequence of the state's conduct.
> The Court went on to state that there are circumstances where loss of a child will not found a prima facie breach of s.7, including when a child is sent to prison or conscripted into the army. Clearly, these circumstances can be distinguished from the removal of a child from his/her home due to the > government's failure to provide adequate funding and services (see Wen:de at, pp.96-97) (emphasis ours).

> The federal funding formula, directive 20-1, impacts a very vulnerable segment of our society, Aboriginal children. The protection of these children from state action, infringing on their most fundamental rights and freedoms, is clearly in line with the spirit of ss.7 and 15 of the Charter. Research conducted on the issue of child welfare plainly shows differentiation in the quality of services provided on and off reserve and to aboriginal and non-aboriginal children. This type of differentiation is unacceptable in a society that prides itself on protection of the vulnerable. (Wen:de at, pp.96-97) (emphasis ours).

[168] Furthermore, compelling evidence in other reports filed in evidence also discusses the psychological damage, pain and suffering endured by First Nations children and their families:

> WE BEGIN OUR DISCUSSION of social policy with a focus on the family because it is our conviction that much of the failure of responsibility that contributes to the current imbalance and distress in Aboriginal life centres around the family. Let us clarify at the outset that the failure of responsibility that we seek to understand and correct is not a failure of Aboriginal families. Rather, it is a failure of public policy to recognize and respect Aboriginal culture and family systems and to ensure a just distribution of the wealth and power of this land so that Aboriginal nations, communities and families can provide for themselves and determine how best to pursue a good life. (see RCAP, vol. 3, at, p. 8).
> Many experts in the child welfare field are coming to believe that the removal of any child from his/her parents is inherently damaging, in and of itself…. The effects of apprehension on an individual Native child will often be much more traumatic than for his non-Native counterpart. Frequently, when the Native child is taken from his parents, he is also removed from a tightly knit community of extended family members and neighbours, who may have provided some support. In addition, he is removed from a unique, distinctive and familiar culture. The Native child is placed in a position of triple jeopardy (see RCAP, Gathering strength, vol. 3, at, pp. 23-24).

[169] The Panel finds there is absolutely no doubt that the removal of children from their families and communities is traumatic and causes great pain and suffering to them:

> At our hearings in Kenora, Josephine Sandy, who chairs Ojibway Tribal Family Services, explained what moved her and others to mobilize for change:

> Over the years, I watched the pain and suffering that resulted as non-Indian law came to control more and more of our lives and our traditional lands. I have watched my people struggle to survive in the face of this foreign law.
>
> Nowhere has this pain been more difficult to experience than in the area of family life. I and all other Anishnabe people of my generation have seen the pain and humiliation created by non-Indian child welfare agencies in removing hundreds of children from our communities in the fifties, sixties and the seventies. My people were suffering immensely as we had our way of life in our lands suppressed by the white man's law.
>
> This suffering was only made worse as we endured the heartbreak of having our families torn apart by non-Indian organizations created under this same white man's law.
>
> People like myself vowed that we would do something about this. We had to take control of healing the wounds inflicted on us in this tragedy.
>
> Josephine Sandy Chair, Ojibway Tribal Family Services Kenora, Ontario, 28 October 1992,

[170] Another report filed in evidence supports the existence of pain and suffering of First Nations children and their families. Several experiences of massive loss have disrupted First Nations families and have resulted in identity problems and difficulties in functioning. In 1996, more than 10% of Aboriginal children (age 0-14) were not living with their parents. see p. 7 Joint National policy review (NPR) exhibit filed into evidence. Akin to the Wen:de report, the Tribunal accepted the findings in the NPR as its own findings (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 257). Additionally, Canada was part of this study and fully aware of its findings which in fact exacerbates Canada's wilful and reckless conduct in not correcting the discriminatory practice identified in 2000, year of the report. This will also be discussed later.

[171] More recently, the Panel made findings that support the findings for pain and suffering of First Nations children and their families when the families are torn apart:

> Ms. Marie Wilson, one of the three Commissioners for the TRC mandated to facilitate truth-telling about the residential school experience and lead the country in a process of ongoing healing and reconciliation, swore an affidavit that was filed into evidence in the motions' proceedings. She affirms that she personally bore witness to fifteen hundred statements made to the TRC. Many were from those who grew up as children in the foster care system as it currently exists. She also heard from hundreds of parents with children taken into care. Over and over again, she states the Commissioners heard that the worst part of the Residential schools was not the sexual abuse but rather the rupture from the family and home and everything and everyone familiar and cherished. This was the worst aspect and the most universal amongst the voices they heard. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 122).

Ms. Wilson notes in her affidavit that children removed from their parents to be placed in foster care shared similar experiences to those who went to residential schools. The day they remember most vividly was the day they were taken from their home. She mentions, as the Commissioners have said in their report, that child welfare may be considered a continuation of or, a replacement for the residential school system. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 123).

Ms. Wilson affirms that they, (the TRC), intentionally centered their 5 first calls to Action specifically on child welfare. This was to shed a focused and prominent light on the fact that the harms of residential schools happened to children, that the greatest perceived damage to them was their removal from their home and family; and that the legacy of residential schools is not only continuing but getting worse, with increasing numbers of child apprehensions through the child welfare system. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 124).

In addition to the Legacy calls to action pertaining to child welfare, she explains that they also articulated child welfare goals in the subsequent Reconciliation section. Call to Action 55 underscores the importance of creating and tracking honest measurements of the numbers of Indigenous children still apprehended and why, and the support being provided for them, based on comparative spending in prevention and care. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 125).

According to Ms. Wilson, it is imperative that the child welfare system, which is driving Indigenous children into foster care at disproportionate rates, be immediately addressed. She has learned firsthand that children who are severed from their families will forever carry with them a lasting and detrimental sense of loss, along with other negative issues that may change the course of their lives. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 126).

The Panel has made findings on this issue in the Decision and we echo Ms. Wilson's call to action to immediately address the causes that drive Indigenous children into foster care. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 127).

[172] The Panel received Ms. Wilson's evidence in 2017-2018 and has relied upon it in its ruling. The ruling was accepted by Canada in its submissions following receipt of an advanced confidential copy of the ruling and the Panel included Canada's submissions and the Panel's comments in the ruling:

> Finally, on the same day, the AGC (…) indicated that Canada is fully committed to implement all the orders in this ruling and understands that its funding approach needs to change, which includes providing agencies the funding they need to meet the best interests and needs of First Nations children and families.
> The Panel is delighted to read Canada's commitment and openness. This is very encouraging and fosters hope to a higher degree (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, paras. 449-450).

[173] This was reiterated later on, as part of a consultation protocol with all parties in this case and signed by Minister Jane Philpott as she then was (see Consultation Protocol signed March 2, 2018).

[174] Moreover, Canada has accepted the TRC's report authored by the 3 Commissioners including Ms. Wilson, and undertook to implement all 94 calls to action (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 61). It is unlikely that Canada would accept the recommendations yet not the findings that led to those recommendations.

[175] What is more, the Panel believes that the highly credible TRC Commissioner like other adults referred to above speak on behalf of children and voice the harm and suffering endured by First Nations children who are vulnerable and need not testify before this Tribunal for the Panel to make a determination of their suffering of being unnecessarily removed from their homes and the harms caused as a result of the systemic and racial discrimination.

[176] Furthermore, as mentioned above, the Tribunal has already recognized the need and importance for First Nations children, communities and Nations for urgent action to eliminate the removal of First Nations children from their families and communities as a result of the discrimination and Canada's part in remedying it in the March 2, 2018 Consultation protocol signed by Minister Philpott:

> To address what the Tribunal in paragraph 47 of the February 1st Ruling refers to as the "mass removal of children". As the Tribunal states: "There is urgency to act and prioritize the elimination of the removal of children from their families and communities". (Consultation protocol signed March 2, 2018 at, section d, page 5)
> To promote substantive equality for First Nations children, families and communities on reserves and in the Yukon in the delivery of child and family services, particularly in light of their higher level of needs because of historical disadvantages suffered by First Nations families, children and communities as a result of the legacy of colonialism and Indian Residential Schools. (Consultation protocol at, section g, page 5).

[177] Also, to the question what if the child was unnecessarily removed as a result of multiple factors and not solely because of Canada's actions? The Panel answers that while the Panel acknowledges that child welfare issues are multifaceted and may involve the interplay of numerous underlying factors (see for example, 2016 CHRT 2 Decision at, para. 187) this does not alleviate Canada's responsibility in the suffering of First Nations children and their families who bore the adverse impacts of Canada's control over the provision of child and family services on First Nations reserves and in the Yukon by the application of the funding formulas under the FNCFS Program.

[178] Moreover, the Panel found that in this case we are in a unique constitutional context namely, Parliament's exclusive legislative authority over "Indians, and lands reserved for Indians" by virtue of section 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. Furthermore, Canada, is in a fiduciary relationship with Aboriginal Peoples. What is more, Canada has undertaken to improve outcomes for First Nations children and families in the provision of child and family services. On this basis, the Panel found that more has to be done by Canada to ensure that the provision of child and family services on First Nations reserves is meeting the best interest of those communities and, in the particular context of this case, the best interest of First Nations children (see 2016 CHRT 2 Decision at, para. 427).

[179] This also corresponds to Canada's international commitments recognizing the special status of children and Indigenous peoples. Also, the Panel found that Canada provides a service through the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements and method of funding the FNCFS Program and related provincial/territorial agreements significantly controls the provision of First Nations children and family services on reserve and in the Yukon to the detriment of First Nations children and families.

[180] Those formulas are structured in such a way that they promote negative outcomes for First Nations children and families, namely the incentive to take children into care. The result is many First Nations children and families are denied the opportunity to remain together or be reunited in a timely manner (see 2016 CHRT 2 Decision at, paras. 111; 113; 349).

[181] The Panel already found the link between the removal of children and Canada's responsibility in numerous findings including the following: "Yet, this funding formula continues. As the Auditor General puts it, "Quite frankly, one has to ask why a program goes on for 20 years, the world changes around it, and yet the formula stays the same, preventative services aren't funded, and all these children are being put into care." (see 2016 CHRT 2 Decision at, para. 197).

[182] The pain and suffering caused by the unnecessary removal of First Nations children and their families and Canada's role is at least reasonably quantifiable to $20,000. While it is the maximum compensation allowed under section 53 (2) (e) of the CHRA, it is not much in comparison to the egregious harm suffered by the First Nations children and their families as a result of the racial discrimination and adverse impacts found in this case. Other pain and suffering caused by other actors could potentially be sought in other forums. The Panel's role is to quantify as best as possible the appropriate remedy to compensate victims/survivors as part of these proceedings with the evidence available.

[183] Furthermore, the AGC relies also on the Public Service Alliance of Canada v. Canada Post Corporation case (see 2005 CHRT 39 at para. 991) to suggest that the Tribunal cannot award remedies for pain and suffering to the non-complainant victims "en masse". The Canada Post case made a finding that there was a lack of evidence before the Tribunal and that there was no systemic case. This is different from this case where there is sufficient evidence to support findings of systemic discrimination and findings of suffering borne by the victims/survivors in this case, the First Nations children and their families.

[185] The evidence is ample and sufficient to make a finding that each parent or grandparent who had one or more children under her or his care who was unnecessarily removed from their home, family and community has suffered. Any parent or grandparent if the parents were not caring for the child who had one or more children removed from them and later reunited with them has suffered during the time of separation. The Panel intends to compensate one or both parents who had their children removed from them and, if the parents were absent and the children were in the care of one or more grandparents, the grandparents caring for the children should be compensated. While the Panel does not want to diminish the pain experienced by other family members such as other grandparents not caring for the child, siblings, aunts and uncles and the community, the Panel decided in light of the record before it to limit compensation to First Nations children and their parents or if there are no parents caring for the child or children, their grandparents.

[187] The Panel addressed the adverse impacts to children throughout the Decision. The Panel found a connection between the systemic racial discrimination and the adverse impacts and that those adverse impacts are harmful to First Nations children and their families. All are connected and supported by the evidence. The Panel acknowledged this suffering in its unchallenged Decision. It did not have individual children who testified to the adverse impacts that they have experienced nevertheless the Panel found that they did suffer those adverse impacts and found systemic racial discrimination based on sufficient evidence before it. The adverse impacts identified in the Decision and suffered by children and their families were found to be the result of the systemic racial discrimination in Canada's FNCFCS Program, funding formulas, authorities and practices.

[188] The Panel need not hear from every First Nations child to assess that being forcibly removed from their homes, families and communities can cause great harm and pain. The expert evidence has already established that. The CHRA regime is different than that of a Court where a class action may be filed. The CHRA model is based on a human rights approach that is purposive and liberal and that is aimed at vindicating the victims of discriminatory practices whether considered systemic or not (see section 50 (3) (c) of the CHRA). We are talking about the mass removal of children from their respective Nations. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, paras. 47, 62, 66, 121, and 133). The Tribunal's mandate is within a quasi-constitutional statute with a special legislative regime to remedy discrimination. This is the first process to employ when deciding issues before it. If the CHRA and the human rights case law are silent, it may be useful to look to other regimes when appropriate. In the present case, the CHRA and human rights case law voice a possible way forward. The novelty and unchartered territory found in a case should not intimidate human rights decision-makers to pioneer a right and just path forward for victims/survivors if supported by the evidence and the Statute. As argued by the Commission, sufficiency of evidence is a material consideration.

[189] Furthermore, the impracticalities and the risk of revictimizing children outweigh the difficulty of establishing a process to compensate all the victims/survivors and the need for the evidence presented of having a child testify on how they felt to be separated from their family and community.

[190] The Panel rejects the AGC's argument that there is no evidence of harm the victims suffered as a result of the discrimination to demonstrate that the victims meet the statutory requirements for compensation.

[191] The evidence is sufficient to establish a connection between the systemic racial discrimination and the First Nations children who did not receive services or did receive services that were inadequate and harmful. This was all explained in the Decision and it is now too late to challenge those findings. The children should not be penalized because the Panel had outstanding questions concerning compensation which prompted further submissions from the parties.

[192] Finally, on this point, the Panel rejects the assertion made by the AGC that there is no evidence permitting the Panel to determine the extent and seriousness of the harm in order to assess the appropriate compensation for the individual victims. Furthermore, the AGC's argument that there is no evidence of pain and suffering from children and families as a result of the discrimination is simply not true. This is a similar assertion that Canada has made on the evidence to prove the complaint on its merits. In fact, such a conclusion by Canada is concerning to say the least. It also raises questions from this Panel. The harm done to First Nations children who are vulnerable and to families and communities is precisely why the Panel issued numerous rulings requesting immediate action. This Panel recognizes, as described by the Caring Society, the rights of the child are human rights that recognize childhood as an important period of development with special circumstances. This is also recognized by all levels of Courts in Canada and was discussed in this Panel's Decision on the merits 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 346:

> A focus on prevention services and least disruptive measures in the provincial statutes mentioned above is inextricably linked to the concept of the best interest of the child: a legal principle of paramount importance in both Canadian and international law (see Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law v. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 4 (CanLII) at para. 9; and, Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 817 at para. 75 [Baker]). As explained by Professor Nicholas Bala:
> [L]eading Canadian precedents, federal and provincial statutes and international treaties are all premised on the principle that decisions about children should be based on an assessment of their best interests. This is a central concept for those who are involved making decisions about children, not only for judges and lawyers, but for also assessors and mediators (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 346).
> Child welfare services, or child and family services, are services designed to protect children and encourage family stability. Hence the best interest of the child is a paramount principle in the provision of these services and is a principle recognized in international and Canadian law. This principle is meant to guide and inform decisions that impact all children, including First Nations children (2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 3).

[193] This is where the urgency of remedying systemic racial discrimination comes from. It is clearly expressed in the Panel's rulings. Removing children from their homes, families, communities and Nations destroys the Nations' social fabric leading to immense consequences, it is the opposite of building Nations. That is trauma and harm to the highest degree causing pain and suffering.

[194] The Panel's urging Canada to act on a number of occasions was not expressed without a reason. It was for the reason that this case is about children and there is urgency to act and the Panel understood it.

[195] In Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [1999] 2 SCR 817 at para. 69-71 [Baker] an appeal against deportation based on the position of Baker's Canadian born children, the Supreme Court held procedural fairness required the decision-maker to consider international law and conventions, including the United Nations' Convention on the Rights of the Child, Can. T.S. 1992 No. 3 (the UNCRC). The Court held the Minister's decision should follow the values found in international human rights law.

[196] The AGC should not be allowed to avoid this principle in Canada, a country who professes to uphold the best interest of the child and who signed and ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 448). Also, the CHRA is a result of the implementation of international human rights principles in domestic law (see the Decision at paras. 437-439).

[197] The Panel agrees that remedies under section 53 (2) (e) of the *Act are not to punish the Respondent however, they serve the purpose to deter the authors of discriminatory practices to continue or to repeat the same patterns. They are also some form of vindication for the victims/survivors reminding society that there is also a price to fostering inequalities which is a strong component of justice leading to some measure of healing for victims/survivors.

IX. Organizations cannot receive compensation and do not represent victims argument

[198] The individuals affected by the Decision and subsequent orders, and who are looking for an opportunity equal to other individuals to make for themselves the lives that they are able and wish to have, are First Nations children (see 2017 CHRT 14 at, para. 116).

[199] The Panel sees no merit in accepting the AGC's argument that if the Tribunal finds it has jurisdiction to award remedies under section 53 (2) (e) the AFN and the Caring Society should be awarded the remedies and not the First Nations children. This contradicts the AGC's own argument that acknowledges that the AFN and the Caring Society are organizations not victims (see para. 110 above).

[200] In a previous ruling, the Panel discussed the AFN and the Caring Society's roles in representing First Nations children's rights:

> To ensure Aboriginal rights and the best interests of First Nations children are respected in this case, the Panel believes the governance organizations representing those rights and interests, representing those children and families affected by the Decision and who are professionals in the area of First Nations child welfare, such as the Complainants and the Interested Parties, should be consulted on how best to educate the public, especially First Nations peoples, about Jordan's Principle. This consultation will also ensure a level of cultural appropriateness to the education plan and materials (see 2017 CHRT 14 at, para. 118).

[201] However, it is true that the Complainants do not have a legal representation mandate given by each First Nations child and parent living on reserve to seek remedy on their behalf at the Tribunal. What they do have is a resolution from the Chiefs in Assembly of the AFN mandating the AFN to seek remedies for Members of First Nations who are represented by their elected First Nations Chiefs. Some First Nations Peoples may disagree to have the AFN or others to advocate on their behalf and request individual remedies in front of the Tribunal, this is their right and the Panel believes they should be able to opt-out. The opting-out possibility will form part of the compensation process discussed below.

[202] This being said, for those who would accept, the Panel finds that the AFN mandated by resolution by Chiefs of First Nations should be able to speak on behalf of their children and voice their needs and seek redress for compensation which should go directly to victims/survivors following a culturally safe and independent process, protecting sensitive information and privacy with the option to opt-out. The Panel believes also that the COO and the NAN should be able to speak on behalf of their children and voice their needs and seek redress for compensation. Also, the Caring Society directed by Dr. Cindy Blackstock has worked tirelessly for numerous years to represent the best interest of children with an Indigenous lens and has invaluable expertise to assist the Panel and the parties in this process.

[203] This being said the Panel does not believe that it has jurisdiction to create another Tribunal to delegate its responsibilities under the CHRA to it. The compensation process will be discussed below.

X. The right to exercise individual rights, class action and victims' identification [204] The Panel believes that individuals have the right to exercise their individual rights and for those who choose to do so, they should be able to opt-out from receiving the compensation ordered in this ruling.

[205] The Panel also notes that the class action has not yet been certified by the Federal Court. Moreover, the possibility of a future certified class action and, if successful, orders made for punitive damages remedies under the Charter amongst other things being offset by the capped remedies orders under the CHRA made by this Tribunal is not a convincing argument to refrain from awarding compensation in these proceedings. Additionally, the Tribunal's orders below do not cover years 1991 to 2005. The Tribunal's orders below also cover First Nations children and First Nations parents or grandparents.

[206] The fact that a class action has been filed does not change the Tribunal's obligations under the Act to remedy the discrimination and if applicable as it is here, to provide a deterrent and discourage those who discriminate, to provide meaningful systemic and individual remedies to a group of vulnerable First Nations children and their families who are victims/survivors in this case.

[207] In regards to identification of victims/survivors, as explained by the Caring Society, some of the children can be identified by the Indian Registry and following a process agreed upon by the parties who wish to participate. Therefore, their identities are not impossible to obtain and are readily available contrary to the situation in the C.N.R. case from the Federal Court of Appeal that the AGC relies upon. The AGC argues the Court concluded that compensation for individuals is not an appropriate remedy in complaints of systemic discrimination. The AGC added the Court found that compensation is limited to victims which made it "impossible, or in any event inappropriate, to apply it in cases of group or systemic discrimination" where, as here "by the nature of things individual victims are not always readily identifiable". Again, this is not the case here.

[208] The Panel finds this is a case where it is appropriate to compensate victims/survivors since the systemic racial discrimination and the adverse impacts found by the Panel in its Decision, subsequent rulings and this ruling, caused serious harm to victims/survivors. While the task to identify all the individuals is a complex one, it is not impossible given the Indian Registry and the Jordan's Principle process and records.

XI. Class actions and representative of the victims

[209] On one hand, the AGC contends the Tribunal is not the right forum to deal with class actions and on another hand it uses some of the class action criteria to support its position that there is no representative of the group of victims before the Tribunal. With respect, the AGC cannot have it both ways. Accepting the proposition that the Tribunal is not the right forum for class actions in light of its statute requires one to look at what can be done under the statute and not impose the class action criteria to the Tribunal process. While it can be useful to look at class action requirements, the rules of statutory interpretation require the Tribunal to first look at the CHRA given that its jurisdiction is derived from it. In addition, the CHRA is quasi-constitutional in nature which would supersede any law conflicting with the CHRA. If the CHRA is silent on an issue, the Tribunal can then use a number of useful tools at its disposition.

[210] In any event, even proof by presumption of facts, provided that such presumptions are sufficiently serious, precise and concordant, applies to class actions (Quebec (Public Curator) v. Syndicat national des employés de l'hôpital St-Ferdinand, [1996] 3 SCR 211, 1996 CanLII 172 (SCC) at, para. 132). More so in front of a Human Rights Tribunal allowed to receive any type of evidence under the Act.

XII. Jordan's Principle remedies

[211] There is no doubt that Jordan's Principle has always been part of the claim from the complaint to the Statement of Particulars to the presentation of evidence and the Tribunal's findings and orders. This question was answered and cannot be revisited.

[212] In sum, in honor and memory of Jordan River Anderson, Jordan's Principle is a child-first principle that applies equally to all First Nations children, whether resident on or off reserve. It is not limited to First Nations children with disabilities, or those with discrete short-term issues creating critical needs for health and social supports or affecting their activities of daily living (see 2017 CHRT 35 at, para. 135,1.B.i.).

[213] Jordan's Principle addresses the needs of First Nations children by ensuring there are no gaps in government services to them. It can address, for example, but is not limited to, gaps in such services as mental health, special education, dental, physical therapy, speech therapy, medical equipment and physiotherapy. (see 2017 CHRT 35 at, para. 135,1.B.ii.).

[214] What is more, the Panel rejects the AGC's argument that compensation is inappropriate in Jordan's Principle cases since the Tribunal already ordered Canada to retroactively review the cases that were denied. The retroactive review of cases ensures the child receives the service if not too late and eliminates discrimination. It does not account for the suffering borne by children and their parents while they did not receive the service.

[215] On the issue of there being no basis in the Act to award compensation to complainant organizations or non-complainant individuals under Jordan's Principle, the Panel applies the same reasoning outlined above. On the argument advanced by Canada that when it has implemented policies that satisfactorily address discrimination no further orders are required, the Panel also relies on its reasons above where it says that systemic and individual remedies can co-exist if the evidence in the specific case supports it and is deemed appropriate by the Panel.

[216] Also, the Panel ordered the use of a broad definition of Jordan's Principle that applies to all First Nations services across all services. It is worth mentioning that many Jordan's Principle cases involve vulnerable children who experience mental and/or physical disabilities. We will return to this right after a review of the purpose of the CHRA below:

> The purpose of the CHRA is to give effect to the principle that all individuals should have an opportunity equal with other individuals to make for themselves the lives that they are able and wish to have and to have their needs accommodated, consistent with their duties and obligations as members of society, without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices.
> (Section 2 of the CHRA).

[217] In the same vein with this principle, the Covenant on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, adopted on 13 December 2006 during the sixty-first session of the General Assembly by resolution A/RES/61/106 signed by Canada on March 30th, 2007 and ratified by Canada on March 11, 2010, in its Preamble mentions:

> Recognizing also that discrimination against any person on the basis of disability is a violation of the inherent dignity and worth of the human person. (see Grant at paras. 103-104). Moreover, article 1 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G.A. Res. 217 A (III), U.N. Doc. A/810, at. 71 (1948), which provides that all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and in rights.

[218] The concept of objective appreciation of dignity when vulnerable mentally disabled persons who are not always in a position to appreciate their own self-dignity or breach there of as been recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada:

> Having regard to the manner in which the concept of personal "dignity" has been defined, and to the principles of large and liberal construction that apply to legislation concerning human rights and freedoms, I believe that s. 4 of the Charter addresses interferences with the fundamental attributes of a human being which violate the respect to which every person is entitled simply because he or she is a human being and the respect that a person owes to himself or herself.

> In the case before us, it appears to me that the majority of the Court of Appeal properly pointed out that, in considering the situation of the mentally disabled, the nature of the care that is normally provided to them is of fundamental importance. We cannot ignore the fact that the general objective of the services provided at the Hospital goes beyond meeting the patients' primary needs (see Commission des droits de la personne v. Coutu, 1995 CanLII 2537 (QC TDP), [1995] R.J.Q. 1628 (H.R.T.), at pp. 1652-53). This is apparent from, inter alia, the legislator's intention (see An Act respecting health services and social services, R.S.Q., c. S-4.2) and the fact that there is a certain level of social consensus concerning what sort of support services are required in order for the needs of these people to be met.
> This being said, the fact that some patients have a low level of awareness of their environment because of their mental condition may undoubtedly influence their own conception of dignity. As Fish J.A. observed, however, when we are dealing with a document of the nature of the Charter, it is more important that we turn our attention to an objective appreciation of dignity and what that requires in terms of the necessary care and services. In the case at bar, I believe that the trial judge's findings of fact indicate, beyond a shadow of a doubt, that, although the discomfort suffered by the patients of the Hospital was transient, it constituted interference with the safeguard of their dignity, a right guaranteed by s. 4 of the Charter, despite the fact that, as the trial judge noted, these patients might have had no sense of modesty. (Quebec (Public Curator) v. Syndicat national des employés de l'hôpital St-Ferdinand, [1996] 3 SCR 211, 1996 CanLII 172 (SCC) at, paras. 105 and 107-108), [Public Curator].

[220] Furthermore, the Supreme Court found that disrupting services was an interference of the service recipients' dignity and causing them a moral prejudice under rules of civil liability and under the Charter:

> Moreover, the pressure that the appellants wanted to bring to bear on the employer inevitably involved disrupting the services and care normally provided to the patients of the Hospital, and necessarily involved intentional interference with their dignity (Quebec (Public Curator) v. Syndicat national des employés de l'hôpital St-Ferdinand, [1996] 3 SCR 211, 1996 CanLII 172 (SCC) at, para. 124) [Public Curator].

[221] While this is not a class action or a civil liability or Charter case, the principle can be applied here to support the finding that the disruption of services offered to a vulnerable group of peoples, in this case First Nations children and families, amounts to a breach of their dignity applying the objective appreciation of dignity principle. Under the CHRA this would be covered under section 53 (2) (e). This reasoning also applies to First Nations children and families in the case of the removal of a child from the home, family and community.

[222] What is more, the Tribunal has already made findings in past rulings in regards to gaps, delays and denials of essential services to First Nations children under Jordan's Principle and also its connection to child welfare, some of them are reproduced here:

> Despite Jordan's Principle being an effective means by which to immediately address some of the shortcomings in the provision of child and family services to First Nations identified in the Decision while a comprehensive reform is undertaken, Canada's approach to the principle risks perpetuating the discrimination and service gaps identified in the Decision, especially with respect to allocating dedicated funds and resources to address some of these issues (see Decision at para. 356) (…) (see 2017 CHRT 14, at para. 78).
>
> The work of the two departments on Jordan's Principle has highlighted what all of us knew from years of experience: that there are differences of opinion, authorities and resources between the two departments that appear to cause gaps in service to children and families resident on reserve. The main programs at issue include INAC's Income Assistance program and the Child and Family Services program; for Health Canada, it is Non-Insured Health Benefits program (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 369).
>
> Another medical related expenditure identified as a concern is mental health services. Health Canada's funding for mental health services is for short term mental health crises, whereas children in care often require ongoing mental health needs and those services are not always available on reserve. Therefore, children in care are not accessing mental health services due to service delays, limited funding and time limits on the service. To exacerbate the situation for some children, if they cannot get necessary mental health services, they are unable to access school-based programs for children with special needs that require an assessment/diagnosis from a psychologist (see Gaps in Service Delivery to First Nation Children and Families in BC Region at pp. 2-3). (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 372).
> In the Panel's view, it is Health Canada's and AANDC's narrow interpretation of Jordan's Principle that results in there being no cases meeting the criteria for Jordan's Principle. This interpretation does not cover the extent to which jurisdictional gaps may occur in the provision of many federal services that support the health, safety and well-being of First Nations children and families. Such an approach defeats the purpose of Jordan's Principle and results in service gaps, delays and denials for First Nations children on reserve. Coordination amongst all federal departments and programs, especially AANDC and Health Canada programs, would help avoid these gaps in services to First Nations children in need (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 381).

More importantly, Jordan's Principle is meant to apply to all First Nations children. There are many other First Nations children without multiple disabilities who require services, including child and family services. Having to put a child in care in order to access those services, when those services are available to all other Canadians is one of the main reasons this Complaint was made (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 382).

AANDC's design, management and control of the FNCFS Program, along with its corresponding funding formulas and the other related provincial/territorial agreements have resulted in denials of services and created various adverse impacts for many First Nations children and families living on reserves. Non-exhaustively, the main adverse impacts found by the Panel are:

(…) The narrow definition and inadequate implementation of Jordan's Principle, resulting in service gaps, delays and denials for First Nations children (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 458).

In January 2017, two twelve-year-old children tragically took their own lives in Wapekeka First Nation ("Wapekeka"), a NAN community. Before the loss of these children, Wapekeka had alerted the federal government, through Health Canada, to concerns about a suicide pact amongst a group of young children and youth. This information was contained in a July 2016 detailed proposal aimed at seeking funding for an in-community mental health team as a preventative measure (see 2017 CHRT 7 at, para. 8).

The Wapekeka proposal was left unaddressed by Canada for several months with a reactive response coming only after the two youths committed suicide. The media response from Health Canada was that it acknowledged it had received the July 2016 proposal in September 2016; however, it came at an "awkward time in the federal funding cycle" (see affidavit of Dr. Michael Kirlew, January 27, 2017, at para. 16). The Panel acknowledges how inappropriate this response is in such circumstances and the additional suffering it must have caused (See 2017 CHRT 7 para. 9).

Tragically, in February 2017, two other youths aged 11 and 21 took their own lives in NAN communities of Deer Lake and Kitchenuhmaykoosib Inninuwug (see affidavit of Sol Mamakwa, February 13, 2017, at para. 5) (See 2017 CHRT 7 para. 10).

The Panel would like to acknowledge and extend our condolences to the families and communities of these youths and to all those who have lost children in similar tragic circumstances (See 2017 CHRT 7 para. 11).

The loss of our children by suicide in Nishnawbe Aski Nation (NAN) has created untold pain and despair for families, communities and all of our people. Health Canada's commitment "to establish a Choose Life Working Group with NAN aimed at establishing a concrete, simplified process for communities to apply for Child First Initiative funding" establishes an important route for our communities in crisis to access Jordan's Principle funds (See 2017 CHRT 7 Annex A letter Re: Choose Life Pilot Working Group, dated March 22, 2017 from Nishnawbe Aski Nation Grand Chief Alvin Fiddler to Dr. Valerie Gideon, Assistant Deputy Minister Regional Operations First Nations and Inuit Health Branch Health Canada).

At the October 30-31, 2019 hearing (October hearing), Canada' witness, Dr. Valerie Gideon, Senior Assistant Deputy Minister of the First Nations and Inuit Health Branch at the Department of Indigenous Services Canada, admitted in her testimony that the Tribunal's May 2017 CHRT 14 ruling and orders on Jordan's Principle definition and publicity measures caused a large jump in cases for First Nations children. In fact, from July 2016 to March 2017 there were approximately 5,000 Jordan's Principle approved services. After the Panel's ruling, this number jumped to just under 77,000 Jordan's Principle approved services in 2017/2018. This number continues to increase. At the time of the October hearing, over 165 000 Jordan's Principle approved services have now been approved under Jordan's Principle as ordered by this Tribunal. This is confirmed by Dr. Gideon's testimony and it is not disputed by the Caring Society. Furthermore, it is also part of the new documentary evidence presented during the October hearing and now forms part of the Tribunal's evidentiary record. Those services were gaps in services that First Nations children would not have received but for the Jordan's Principle broad definition as ordered by the Panel. In response to Panel Chair Sophie Marchildon's questions, Dr. Gideon also testified that Jordan's Principle is not a program, it is considered a legal rule by Canada. This is also confirmed in a document attached as an exhibit to Dr. Gideon's affidavit. Dr. Gideon testified that she wrote this document (see Affidavit of Dr. Valerie Gideon, dated, May 24, 2018 at exhibit 4, at page 2). This document named, Jordan's Principle Implementation-Ontario Region, under the title, Our Commitment states as follows:

No sun-setting of Jordan's Principle. Jordan's Principle is a legal requirement not a program and thus there will be no sun-setting of Jordan's Principle (…) There cannot be any break in Canada's response to the full implementation of Jordan's Principle (see 2019 CHRT 7 at, para. 25).

The Panel is delighted to hear that thousands of services have been approved since it issued its orders. It is now proven, that this substantive equality remedy has generated significant change for First Nations children and is efficient and measurable. While there is still room for improvement, it also fosters hope. We would like to honor Jordan River Anderson and his family for their legacy. We also acknowledge the Caring Society, the AFN and the Canadian Human Rights Commission for bringing this issue before the Tribunal and for the Caring Society, the AFN, the COO, the NAN, and the Canadian Human Rights Commission for their tireless efforts. We also honor the Truth and Reconciliation Commission for its findings and recommendations. Finally, the Panel recognizes that while there is more work to do to eliminate discrimination in the long term, Canada has made substantial efforts to provide services to First Nations children under Jordan's Principle especially since November 2017. Those efforts are made by people such as Dr. Gideon and the Jordan's Principle team and the Panel believes it is noteworthy. This is also recognized by the Caring Society in an April 17, 2018 letter filed in the evidence (see Dr. Valerie Gideon's affidavit, dated December 21st, 2018, at Exhibit A). This is not to convey the message that a colonial system which generated racial discrimination across the country is to be praised for starting to correct it. Rather, it is recognizing the decision-makers and the public servants' efforts to implement the Tribunal's rulings hence, truly impacting the lives of children. (see 2019 CHRT 7 at, para. 26).

The Panel finds the outcome of S.J.'s case is unreasonable. The coverage under Jordan's Principle was denied because S.J.'s mother registered under 6(2) of the Indian Act and could not transmit status to her in light of the second-generation cut-off rule. This is the main reason why S.J.'s travel costs were refused. The second reason is that it was not deemed urgent by Canada when in fact the situation was not assessed appropriately. Finally, no one seems to have turned their minds to the needs of the child and her best interests. There is no indication that a substantive equality analysis has been employed here. Rather a bureaucratic approach was applied for denying coverage for a child of just over 18 months (Canada's team described the child has being 1 year and a half old, see affidavit of Dr. Valerie Gideon, dated December 21st, 2018, email chain at Exhibit F), who has been waiting for this scan from birth. This type of bureaucratic approach in Programs was linked to discrimination in the Decision (see at, paras. 365-382 and 391) (see 2019 CHRT 7 at, para. 73).

[223] All the above findings support a finding that First Nations children and their families experienced pain and suffering and a breach of their dignity as a result of gaps, delays and denials of essential services.

[224] Other evidence in the record further exemplifies that delays, gaps and denials cause real harm and suffering to the Frist Nations children and their families:

> In another case, a child with Batten Disease, a fatal inherited disorder of the nervous system, had to wait sixteen months to obtain a hospital bed that could incline at 30 degrees in order to alleviate the respiratory distress that resulted from her condition. AANDC, Jordan's Principle Chart Documenting Cases, October 6, 2013 (see HR, Vol 15, tab 422, p 2).
>
> MR. WUTTKE: All right. So I see that the initial contact took place in 2007 and that bed was actually delivered in 2008. So it took approximately one year for the child to actually get a bed; is that correct?
>
> MS BAGGLEY: Well, it said the summer of 2008.
>
> MR. WUTTKE: Okay.
>
> MS BAGGLEY: "Tomatoe/tomato".
>
> MR. WUTTKE: Between half a year and three quarters of a year?
>
> MS BAGGLEY: Yes, yes.
>
> MR. WUTTKE: My question regarding this matter, considering it's a child that has respiratory and could face respiratory failure distress, how is this length of time between six months to a year to provide a child a bed reasonable in any circumstances?
> MS BAGGLEY: Well, from my perspective, no, that's not reasonable, but there's not enough information here to determine what were the reasons. (see Corinne Baggley Cross Examination, May 1, 2014 (Vol 58, p 117-118, lines 16-25, 1-12).

[225] The Panel finds there is sufficient evidence in the record as demonstrated above to justify findings that pain and suffering of the worst kind warranting the maximum compensation under section 53 (2) (e) of the CHRA is experienced by First Nations children and families as a result of Canada's approach to Jordan's Principle that led to the Tribunals' rulings in this case.

[226] First Nations children are denied essential services. The Tribunal heard extensive evidence that demonstrates that First Nations children were denied essential services after a significant and detrimental delay causing real harm to those children and their parents or grandparents caring for them. The Supreme Court of Canada discussed the objective component to dignity to mentally disabled people in the Public Curator case above mentioned and the Panel believes this principle is applicable to vulnerable children in determining their suffering of being denied essential services. Moreover, as demonstrated by examples above, some children and families have also experienced serious mental and physical pain as a result of delays in services.

XIII. Special compensation: wilful and reckless

[227] The special compensation remedy sought as part of this ruling is found at para. 53 (3) of the CHRA:

> (3) In addition to any order under subsection (2), the member or panel may order the person to pay such compensation not exceeding twenty thousand dollars to the victim as the member or panel may determine if the member or panel finds that the person is engaging or has engaged in the discriminatory practice wilfully or recklessly.

[228] The language of the Act reproduced above refers to the term victim rather than complainant. As mentioned previously, the wording of the CHRA allows for the distinction between a complainant who is victim of the discriminatory practice and a victim of a discriminatory practice who is not a complainant.

[228A] The Tribunal in Duverger v. 2553-4330 Québec Inc. (Aéropro), 2019 CHRT 18 (CanLII), recently reiterated this Panel's legal reasons on the special compensation, Member Gaudreault wrote:

> In the decision rendered in First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada), 2015 CHRT 14 (CanLII) [Family Caring Society], at paragraph 21, members Sophie Marchildon, Réjean Bélanger and Edwards P. Lustig addressed the special compensation provided under subsection 53(3) of the CHRA:

> The Federal Court has interpreted this section as being a ". . .punitive provision intended to provide a deterrent and discourage those who deliberately discriminate" (Canada (Attorney General) v. Johnstone, 2013 FC 113 (CanLII), at para. 155, aff'd 2014 FCA 110 (CanLII) [Johnstone FC]). A finding of wilfulness requires "(…) the discriminatory act and the infringement of the person's rights under the Act is intentional" (Johnstone FC, at para. 155). Recklessness involves ". . .acts that disregard or show indifference for the consequences such that the conduct is done wantonly or heedlessly" (Johnstone FC, at para. 155), (see Duverger at para. 293).

[229] The objective of the CHRA is to remedy discrimination (Robichaud at para. 13). As opposed to remedies under section 53 (2) (e) which are not meant to punish the author of the discrimination, as mentioned above, the Federal Court in Johnstone found that section 53 (3) of the CHRA is a punitive provision.

[230] In order to be wilful or reckless, "…some measure of intent or behaviour so devoid of caution or without regard to the consequences of that behaviour" must be found (Canada (Attorney General) v. Collins, 2011 FC 1168 (CanLII), at para. 33). Again, the award of the maximum amount under this section should be reserved for the very worst cases. (see Grant at, para. 119).

[231] The Panel finds that Canada's conduct was devoid of caution with little to no regard to the consequences of its behavior towards First Nations children and their families both in regard to the child welfare program and Jordan's Principle. Canada was aware of the discrimination and of some of its serious consequences on the First Nations children and their families. Canada was made aware by the NPR in 2000 and even more so in 2005 from its participation and knowledge of the Wen:de report. Canada did not take sufficient steps to remedy the discrimination until after the Tribunal's orders. As the Panel already found in previous rulings, Canada focused on financial considerations rather than on the best interest of First Nations children and respecting their human rights.

[232] When looking at the issue of wilful and reckless discriminatory practice, the context of the claim is important. In this case we are in a context of repeated violations of human rights of vulnerable First Nations children over a very long period of time by Canada who has international, constitutional and human rights obligations towards First Nations children and families. Moreover, the Crown must act honourably in all its dealings with Aboriginal Peoples:

> First Nations children and families on reserves are in a fiduciary relationship with AANDC. In the provision of the FNCFS Program, its corresponding funding formulas and the other related provincial/territorial agreements, "the degree of economic, social and proprietary control and discretion asserted by the Crown" leaves First Nations children and families "…vulnerable to the risks of government misconduct or ineptitude" (Wewaykum at para. 80). This fiduciary relationship must form part of the context of the Panel's analysis, along with the corollary principle that in all its dealings with Aboriginal peoples, the honour of the Crown is always at stake. As affirmed by the Supreme Court in Haida Nation, at paragraph 17:
> Nothing less is required if we are to achieve "the reconciliation of the pre-existence of aboriginal societies with the sovereignty of the Crown": Delgamuukw, supra, at para. 186, quoting Van der Peet, supra, at para. 31, (see Decision 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 95).

[233] In light of Canada's obligations above mentioned, the fact that the systemic racial discrimination adversely impacts children and causes them harm, pain and suffering is an aggravating factor than cannot be overlooked.

[234] The Panel finds it has sufficient evidence to find that Canada's conduct was wilful and reckless resulting in what we have referred to as a worst-case scenario under our Act.

[235] What is more, many federal government representatives of different levels were aware of the adverse impacts that the Federal FNCFS Program had on First Nations children and families and some of those admissions form part of the evidence and were referred to in the Panel's findings. A review of the Panel's findings contained in the Decision and rulings supports this.

[236] The Panel rejects Canada's position that the reports in the evidentiary record and findings cannot lead to a finding of wilful and reckless conduct by this Tribunal's findings because they were improving the services over time. Wen:de specifically cautioned against a piecemeal implementation of the recommendations and that is precisely what Canada did. This was also explained in the Decision.

[237] In addition, the Tribunal already made findings about Canada's conduct and awareness of the adverse impacts to First Nations children and their families in past rulings. Although too numerous to reproduce them entirely in this ruling, some are above mentioned and some will be mentioned here and those findings cannot be challenged now:

> In another presentation, AANDC describes Directive 20-1 as “broken”:
>
> The current system is BROKEN, i.e. piecemeal and fragmented
>
> The current system contributes to dysfunctional relationships, i.e. jurisdictional issues (at federal and provincial levels), lack of coordination, working at cross purposes, silo mentality
>
> […]
>
> The current program focus is on protection (taking children into care) rather than prevention (supporting the family)
>
> Early intervention/prevention has become standard practice in the provinces/territories, numerous U.S. states, and New Zealand
>
> INAC CFS has been unable to keep up with the provincial changes
>
> Where prevention supports are common practice, results have demonstrated that rates of children in care and costs are stabilized and/or reduced
>
> (Annex, ex. 35 at pp. 2-3 [Putting Children and Families First in Alberta presentation]) (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 270).
>
> Putting Children and Families First in Alberta presentation touts prevention as the ideal option to address these problems at page 4:
>
> Early prevention and child-centered outcomes are the missing pieces of the puzzle for FN children and families living on reserve
>
> Early prevention supports the agenda for improving quality of life for children and families thereby leading to improved outcomes in the areas of early childhood development, education, and health (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 271).
>
> Finally, the Putting Children and Families First in Alberta presentation states at page 5:
>
> The facts are clear:

[…] (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 272).

[238] The above citations were presentations prepared by staff in the Federal Government supporting the fact that they were well aware of what needed to be done to stop the systemic racial discrimination and that prevention is a key component. This being said, while Canada increased prevention funds, it applied an insufficient and piecemeal approach and the Panel also found this in the Decision.

[239] First Nations agencies have been lobbying Canada since 1998 to change the system (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 272). Ten years later, in a 2018 CHRT 4 ruling, the Tribunal had to order Canada to fund prevention services:

> Canada currently funds payments of actual costs for maintenance expenses when children are apprehended and removed from their homes and families and has developed a methodology to pay for these expenses. Proceeding this way and not doing the same for prevention, perpetuates the historical disadvantage and the legacy of residential schools already explained in the Decision and rulings. It incentivizes the removal of children rather than assisting communities to stay together (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 230).

[239A] All this time Canada knew the benefit of prevention services to keep children safe within their homes and families yet it did not sufficiently fund and reform the system to foster this shift.

> This is contrary to the Tribunal's order to provide services based on need, which requires Canada to obtain each First Nation agency and First Nation's specific needs. Finally, allowing those agencies that confirm they lack capacity to keep the budget funds from year to year instead of returning them could potentially assist in addressing the issue. As far as other agencies that do have capacity are concerned, Canada is unilaterally deciding for them and delaying prevention services and least disruptive measures under a false premise. Proceeding in this fashion is harming children (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 143).
> The Panel has always recognized that there may be some children in need of protection who need to be removed from their homes. However, in the Decision, the findings highlighted the fact that too many children were removed unnecessarily, when they could have had the opportunity to remain at home with prevention services. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 161).

> The Panel finds it problematic that again, Canada's rationale is based on the funding cycle not the best interests of children, and not on being found liable under the CHRA. Moreover, there is a major problem with Budget 2016 being rolled out over 5 years. The Panel did not foresee it would take that long to address immediate relief. Leaving the highest investments for years 4 and 5, the Panel finds it does not fully address immediate relief (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 146).
> This being said, the Panel is encouraged by the steps made by Canada so far on the issue of immediate relief and the items that needed to be addressed immediately, However, we also find Canada not in full-compliance of this Panel's previous orders for least disruptive measures/prevention, small agencies, intake and investigations and legal costs. Additionally, at this time, the Panel finds there is a need to make further orders in the best interest of children (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 195).

[240] The Panel made numerous findings on the need for prevention services to reverse the removal of First Nations children from their homes, families and communities:

> Furthermore, several jurisdictional issues were identified as challenging the effectiveness of service delivery, notably the availability and access to supportive services for prevention. In this regard, the evaluation noted that a common implementation challenge for FNCFS Agencies was the need for specialized services at the community level (for example, Fetal Alcohol Spectrum Disorder assessments, therapy, counselling and addictions support). Moreover, the evaluation found of key importance the availability and access to supportive services for prevention. According to the evaluation, these services are not available through AANDC funding, though they are provided by other government departments and programs either on reserve or off reserve (see AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Alberta at pp. 16-18, 21-24) (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 286).
> Difficulties based on remoteness were also identified as a main challenge in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia. One third of agencies reported high cost and time commitments required to travel to different reserves, along with the related risks associated with not reaching high-risk cases in a timely manner. In Nova Scotia, where there is only one FNCFS Agency with two offices throughout the province, the evaluation noted it can take two to three hours to reach a child in the southwestern part of the province. On the other hand, the provincial model is structured so that its agencies are no more than a half-hour away from a child in urgent need. In extreme cases, the Nova Scotia FNCFS Agency has had to rely on the provincial agencies for assistance. According to the evaluation, because of these issues the province of Nova Scotia has recommended that AANDC provide funding to support a third office in the southwestern part of the province (see AANDC Evaluation of the Implementation of the EPFA in Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia at pp. 35-36) (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 291).

AANDC's Departmental Audit and Evaluation Branch also performed its own evaluation of the FNCFS Program in 2007 (see Annex, ex. 14 [2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program]). The findings and recommendations of the 2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program reflect those of the NPR and Wen:De reports. Of note, at page ii, the 2007 Evaluation of the FNCFS Program makes the following findings:

Although the program has met an increasing demand for services, it is not possible to say that is has achieved its objective of creating a more secure and stable environment for children on reserve, nor has it kept pace with a trend, both nationally and internationally, towards greater emphasis on early intervention and prevention.

The program's funding formula, Directive 20-1, has likely been a factor in increases in the number of children in care and Program expenditures because it has had the effect of steering agencies towards in-care options - foster care, group homes and institutional care because only these agency costs are fully reimbursed (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 273).

(…) correct the weakness in the First Nations Child and Family Services Program's funding formula, which encourages out-of-home placements for children when least disruptive measures (in-home measures) would be more appropriate. Well-being and safety of children must be agencies' primary considerations in placement decisions (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 274).

In a September 11, 2009 response to questions raised by the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development, Deputy Minister Michael Wernick described the EPFA as an "…approach that will result in better outcomes for First Nation children" (Annex, ex. 36). Mr. Wernick's response indicates AANDC's awareness of the impacts that the structure and funding for the FNCFS Program under Directive 20-1 has on the outcomes for First Nations children (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 276).

However, as the 2008 Report of the Auditor General of Canada, the 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, the 2011 Status Report of the Auditor General of Canada, and the 2012 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts pointed out, while the EPFA is an improvement on Directive 20-1, it still relies on the problematic assumptions regarding children in care, families in need, and population levels to determine funding. Furthermore, many provinces and the Yukon remain under Directive 20-1 despite AANDC's commitment to transition those jurisdictions to the EPFA (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 278).

> Despite being aware of the adverse impacts resulting from the FNCFS Program for many years, AANDC has not significantly modified the program since its inception in 1990. Nor have the schedules of the 1965 Agreement in Ontario been updated since 1998. Notwithstanding numerous reports and recommendations to address the adverse impacts outlined above, including its own internal analysis and evaluations, AANDC has sparingly implemented the findings of those reports. While efforts have been made to improve the FNCFS Program, including through the EPFA and other additional funding, those improvements still fall short of addressing the service gaps, denials and adverse impacts outlined above and, ultimately, fail to meet the goal of providing culturally appropriate child and family services to First Nations children and families living on-reserve that are reasonably comparable to those provided off-reserve (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 461).

[241] One of the most tragic and worst-case scenarios in this case and in the Jordan's Principle context is one of unreasonable delays in providing prevention and mental health services as exemplified in the situation in the Nation of Wapekeka. This delay was intentional and justified by Canada according to financial and administrative considerations. It was devoid of caution and without regard for the serious consequences on the children and their families. Some extracts of the Panel's findings are reproduced here:

> The Wapekeka proposal was left unaddressed by Canada for several months with a reactive response coming only after the two youths committed suicide. The media response from Health Canada was that it acknowledged it had received the July 2016 proposal in September 2016; however, it came at an "awkward time in the federal funding cycle" (see affidavit of Dr. Michael Kirlew, January 27, 2017, at para. 16) (see 2017 CHRT 14 at, para. 89).
> While Canada provided assistance once the Wapekeka suicides occurred, the flaws in the Jordan's Principle process left any chance of preventing the Wapekeka tragedy unaddressed and the tragic events only triggered a reactive response to then provide services. On a positive note, as mentioned above, Health Canada has since committed to establishing a Choose Life Working Group with the NAN, aimed at establishing a concrete, simplified process for communities to apply for Child-First Initiative (Jordan's Principle) funding. Nevertheless, the tragic events in Wapekeka highlight the need for a shift in process coordination around Jordan's Principle (see 2017 CHRT 14 at, para. 90).
> Ms. Buckland acknowledged that the Wapekeka proposal identified a gap in services and that Jordan's Principle funds could have been allocated to address that gap. Despite this, and the fact that it was a life or death > situation, Ms. Buckland indicated that because it was a group request, it would be processed like any other group request and go forward for the Assistant Deputy Minister's signature. In the end, she suggested it would have likely taken a period of two weeks to address the Wapekeka proposal (see Transcript of Cross-Examination of Ms. Buckland at p. 174, lines 19-21; p. 175, lines 1-4; p. 180, lines 1-9; and, p. 182, lines 11-16). (see 2017 CHRT 14 at, para. 91).

>
> If a proposal such as Wapekeka's cannot be dealt with expeditiously, how are other requests being addressed? While Canada has provided detailed timelines for how it is addressing Jordan's Principle requests, the evidence shows these processes were newly created shortly after Ms. Buckland's cross-examination. There is no indication that these timelines existed prior to February 2017. Rather, the evidence suggests a built-in delay was part of the process, as there was no clarity surrounding what the process actually was [see "Jordan's Principle, ADM Executive Oversight Committee, Record of Decisions", September 2, 2016 (Affidavit of Robin Buckland, January 25, 2017, Exhibit F, at p. 3); see also Transcript of Cross-Examination of Ms. Buckland at p. 82, lines 1-12] (see 2017 CHRT 14 at, para. 92).
>
> More significantly, Ms. Buckland's comments suggest the focus of Canada's Jordan's Principle processing remains on Canada's administrative needs rather than the seriousness of the requests, the need to act expeditiously and, most importantly, the needs and best interest of children. It is clear that the arm of the federal government first contacted still does not address the matter directly by funding the service and, thereafter, seeking reimbursement as is required by Jordan's Principle. The Panel finds Canada's new Jordan's Principle process to be very similar to the old one, except for a few additions. In developing this new process, there does not appear to have been much consideration given to the shortcomings of the previous process. (see 2017 CHRT 14 at, para. 93).
> The timelines imposed on First Nations children and families in attempting to access Jordan's Principle funding give the government time to navigate between its own services and programs similar to what the Panel found to be problematic in the Decision (see 2017 CHRT 14 at, para. 94).

[242] The evidence and findings above support the finding that Canada was aware of the discrimination adversely impacting First Nations children and families in the contexts of child welfare and/or Jordan's Principle and therefore, Canada's conduct was devoid of caution and without regard for the consequences on First Nations children and their parents or grandparents which amounts to a reckless conduct compensable under section 53 (3) of the CHRA. The Panel finds that Canada's conduct amounts to a worst-case scenario warranting the maximum compensation of $20,000 under the Act.

[243] The AFN filed affidavit evidence on the Indian Residential School Settlement Agreement (IRSSA) as part of these proceedings and the Panel opted to adopt a similar approach in determining the remedies to victims/survivors in this case so as to avoid the burdensome and potentially harmful task of scaling the suffering per individual in remedies that are capped at $20,000 under the CHRA. The dispositions of the IRSSA found in Mr. Jeremy Kolodziej's affidavit affirmed on April 4, 2019 and reproduced below illustrate the rationale behind the lump sum payment to those victims/survivors who attended Residential School:

> "CEP" and "Common Experience Payment" mean a lump sum payment made to an Eligible CEP Recipient in the manner set out in Article Five (5) of this Agreement;
> 5.02 Amount of CEP
>
> The amount of the Common Experience Payment will be:
>
> (1) ten thousand dollars ($10,000.00) to every Eligible CEP Recipient who resided at one or more Indian Residential Schools for one school year or part thereof; and
>
> (2) an additional three thousand ($3,000.00) to every eligible CEP Recipient who resided at one or more Indian Residential Schools for each school year or part thereof, after the first school year; and (3) less the amount of any advance payment on the CEP received
>
> Recommendations
>
> 1.0 To ensure that the full range of harms are redressed, we recommend that a lump sum award be granted to any person who attended an Indian Residential School, irrespective of whether they suffered separate harms generated by acts of sexual, physical or severe emotional abuse.
>
> The Indian Residential School Policy was based on racial identity. It forced students to attend designated schools and removed them from their families and communities. The Policy has been criticized extensively. The consequences of this policy were devastating to individuals and communities alike, and they have been well documented. The distinctive and unique forms of harm that were a direct consequence of this government policy include reduced self-esteem, isolation from family, loss of language, loss of culture, spiritual harm, loss of a reasonable quality of education, and loss of kinship, community and traditional ways. These symptoms are now commonly understood to be "Residential School Syndrome." Everyone who attended residential schools can be assumed to > have suffered such direct harms and is entitled to a lump sum payment based upon the following:

> 1.1 A global award of sufficient significance to each person who attended Indian Residential Schools such that it will provide solace for the above losses and would signify and compensate for the seriousness of the injuries inflicted and the life-long harms caused.
>
> 1.2 An additional amount per each additional year or part of a year of attendance at an Indian Residential School to recognize the duration and accumulation of harms, including the denial of affection, loss of family life and parental guidance, neglect, depersonalization, denial of a proper education, forced labour, inferior nutrition and health care, and growing up in a climate of fear, apprehension, and ascribed inferiority.
> As attendance at residential school is the basis for recovery, a simple administrative process of verification is all that is required to make the payments as the government is in possession of the relevant documentation. (emphasis ours).

[244] The Panel believes that the above rationale is applicable in this case. As for the process, it needs to be discussed further as it will be explained in the next section.

XIV. Orders

All the following orders will find application once the compensation process referred to below has been agreed to by the Parties or ordered by the Tribunal.

Compensation for First Nations children and their parents or grandparents in cases of unnecessary removal of a child in the child welfare system

[245] The Panel finds there is sufficient evidence and other information (see section 50 (3) (c) of the CHRA), in this case to establish, on a balance of probabilities, that Canada's systemic racial discrimination found in the Tribunal's Decision 2016 CHRT 2 and subsequent rulings (2016 CHRT 10, 2016 CHRT 16, 2018 CHRT 4) resulted in harming First Nations children living on reserve and in the Yukon Territory who, as a result of poverty, lack of housing or deemed appropriate housing, neglect and substance abuse were unnecessarily apprehended and placed in care outside of their homes, families and communities and especially in regards to substance abuse, did not benefit from prevention services in the form of least disruptive measures or other prevention services permitting them to remain safely in their homes, families and communities. Those children experienced pain and suffering of the worst kind warranting the maximum award of remedy of $20,000 under section 53 (2)(e) of the CHRA. Canada is ordered to pay $20,000 to each First Nations child removed from their home, family and community between January 1, 2006 (date following the last Wen:de report as explained above) until the earliest of the following options occurs: the Panel informed by the parties and the evidence makes a determination that the unnecessary removal of First Nations children from their homes, families and communities as a result of the discrimination found in this case has ceased; the parties agree on a settlement agreement for effective and meaningful long-term relief; the Panel ceases to retain jurisdiction and beforehand amends this order. Also, following the process discussed below.

[246] The Panel believes there is sufficient evidence and other information to find that even if a First Nations child has been apprehended and then reunited with the immediate or extended family at a later date, the child and family have suffered during the time of separation and that the trauma outlasts the time of separation.

[247] The Panel finds there is sufficient evidence and other information in this case to establish, on a balance of probabilities, that Canada's systemic racial discrimination found in the Tribunal's Decision 2016 CHRT 2 and subsequent rulings (2016 CHRT 10, 2016 CHRT 16, 2018 CHRT 4) resulted in harming First Nations parents or grandparents living on reserve and in the Yukon Territory who, as a result of poverty, lack of housing or deemed appropriate housing, neglect and substance abuse had their child unnecessarily apprehended and placed in care outside of their homes, families and communities and, especially in regards to substance abuse, did not benefit from prevention services in the form of least disruptive measures or other prevention services permitting them to keep their child safely in their homes, families and communities. Those parents or grandparents experienced pain and suffering of the worst kind warranting the maximum award of remedy of $20,000 under section 53 (2)(e) of the CHRA.

[248] Canada is ordered to pay $20,000 to each First Nations parent or grandparent of a First Nations child removed from their home, family and community between January 1, 2006 and until the earliest of the following options occurs: the Panel informed by the parties and the evidence makes a determination that the unnecessary removal of First Nations children from their homes, families and communities as a result of the discrimination found in this case has ceased; the parties agree on a settlement agreement for effective and meaningful long-term relief; the Panel ceases to retain jurisdiction and beforehand amends this order. Also, following the process discussed below. This order applies for each child removed from the home, family and community as a result of the above-mentioned discrimination. For clarity, if a parent or grandparent lost 3 children in those circumstances, they should get $60,000, the maximum amount of $20,000 for each child apprehended.

Compensation for First Nations children in cases of necessary removal of a child in the child welfare system

[249] The Panel finds there is sufficient evidence and other information in this case to establish, on a balance of probabilities, that Canada's systemic racial discrimination found in the Tribunal's Decision 2016 CHRT 2 and subsequent rulings (2016 CHRT 10, 2016 CHRT 16, 2018 CHRT 4) resulted in harming First Nations children living on reserve and in the Yukon Territory who, as a result of abuse were necessarily apprehended from their homes but placed in care outside of their extended families and communities and therefore, did not benefit from prevention services in the form of least disruptive measures or other prevention services permitting them to remain safely in their extended families and communities. Those children experienced pain and suffering of the worst kind warranting the maximum award of remedy of $20,000 under section 53 (2)(e) of the CHRA. Canada is ordered to pay $20,000 to each First Nations child removed from their home, family and community from January 1, 2006 until the earliest of the following options occurs: the Panel informed by the parties and the evidence makes a determination that the unnecessary removal of First Nations children from their homes, families and communities as a result of the discrimination found in this case has ceased; the parties agree on a settlement agreement for effective and meaningful long-term relief; the Panel ceases to retain jurisdiction and beforehand amends this order. Also, following the process discussed below.

Compensation for First Nations children and their parents or grandparents in cases of unnecessary removal of a child to obtain essential services and/or experienced gaps, delays and denials of services that would have been available under Jordan's Principle

[250] The Panel finds there is sufficient evidence and other information in this case to establish, on a balance of probabilities, that Canada's systemic racial discrimination found in the Tribunal's Decision 2016 CHRT 2 and subsequent rulings (2017 CHRT 7, 2017 CHRT 14, 2017 CHRT 35 and 2018 CHRT 4) resulted in harming First Nations children living on reserve or off-reserve who, as a result of a gap, delay and/or denial of services were deprived of essential services and placed in care outside of their homes, families and communities in order to receive those services or without being placed in out-of-home care were denied services and therefore did not benefit from services covered under Jordan's Principle as defined in 2017 CHRT 14 and 35 (for example, mental health and suicide preventions services, special education, dental etc.). Finally, children who received services upon reconsideration ordered by this Tribunal and children who received services with unreasonable delays have also suffered during the time of the delays and denials. All those children above mentioned experienced pain and suffering of the worst kind warranting the maximum award of remedy of $20,000 under section 53 (2)(e) of the CHRA. Canada is ordered to pay $20,000 to each First Nations child removed from their home and placed in care in order to access services and for each First Nations child who was not removed from the home and was denied services or received services after an unreasonable delay or upon reconsideration ordered by this Tribunal, between December 12, 2007 (date of the adoption in the House of Commons of Jordan's Principle) and November 2, 2017 (date of the Tribunal's 2017 CHRT 35 ruling on Jordan's Principle), following the process discussed below.

[251] The Panel finds there is sufficient evidence and other information in this case to establish, on a balance of probabilities, that Canada's systemic racial discrimination found in the Tribunal's Decision 2016 CHRT 2 and subsequent rulings (2017 CHRT 7, 2017 CHRT 14, 2017 CHRT 35 and 2018 CHRT 4) resulted in harming First Nations parents or grandparents living on reserve or off reserve who, as a result of a gap, delay and/or denial of services were deprived of essential services for their child and had their child placed in care outside of their homes, families and communities in order to receive those services and therefore, did not benefit from services covered under Jordan's Principle as defined in 2017 CHRT 14 and 35. Those parents or grandparents experienced pain and suffering of the worst kind warranting the maximum award of remedy of $20,000 under section 53 (2)(e) of the CHRA. Canada is ordered to pay $20,000 to each First Nations parent or grandparent who had their child removed and placed in out-of-home care in order to access services and for each First Nations parent or grandparent who's child was not removed from the home and was denied services or received services after an unreasonable delay or upon reconsideration ordered by this Tribunal, between December 12, 2007 (date of the adoption in the House of Commons of Jordan's Principle) and November 2, 2017 (date of the Tribunal's 2017 CHRT 35 ruling on Jordan's Principle), following the process discussed below.

[252] It should be understood that the pain and suffering compensation for a First Nations child, parent or grandparent covered under the Jordan's Principle orders cannot be combined with the other orders for compensation for removal of a child from a home, a family and a community rather, the removal of a child from a home is included in the Jordan's Principle orders.

[253] The Panel finds as explained above there is sufficient evidence and other information in this case to establish on a balance of probabilities that Canada was aware of the discriminatory practices of its child welfare program offered to First Nations children and families and also of the lack of access to services under Jordan's Principle for First Nations children and families. Canada's conduct was devoid of caution and without regard for the consequences experienced by First Nations children and their families warranting the maximum award for remedy under section 53(3) of the CHRA for each First Nations child and parent or grandparent identified in the orders above.

from their homes, families and communities as a result of the discrimination found in this case has ceased and effective and meaningful long-term relief is implemented; the parties agreed on a settlement agreement for effective and meaningful long-term relief; the Panel ceases to retain jurisdiction and beforehand amends this order for all orders above except Jordan's Principle orders given that the Jordan's Principle orders are for the period between December 12, 2007 and November 2, 2017 as explained above and, following the process discussed below.

[255] The term parent or grandparent recognizes that some children may not have parents and were in the care of their grandparents when they were removed from the home or experienced delays, gaps and denials in services. The Panel orders compensation for each parent or grandparent caring for the child in the home. If the child is cared for by two parents, each parent is entitled to compensation as described above. If two grandparents are caring for the child, both grandparents are entitled to compensation as described above.

[256] For clarity, parents or grandparents who sexually, physically or psychologically abused their children are entitled to no compensation under this process. The reasons were provided earlier in this ruling.

[257] A parent or grandparent entitled to compensation under section 53 (2) (e) of the CHRA above and, who had more than one child unnecessarily apprehended is to be compensated $20,000 under section 53 (3) of the CHRA per child who was unnecessarily apprehended or denied essential services.

XV. Process for compensation

by-case analysis of pain and suffering is avoided and it is attributed to a vulnerable group of victims/survivors who as exemplified by the evidence in this case have suffered as a result of the systemic racial discrimination. Some children and parents or grandparents may have suffered more than others however, the compensation remedies are capped under the CHRA and the Panel cannot award more than the maximum allowed even if it is a small amount in comparison to the degree of harm and of racial discrimination experienced by the First Nations children and their families. The maximum compensation awarded is considered justifiable for any child or adult being part of the groups identified in the orders above.

[259] This type of approach to compensation is similar to the Common Experience Payment compensation in the IRSSA outlined above. The Common Experience Payment recognized that the experience of living at an Indian Residential School had impacted all students who attended these institutions. The CEP compensated all former students who attended for the emotional abuse suffered, the loss of family life, the loss of language, culture, etc. (see Affidavit of Mr. Jeremy Kolodziej's dated April 4 2019 at, para. 10).

[260] The Panel prefers AFN's request that compensation be paid to victims directly following an appropriate process instead of being paid in a fund where First Nations children and families could access services and healing activities to alleviate some of the effects of the discrimination they experienced. The Panel is not objecting to a trust fund per se, rather it objects that the compensation be paid in a trust fund to finance services and healing activities in lieu of financial compensation as suggested by the Caring Society. Such meaningful activities should be offered by Canada however, not in replacement of financial compensation to victims/survivors. Financial compensation belongs to the victims/survivors who are the ones who should be empowered to decide for themselves on how best to use this financial compensation.

[261] However, the Panel also acknowledges the Caring Society's argument that it is not appropriate to pay $40,000 to a 3-year-old. Therefore, there is a need to establish a process where the children who are under 18 or 21 years old have the compensation paid to them secured in a fund that would be accessible upon reaching majority.

[262] In terms of Jordan's Principle, many children who were denied services and who are still living with their parents could have the compensation funds administered by their parents or grandparents until the age of majority.

[263] For all the other children who have no parents, grandparents or responsible adult family members and who are underage, a trust fund could be an option amongst others that should be part of the discussions referred to below.

[264] Special protections for mentally disabled children and parents or grandparents who abuse substances that may affect their judgment should be considered in the process.

[265] It would be preferable that the social benefits of victims/survivors not be affected by compensation remedies. This can form part of the process for compensation discussions.

[266] The possibility for individual victims/survivors to opt-out should form part of this compensation process.

[267] Given that the parties and interested parties in this case are all First Nations except the Commission and the AGC and, that they all have different views on the appropriate definition of a First Nations child in this case, it is paramount that this form part of the discussions on the process for compensation. The Panel reiterates that it recognizes the First Nations human rights and Indigenous rights of self-determination and self-governance.

[268] If a trust fund and/or committee is proposed, it may be valuable to also include non-political members on the trust fund and/or committee such as adult victims/survivors, Indigenous women, elders, grandmothers, etc.

enter into discussions with the AFN and the Caring Society on this issue. The Commission and the interested parties should be consulted in this process however, they are not ordered to participate if they decide not to. The Panel is not making a final determination on the process here rather, it will allow parties to discuss possible options and return to the Tribunal with propositions if any, no later than December 10, 2019. The Panel will then consider those propositions and make a determination on the appropriate process to locate victims/survivors and to distribute compensation.

[270] As part of the compensation process consultation, the Panel welcomes any comment/suggestion and request for clarification from any party in regards to moving forward with the compensation process and/or the wording and/or content of the orders. For example, if categories of victims/survivors should be further detailed and new categories added.

XVI. Interest

[271] Pursuant to section 53(4) of the Act, the Complainants seek interest on any award of compensation made by the Tribunal.

[272] Section 53(4) allows for the Tribunal to award interest at a rate and for a period it considers appropriate:

> (4) Subject to the rules made under section 48.9, an order to pay compensation under this section may include an award of interest at a rate and for a period that the member or panel considers appropriate.

[273] The language of the Act reproduced above refers to the term victim rather than complainant. As mentioned previously, the wording of the CHRA allows for the distinction between a complainant who is victim of the discriminatory practice and a victim of a discriminatory practice who is not a complainant.

[274] Subject to the rules made under section 48.9, an order to pay compensation under this section may include an award of interest at a rate and for a period that the member or panel considers appropriate.

[275] As such, the Panel grants interest on the compensation awarded, at the current Bank of Canada rate, as follows:

XVII. Retention of jurisdiction

[277] The Panel retains jurisdiction until the issue of the process for compensation has been resolved by consent order or otherwise and will then revisit the need for further retention of jurisdiction on the issue of compensation. This does not affect the Panel's retention of jurisdiction on other issues in this case.

Reasons on Three Questions Regarding Eligibility for Compensation

I. Context

[1] On September 6, 2019, the Tribunal rendered its decision on the issue of compensation remedies (First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (representing the Minister of Indigenous and Northern Affairs Canada), 2019 CHRT 39 [Compensation Decision]) and found Canada liable to pay compensation under the Canadian Human Rights Act, RSC 1985, c H-6 (CHRA) to victims/survivors of its discriminatory practices, namely First Nations children and their parents or grandparents (caregivers).

[2] The Panel finds it important to reiterate the significant context and findings in which the compensation order was decided and has reproduced a summary of its decision in the Compensation Decision below:

> [13] This ruling is dedicated to all the First Nations children, their families and communities who were harmed by the unnecessary removal of children from your homes and your communities. The Panel desires to acknowledge the great suffering that you have endured as victims/survivors of Canada's discriminatory practices. The Panel highlights that our legislation places a cap on the remedies under sections 53 (2) (e) and 53 (3) of the CHRA for victims the maximum being $40,000 and that this amount is reserved for the worst cases. The Panel believes that the unnecessary removal of children from your homes, families and communities qualifies as a worst-case scenario which […] and, a breach of your fundamental human rights. The Panel stresses the fact that this amount can never be considered as proportional to the pain suffered and accepting the amount for remedies is not an acknowledgment on your part that this is its value. No amount of compensation can ever recover what you have lost, the scars that are left on your souls or the suffering that you have gone through as a result of racism, colonial practices and discrimination. This is the truth. In awarding the maximum amount allowed under our Statute, the Panel recognizes, to the best of its ability and with the tools that it currently has under the CHRA, that this case of racial discrimination is one of the worst possible cases warranting the maximum awards. The proposition that a systemic case can only warrant systemic remedies is not supported by the law and jurisprudence. The CHRA regime allows for both individual and systemic remedies if supported by the evidence in a particular case. In this case, the evidence supports both individual and systemic remedies. The Tribunal was clear from the beginning of its Decision that the Federal First Nations child welfare program is negatively impacting

> First Nations children and families it undertook to serve and protect. The gaps and adverse effects are a result of a colonial system that elected to base its model on a financial funding model and authorities dividing services into separate programs without proper coordination or funding and was not based on First Nations children and families' real needs and substantive equality. Systemic orders such as reform and a broad definition of Jordan's Principle are means to address those flaws
>
> [15] When the discriminatory practice was known or ought to have been known, the damages under the wilful and reckless head send a strong message that tolerating such a practice of breaching protected human rights is unacceptable in Canada.
> (Compensation Decision at paras. 13-15)

[3] Furthermore, in its decision, the Panel also directed the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada (Caring Society), the Assembly of First Nations (AFN) and Canada to discuss possible options, to consult with the Commission, Chiefs of Ontario (COO) and Nishnawbe Aski Nation (NAN) on a process for identifying specific victims or distributing the compensation and to return to the Tribunal on February 21, 2020 with their proposals.

[4] After discussions, the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada have created a draft "Framework for the Payment of Compensation under 2019 CHRT 39" (the "Draft Framework") that sets out proposals on implementation that they have agreed to as of February 21, 2020. This Draft Framework has not yet been finalized and the parties have now requested the Tribunal to rule on three questions where they did not reach a consensus and required further guidance from this Panel.

[5] On February 28, 2020, the Attorney General of Canada (AGC) wrote a letter to the Tribunal indicating that no party wished to file a reply on those three questions and confirmed that the three questions could now be taken under reserve by the Panel.

[6] On March 3, 2020, the Panel sought the parties' views on a specific case related to one of the three questions and the parties' submissions were received on March 11, 2020.

[7] Finally, on March 16, 2020, the Panel reached a decision on the three questions, and in the interests of expediency and to facilitate resolution, its determinations were provided in a short form with full reasons to follow shortly. That format is consistent with an oral ruling issued from the bench. The full reasons are outlined in this ruling.

II. Question 1) At what age should beneficiaries gain unrestricted access to the compensation?

[8] Decision: The provincial/territorial age of majority

A. The First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada's Position

[9] The Caring Society argues that compensation should only be paid to victims/survivors who are 25 years of age and older, rather than by relying on the provincial/territorial ages of majority, with an exception for those aged 18-25 who wish to access funds for education or for "compelling compassionate reasons". The Caring Society argues that children are a highly vulnerable group, and society recognizes this, building structures to protect them from making decisions they are not adequately prepared to make is appropriate.

[10] The Caring Society contends that current age of majority presumptions, are premised on a societal belief that the once they transition to adulthood, people are less impulsive and susceptible to peer pressure, better able to understand complex concepts and appreciate risks and consequences. However, the Caring Society's position is that such growth should not be presumed to occur at an age which was somewhat arbitrarily chosen by legislatures.

[11] The Caring Society cites Lord Scarman from his concurring 1985 reasons in Gillick v. West Norfolk and Wisbech Area Health Authority, which were quoted by the Supreme Court of Canada in A.C. v. Manitoba (Director of Child and Family Services), 2009 SCC 30 at para. 51:

> … The law relating to parent and child is concerned with the problems of the growth and maturity of the human personality. If the law should impose on the process of "growing up" fixed limits where nature knows only a continuous > process, the price would be artificiality and a lack of realism in an area where the law must be sensitive to human development and social change ….

[12] The Caring Society argues that research in the areas of child development and neuroscience provide the same conclusion as Lord Scarman: effectively, the process of maturation is a continuous one, and that the "age of transition" is closer to 25 years. The Caring Society provided the Tribunal with an expert report prepared by Dr. Sidney Segalowitz, a professor of psychology and neuroscience, to support its position. Dr. Segalowitz's evidence advances that brain development continues past age 18 and levels off at approximately 25 years old for healthy individuals.

> There is growing consensus that, for many important functions, the average age at which brain development in healthy individuals' asymptotes is about 25 years. However, there will be a sizable group whose trajectory is behind this schedule as well as some ahead of it. This can be for a number of reasons. […] The research […] has led us to this average figure of 25 years for some developmental process and the various factors that can interfere with this normative trajectory.

[14] In arriving at this finding, Dr. Segalowitz reviews the current research on brain development and suggests that the mental functions most associated with adult maturity involve emotional self-regulation and complex cognitive functions involving attention, memory and inhibitory control. Risk-taking is a key concern among young people, especially when in the presence of peers. Impulsivity and sensation-seeking behaviours decrease gradually through adolescence, according to Dr. Segalowitz, and there is a major reduction in such behaviour in the 26-30 years range.

[15] Importantly, Dr. Segalowitz notes that negative early life experiences (such as chronic stress, poverty, poor nutrition, exposure to air and water pollution, pre- and post-natal drug exposure, traumatic brain injury and PTSD) can put an individual's mental health trajectory at risk by compromising brain growth in regions related to emotional self-regulation and cognitive processing.

[16] Dr. Segalowitz's evidence, the Caring Society argues, is illustrative of the fact that scientific knowledge on brain development has made significant advances since the time when provincial ages of majority were set in the 1970's. The scientific evidence provided by Dr. Segalowitz, coupled with the 'egregious nature of the harm and adverse impacts experienced by the child victims in this case' points to payment at age 25 as the only appropriate result, according to the Caring Society.

B. The Assembly of First Nations' Position

[17] The AFN disagrees with the Caring Society's proposal on this issue, pointing instead to provincial legislation on age of majority as well as laws which lay out duties of property guardians upon a minor attaining the age of majority. Section 53 of Ontario's Children's Law Reform Act, RSO 1990, c C.12, for example, provides that guardians of property must transfer to the child all property in the care of the guardian when the child attains the age of eighteen years. Similarly, the Indian Act, RSC 1985, c I-5 provides at s. 52 that the Minister can appoint guardians of property for infant children under the Act's jurisdiction, but at s. 52.3(1) specifies that any property held for them must be conveyed to the child in lump sum upon attaining the age of majority.

[18] The AFN points to trust law in support of its argument that distribution at an age higher than the provincial/territorial age of majority would be problematic. They cite the rule in Saunders v. Vautier, summarized by the Supreme Court of Canada in Buschau v. Rogers Communications Inc., 2006 SCC 28 as follows at para 21:

> The common law rule in Saunders v. Vautier can be concisely stated as allowing beneficiaries of a trust to depart from the settlor's original intentions provided that they are of full legal capacity and are together entitled to all the rights of beneficial ownership in the trust property. More formally, the rule is stated as follows in Underhill and Hayton: Law of Trusts and Trustees (14th ed. 1987), at p. 628:
> > If there is only one beneficiary, or if there are several (whether entitled concurrently or successively) and they are all of one mind, and he or they are not under any disability, the specific performance of the trust may be arrested, and the trust modified or extinguished by him or them without reference to the wishes of the settlor or trustees.

[19] The AFN also cites two cases where structured settlements (arrangements through which claimants can receive all or part of a settlement by way of periodic payments rather than via lump sum) established by court order were modified or extinguished where trust beneficiaries were capable of managing their own affairs. (See Hubbard v Hubbard, 140 ACWS (3d) 216, 2005 CanLII 20811 (ONSC) and Grieg v National Trust Co, 47 BCLR (3d) 42, 1998 CanLII 4239 (BCSC)).

C. The Canadian Human Rights Commission's Position

[20] The Commission ultimately takes no position on the question of the appropriate age for receiving compensation. That said, in light of the evidence provided by the Caring Society in support of its position, the Commission does share a concern that young persons in the period of 'emerging adulthood', may face unique challenges or pressures if substantial sums of money are suddenly made available to them. The Commission points out that potential beneficiaries will have faced discrimination and may have been impacted by other forms of marginalization and disadvantage which could add to their vulnerability. For these reasons, regardless of what minimum age may eventually be selected for paying out compensation awards, it will be critically important for Canada to follow through on the laudable commitments made in the Draft Framework to adequately fund the delivery of culturally-appropriate financial and other supports to beneficiaries.

D. The Chiefs of Ontario's Position

[21] The COO did not take any position on this question.

E. The Nishnawbe Aski Nation's Position

[22] The NAN did not take any position on this question.

F. Canada's Position

[23] The AGC advances that a child's unrestricted access to the compensation should coincide with attaining the age of majority set by their home province or territory. Even Indigenous Services Canada's own Social Programs National Manual 2017-2018 refers back to the provincial or territorial legislation to determine age of majority. Such an approach, according to the AGC, would ensure that First Nations children who may receive a benefit are treated equally to their same-age peers in the place where they reside. No other approach, the AGC argues (including the one proposed by the Caring Society) is justifiable. The AGC suggests that approaches encouraging deviation from well-established norms around age of majority would be best directed at the legislatures who set the approach to age of majority.

G. Analysis

[24] Throughout all of its decisions and rulings, the Panel has consistently stressed the importance of responding to the specific needs of First Nations children and families and avoiding a one-size-fits-all approach. This reasoning was applied in crafting its orders and remains the backdrop for all its considerations. While the Panel also discussed the need to respond to the specific needs of First Nations Child and Family Services Agencies, it emphasized that the decision was about children and their families and meeting their specific needs. The Panel believes that this reasoning respects substantive equality and upholds each child's fundamental human rights in recognizing that each child is unique and may have different needs, culture, teachings, values, aspirations and circumstances.

[25] This being said, the Panel does share the Caring Society and the Commission's concerns, outlined above, that young adults in the period of 'emerging adulthood', may face unique challenges or pressures if substantial sums of money are suddenly made available to them. Some of them will have faced discrimination and may have been impacted by other forms of marginalization and disadvantage which could add to their vulnerability. The Panel also shares the same concerns for other vulnerable adults above the age of 25.

[26] While the expert evidence is compelling it remains untested in these proceedings and also is insufficient to outweigh the legislators' intent expressed in legislation in each Province/Territory that has already determined the age of majority. The Panel is not convinced by the case law cited by the Caring Society in support of its position and finds it does not trump Provincial/Territorial legislation in that regard.

[27] Of note, some of those same young adults may be parents of young children themselves which is arguably a more significant responsibility than that of administrating large sums of money. The Panel has difficulty reconciling the Caring Society's position with the place that young adults aged 18-24 legally and practically occupy in society, which includes many legislated rights and the parenting role that some may hold.

[28] In addition, none of the other parties share the Caring Society's position on this question.

[29] Moreover, siding with the Caring Society on this point may result in engendering liabilities for the trust fund where young adults could potentially allege discrimination on the basis of age. While the Panel concedes that some young adults may experience difficulty handling large sums of money awarded as compensation, the Panel believes that barring all 18-24-year-old victims/survivors across Canada from receiving compensation is unreasonable. The Panel would prefer that vulnerable young adults who need and desire counsel and assistance be able to access it as part of the compensation process.

[30] That said, as part of the Caring Society's significant work on the compensation process, it entered into an agreement with Youth in Care Canada (YICC), a national charitable organization for youth in care and formerly in care, to organize a national consultation with First Nations youth in care and formerly in care regarding the compensation process. Following the consultations, YICC worked independently to produce a report with two main objectives:

1. Provide recommendations to the Caring Society on the process for distributing the funds, with consideration to children in vulnerable circumstances; and
2. Provide recommendations to alleviate risks that providing additional funds to certain primary caregivers may increase the family risk level.

[31] YICC issued a report including a series of recommendations for the compensation process and, while they desire to continue their reflection and work on the compensation process, they did not yet recommend to raise the age of unrestricted access to the compensation funds to 25 years old (See exhibit 11 to Dr. Blackstock's affidavit dated December 2019).

[32] While the YICC did not recommend raising the age of unrestricted access to the compensation funds to 25 years old, it proposed a number of relevant recommendations such as healing circles; support for counselling or therapy; navigational support; mental health supports to help with youth's experiences and challenges; continued support after compensation; mental health supports and navigational assistance to help youth apply for compensation; restitution for children and youth who have died while in care or due to their experiences in the child welfare system; youth's compensation paid to parents, grandparents or to a trust fund; offering non mandatory financial training for youth receiving compensation; and awareness training offered to recipients about predatory banks and financial institutions like those that swindled compensation from residential school survivors.

[33] The Panel generally agrees with those recommendations.

[34] Furthermore, the Panel believes the Draft Framework should include the currently proposed supports for compensation beneficiaries and should consider including additional supports. In sum, adequate support for young adults and all persons receiving compensation, culturally appropriate services, access to financial advisers, mental health supports, guidance from Elders, etc., could alleviate some of the concerns raised by the Caring Society and the Commission. The Panel strongly encourages the parties to maintain or include such provisions in the Draft Framework to ensure the Draft Framework best supports reconciliation between First Nations and Canada.

[35] For the reasons above, the Panel prefers the AFN and the AGC's positions on this question.

H. Order

[36] The provincial/territorial age of majority is determined to be the age for victims/survivors/beneficiaries to gain unrestricted access to the compensation.

III. Question 2) Should compensation be available to children who entered care prior to January 1, 2006 but remained in care as of that date?

[37] Decision: Yes

[38] As part of the parties' three questions, another sub-question was also included as part of question 2. It is a request from the Caring Society for compensation for the parents and caregiving grandparents of children who entered care prior to January 1, 2006 but remained in care as of that date. While the above question 2 wording does not reflect this request, it was considered by this Panel given that all parties had an ample opportunity to make full submissions on this question. The Panel believes that it is appropriate to also include its reasons and determination on this point as part of this present ruling.

A. The First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada's Position

[39] The Caring Society argues that an interpretation of the Compensation Decision which includes children in care as of January 1, 2006 (but who were removed earlier) and their caregivers is supported by the Tribunal's reasons in both First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada), 2016 CHRT 2 [Merit Decision] and the Compensation Decision.

[40] In doing so, the Caring Society points to the Tribunal's repeated emphasis on the harms associated with apprehension, removals and family/community separation. Put plainly, the Caring Society suggests that the question to be answered is: As of January 1, 2006, "which children were being harmed by Canada's discriminatory practices?" The answer put forward by the Caring Society is that it was children in care as of that date, as well as those taken into care thereafter. The Caring Society advances that discrimination experienced by those children, and their caregivers, is virtually identical and rooted in the very same set of facts which led the Tribunal to find discrimination.

B. The Assembly of First Nations' Position

[41] The AFN shares the Caring Society's view that if a child was in care as of January 1, 2006, the date of removal should be immaterial. The AFN asserts that those children experienced the same harms and discrimination as children who came into care on or after January 1, 2006.

C. The Canadian Human Rights Commission's Position

[42] The Commission advances that while, as pointed out by Canada, the temporal scope of the order is relatively clear on its face, the underlying goals of the compensation order should be considered for cases of children who were removed from home before January 1, 2006 but remained in care as of that date.

[43] The Commission also points to para. 270 of the Compensation Decision, where the Panel explicitly retained jurisdiction over a number of issues, welcoming "any comment/suggestion and request for clarification from any party in regards to moving forward with the compensation process and/or the wording and/or content of the orders. For example, if categories of victims/survivors should be further detailed and new categories added." This, the Commission argues, is indicative of a clear retention of jurisdiction and thereby the Panel is not functus officio on those matters.

D. The Chiefs of Ontario's Position

[44] The COO did not take any position on this question.

E. The Nishnawbe Aski Nation's Position

[45] The NAN adopts and relies on the Caring Society's position on this question. The NAN submits that children in care prior to January 1, 2006 and as of January 1, 2006, who were removed from their homes for compensable reasons per the Tribunal's compensation entitlement order should be entitled to compensation. According to the NAN, these children and their primary caregivers, were deprived of the opportunity to be reunited with their families in a timely manner during the eligibility period set out by the Tribunal.

F. Canada's Position

[46] The AGC argues that compensation should be payable only to those who entered care after the complaint was instituted. The AGC claims that the complaint itself, the Compensation Decision, and an analysis of the Tribunal's statutory jurisdiction are supportive of this position.

[47] The AGC points out in particular the following excerpt, from para. 245 of the Compensation Decision, where the Panel ordered Canada to pay… "$20,000 to each First Nation child removed from its home, family and community between January 1, 2006 [and a date to be determined]" [Emphasis in original]. It points out two other instances in the decision where exact dates were listed and bolded as being further indicative of a clear intent by the Panel to provide exact dates in exercising its remedial powers under s. 53 of the CHRA (see paras 249 and 251). The Panel could not have been clearer, the AGC argues, that based on its assessment of the evidence, January 1, 2006 was that date on which the discrimination was found to have begun, and to extend the scope for compensation to any time period predating that date would be to re-write the judgment.

[48] With respect to compensation under Jordan's Principle, the AGC submits that the Panel was also clear. At para. 251, compensation was also for a defined period, Dec. 12, 2007-November 2, 2017. These dates were also placed in bold in the judgment.

[49] The AGC further argues that it is apparent that the Panel carefully considered the matter of when discrimination occurred for the purposes of exercising its jurisdiction under s. 53 of the CHRA.

[50] The AGC further suggests that such potential beneficiaries would be able to access compensation via one of the two as-yet-uncertified class actions which have been filed in Federal Court seeking compensation for those who fall outside of the timelines established by the Tribunal's Compensation Decision. The AGC says that it has announced that it would compensate children affected by the discrimination found in the Merit Decision even where they fall outside of the terms of the complaint. According to the AGC, a class action, would be an appropriate vehicle to do so.

G. Analysis

[51] The Panel in its Compensation Decision, has clearly left the orders open to possible amendments in case any party, including Canada, wanted to add or clarify categories of victims/survivors or wording amendments to the ruling similar to the process related to the Tribunal's ruling in 2018 CHRT 4 and also informed by the process surrounding the Tribunal's rulings in 2017 CHRT 14 and 2017 CHRT 35. While this practice is rare, in this specific ground-breaking and complex case it is beneficial and also acknowledges the importance of the parties' input and expertise in regards to the effectiveness of the Panel's orders.

[52] The Panel explicitly retained jurisdiction over compensation (see Compensation Decision at para. 277), including on a number of issues as part of the compensation process consultation, welcoming any comments, suggestions and requests for clarification from any party in regards to moving forward with the compensation process and the wording or content of the orders. For example, whether the categories of victims/survivors should be further specified or new categories added (see Compensation Decision at para. 270).

[53] This is a clear indication that the Panel was open to suggestions for possible modifications of the Compensation Decision Order, welcoming comments and suggestions from any party. The Panel originally chose the January 1, 2006 and December 2007 cut-off dates following the Caring Society's requests in its last compensation submissions with the understanding that the evidence before the Tribunal supported those dates and also supported earlier dates as well. Considering this, instead of making orders above what was requested, the Panel opted for an order including the possibility of making amendments or further compensation orders. The Panel was mindful that parties upon discussion of the compensation orders and process may wish to add or further specify categories of compensation beneficiaries. This process is complex and requires flexibility.

[54] Furthermore, the Federal Court in Grover v. Canada (National Research Council) (1994), 80 FTR 256, 28 Admin LR (2d) 231 (F.C.) [Grover], a case that this Panel relied on in previous decisions in this case (see for example, 2017 CHRT 14, at para. 32, see also 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 39), an application for judicial review of a Tribunal decision had to decide whether the Tribunal had the power to reserve jurisdiction with regards to a remedial order. Grover is summarized as follows in Berberi v. Attorney General of Canada, 2011 CHRT 23 [Berberi]:

[13] …The Tribunal had ordered that the complainant be appointed to a specific job, but retained jurisdiction to hear further evidence with regards to the implementation of the order. The Federal Court held that although the Act does not contain an express provision that allows the Tribunal to reopen an inquiry, the wide remedial powers set out therein, coupled with the principle that human rights legislation should be interpreted liberally, in a manner that accords full recognition and effect to the rights protected under such legislation, enables the Tribunal to reserve jurisdiction on certain matters in order to ensure that the remedies ordered by the Tribunal are forthcoming to complainants (see Grover at paras. 29-36). The Federal Court added:

[14] It is clear that the Act compels the award of effective remedies and therefore, in certain circumstances the Tribunal must be given the ability to ensure that their remedial orders are effectively implemented. Therefore, the remedial powers in subsection 53(2) should be interpreted as including the power to reserve jurisdiction on certain matters in order to ensure that the remedies ordered by the Tribunal are forthcoming to complainants. The denial of such a power would be overly formalistic and would defeat the remedial purpose of the legislation. In the context of a rather complex remedial order, it makes sense for the Tribunal to remain seized of jurisdiction with respect to remedial issues in order to facilitate the implementation of the remedy. This is consistent with the overall purpose of the legislation and with the flexible approach advocated by Sopinka J. in Chandler, supra. It would frustrate the mandate of the legislation to require the complainant to seek the enforcement of an unambiguous order in the Federal Court or to file a new complaint in order to obtain the full remedy awarded by the Tribunal. (Grover at para. 33)

[15] Similarly, in Canada (Attorney General) v. Moore, [1998] 4 F.C. 585 [Moore], the Federal Court had to determine whether the Tribunal exceeded its jurisdiction by reconsidering and changing a cease and desist order. Having found the complaint to be substantiated, the Tribunal made a general direction in its order and gave the parties the opportunity to work out the details of the order while the Tribunal retained jurisdiction. After examining the reasoning in Grover and Chandler, the Federal Court stated:

[16] The reasoning in these cases supports the conclusion that the Tribunal has broad discretion to return to a matter and I find that it had discretion in the circumstances here. Whether that discretion is appropriately exercised by the Tribunal will depend on the circumstances of each case. That is consistent with the principle set out in Chandler v. Alberta Association of Architects, relied upon by the applicant, which dealt with the decision of a board other than the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal. (Moore at para. 49)

[17] The Federal Court determined that the Tribunal had reserved jurisdiction and there was no indication that the Tribunal viewed its decision as final and conclusive in a manner that would preclude it from returning to a matter included in the order. Therefore, on the authority of Grover, the Federal Court concluded that subsection 53(2) of the Act empowered the Tribunal to reopen the proceedings (see Moore at para. 50).

[18] The Tribunal jurisprudence that has considered the functus officio principle and interpreted Grover and Moore, has generally found that absent a reservation of jurisdiction from the Tribunal on an issue, the Tribunal's decision is final unless an exception to the functus officio principle can be established (see Douglas v. SLH Transport Inc., 2010 CHRT 25; Walden v. Canada (Social Development), 2010 CHRT 19; Warman v. Beaumont, 2009 CHRT 32; and, Goyette v. Voyageur Colonial Ltée, (November 16, 2001), TD 14/01 (CHRT)). However, recent Federal Court jurisprudence, decided several years after Grover and Moore and which examined the authority of the Commission to reconsider its decisions, provides further guidance on the application of the functus officio principle to administrative tribunals and commissions.

(Berberi at paras. 13-18, emphasis ours)

[21] The application of the functus officio principle to administrative tribunals must be flexible and not overly formalistic (see Chandler at para. 21). In Grover, in determining whether the Tribunal could supervise the implementation of its remedial orders, the Federal Court recognized that the Tribunal has the power to retain jurisdiction over its remedial orders to ensure that they are effectively implemented. In Moore, in deciding whether the Tribunal could reconsider and change a remedial order, the Federal Court expanded on the reasoning in Grover and stated that "the Tribunal has broad discretion to return to a matter..." (Moore at para. 49). In Grover and Moore, while the retention of jurisdiction by the Tribunal was a factor considered by the Federal Court in determining whether the Tribunal appropriately exercised its discretion to return to a matter, ultimately, it was not the only factor considered by the Court. In addition to examining the context of each case, the Tribunal must also consider whether "there are indications in the enabling statute that a decision can be reopened in order to enable the tribunal to discharge the function committed to it by enabling legislation" (Chandler at para. 22). This method of analyzing the Tribunal's discretion to return to a matter is consistent with the Federal Court's reasoning in Kleysen and Merham. The question then becomes: considering the Act and the circumstances of the case, should the Tribunal return to the matter in order to discharge the function committed to it by the Canadian Human Rights Act?

> (Grover at para. 32). The Act does not provide a right of appeal of Tribunal decisions, and judicial review is not the appropriate forum to seek out the implementation of a Tribunal decision. As the Federal Court indicated to the Complainant: "The Applicant is at liberty to seek an order from the Tribunal with respect to implementation of the remedy" (Berberi v. Canadian Human Rights Tribunal and Attorney General of Canada (RCMP), 2011 FC 485 at para. 65). When the Tribunal makes a remedial order under subsection 53(2), that order can be made an order of the Federal Court for the purposes of enforcement under section 57 of the Act. Section 57 allows decisions of the Tribunal to "...be enforced on their own account through contempt proceedings because they, like decisions of the superior Courts, are considered by the legislator to be deserving of the respect which the contempt powers are intended to impose" (Canada (Human Rights Commission) v. Warman, 2011 FCA 297 at para. 44).

[56] Additionally, the Tribunal used a similar approach to remedies in Grant v. Manitoba Telecom Services Inc., 2013 CHRT 35 [Grant] once the decision on the merits was rendered:

> [3] The Tribunal retained jurisdiction on many of the remedies requested by the Complainant, including the missed pension contributions, in order to get further submissions and clarification from the parties.
>
>
> (Grant at paras. 3-4, emphasis ours).
>
>
> [8] The parties have been unable to work out the details of the Complainant's lost pension and disagree on what remedy the Tribunal ordered with respect thereof.
> (Grant, 2013 CHRT 35 at paras 7-8, emphasis ours).

[57] The Tribunal in Grant provided further direction on the remedy in that subsequent ruling. Of interest, this case was challenged at the Federal Court after the decision on the merits while the Tribunal was deciding further remedies. The application for judicial review was ultimately discontinued.

[58] Furthermore, the Panel does not agree with the AGC's position, mentioned above, that the complaint itself, the Panel's Compensation Decision, and an analysis of the Tribunal's statutory jurisdiction all support that compensation should be payable only to those who entered care after the complaint was instituted.

[59] Additionally, the Supreme Court of Canada in Moore v. British Columbia (Education), 2012 SCC 61 at, para.64 [Moore]) stated that the remedy must flow from the claim. Moreover, the Tribunal in the Compensation Decision analyzed the claim and found that the claim consists of the complaint, the Statement of Particulars, and the specific facts of the case (see Compensation Decision at para. 103).

[60] It is useful here to do a review of the complaint, the Caring Society's Statement of Particulars and the Panel's rulings to understand the claim on this point. Relevant extracts are reproduced below:

> […] This review, known as the Joint National Policy Review on First Nations Child and Family Services (NPR MacDonald & Ladd) provides some insight into the reasons why there has been such an increase in the numbers of Registered Indian children entering into care. The review found that INAC provides funding for child welfare services only to Registered Indian children who are deemed to be ''eligible children" pursuant to the Directive. An eligible child is normally characterized as a child of parents who are normally resident on reserve. Importantly, the preamble to the Directive indicates that the formula is intended to ensure that First Nations children receive a ''comparable level'' of service to the other children in similar circumstances […] Overall, the Directive was found to provide 22% less funding per child to FNCFCSA's than the average province. A key area of inadequate funding is a statutory range of services, known as least disruptive measures, that are provided to children and youth at significant risk of child maltreatment […] The NPR also indicates that although child welfare costs are increasing at over 6% per year there has not been a cost of living increase in the funding formula for FNCFCSA's since 1995. Economic analysis conducted last year indicates that the compounded inflation losses to FNCFCSA's from 1999-2005 amount to $112 million nationally.

> […] It has been over 6 years since the completion of NPR and the Federal government has failed to implement any of the recommendations which would have directly benefited First Nation children on reserve. As INAC documents obtained […] in 2002 demonstrate, the lack of action by the Federal government was not due to lack of awareness of the problem or the solution. Documents sent between senior INAC officials confirm the level of funding in the Directive is insufficient for FNCFCSA's to meet their statutory obligations under Provincial child welfare laws- particularly with regard to least disruptive measures resulting in higher numbers of First Nations children entering child welfare care (INAC, 2002).
> […] Despite having apparently been convinced of the merits of the problem and the need for the least disruptive measures INAC maintained that additional evidence was needed to rectify the inequitable levels of funding documented in the NPR. […]
>
> […] Additionally, as Canada redresses the impacts of residential schools it must take steps to ensure that old funding policies which only supported children being removed from their homes are addressed.
> […] INAC has been aware of this problem for a number of years and was presented with an evidence base of this discrimination in June 2000 with the two Wen:de reports being delivered in August and October of 2005 respectively. These reports were followed by the Canadian Incidence Study Report […] in June of 2006.

[61] In light of the complaint reproduced above, the Panel finds that the complaint clearly mentions that INAC was aware of the alleged discrimination, which has now been proven, as early as the 2000 Joint National Policy Review (2000 NPR).

[62] The Caring Society's Statement of Particulars also specifically mentions the 2000 NPR at paras.14-15 and 20-21, reproduced below:

> 14. Furthermore, this Tribunal will have the opportunity of hearing from the Complainants' witnesses in support of each of the following facts:
>
> > (i) The Complainants, together with Canada, participated in a series of expert studies[7] designed to examine the nature of the differential treatment in the provision of statutory child welfare and child protection services on and off reserve and to provide recommendations on the improvement to Canada's current funding structures, policies and formulas;
> > (ii) The findings contained in the expert studies substantiate the differential treatment arising from the current funding structures, > policies and practices to the severe detriment of registered First Nation children and families normally resident on reserve;

>
> (iii) Canada's response, without supporting expert analysis and opinion, included strategies that did not redress the inequities.[8] Separate and independent reports from the Auditor Generals of Canada and British Columbia in May of 2008, and the recent March 2009 Report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts[9] found that Canada's response did not redress the inequities;
>
> (iv) Canada independently commissioned studies that came to the same conclusion[10] as that of the Complainants in respect of the inequities;
>
> (v) Canada did not provide the Canadian Human Rights Commission with any factual material to contradict the assertions of discriminatory practices in the Complaint; and
> (vi) Canada has acknowledged that the current funding practices and structure contribute to disproportionately growing numbers of registered First Nation children in child welfare and protection care and results in First Nations Child and Family Services Agencies being unable to meet their statutorily mandated responsibilities[11].

15. The Canadian Human Rights Commission requested an inquiry. An inquiry is necessary because findings of fact are required for a determination of the legal issues.

> [7] The studies include the "Joint National Policy Review-Final Report" of June 2000 and a series of three reports: "Bridging Econometrics and First Nations Child and Family Service Agency Funding" (2004); "Wen:de We Are Coming to the Light of Day" (2005) and "Wen de The Journey Continues" (2005)

20. The evidence will demonstrate that the needs of First Nations Child and Family Services Agencies and the needs of the children and families that they serve are certainly not less[18] than those of children and families off reserve and the agencies that serve them, and thus the remedy sought.

> [18] The Complainants rely upon the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples.

Relief Requested

21. The purpose of the tribunal hearing is to achieve a substantiation of the complaint to the Commission and for an order against the federal authorities:

> (1) Pursuant to section 53 (2)(a) of the CHRA requiring the immediate cessation of disparate funding, as described above;
>
> (2) Pursuant to section 53(2)(a), and in order to redress the discriminatory practices:
>
> (a) The application of Jordan's Principle to federal government programs affecting children and which implementation shall be approved by the Canadian Human Rights Commission in accordance with section 17;
>
> (b) The adoption of all of the funding formula (updated to 2009 values) and policy recommendations contained in "Wen:de The Journey Continues [:] The National Policy Review on First Nations Child and Family Services Research Project Phase 3" and which implementation shall also be approved by the Canadian Human Rights Commission in accordance with section 17; and
>
>
> (a) As compensation, subject to the limits provided for in sections 53(3)(e) and (f) for each First Nation person who was removed from his or her home since 1989[19] and thereby experienced pain and suffering;
> [19] As the evidence at the hearing will reveal, in 1989, Canada introduced the funding formula known as "Directive 20-1, Chapter 5," [63] The NPR is part of the evidence before the Tribunal (see Joint National Policy review, Exhibit HR-1, Tab 3: Dr. Rose-Alma J. MacDonald & Dr. Peter Ladd et al., First Nations Child and Family Services Joint National Policy Review Final Report (Ottawa: Assembly of First Nations and Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, 2000)). Likewise, the findings before the Tribunal discuss the 2000 NPR numerous times, (see for example Merit Decision at paras 150-154, 216, 224, 257, 260, 262 and 264). More specifically, the Panel found the NPR and Wen:de reports to be highly relevant and reliable evidence in this case:

> They are studies of the FNCFS Program commissioned jointly by AANDC and the AFN. They employed a rigorous methodology, in depth analysis of Directive 20-1, and consultations with various stakeholders. The Panel accepts the findings in these reports. There is no indication that AANDC questioned the findings of these reports prior to this Complaint. On the contrary, there are indications that AANDC, in fact, relied on these reports in amending the FNCFS Program.
> (Merit Decision at para. 257)

[64] Additionally, in the Compensation Decision the Panel found that:

> Canada was aware of the discrimination and some of its serious consequences on the First Nations children and their families. Canada was made aware by the NPR in 2000 and even more so in 2005 from its participation and knowledge of the WEN DE report. Canada did not take sufficient steps to remedy the discrimination until after the Tribunals orders. As the Panel already found in previous rulings, Canada focused on financial considerations rather than on the best interest of First Nations children and respecting their human rights.
> (Compensation Decision at para. 231, emphasis added see also, paras. 156, 162 and 170)

[65] The above excerpts support that the claim, the evidence and the findings clearly establish that the discrimination was ongoing as early as the year 2000.

[66] What is more, the evidence before the Tribunal established that Canada was already cognizant of the discrimination in 1996 in light of the findings of the 1996 report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples (RCAP), part of the Tribunal's evidentiary record that forms part of the claim and also forms part of the Tribunal's evidence and findings (see complaint extracts above and Compensation Decision at paras. 1 and 168-169).

[67] Additionally, the AGC's argument that the two class actions filed at the Federal Court could potentially provide compensation to children who were in care prior to January 1, 2006 is speculative and not convincing. The class actions have not yet been certified and it is unclear if Canada will support the certification. Given the early stages of the filed class actions, this argument is concerning as it involves further delays for victims of Canada's racial discrimination.

[68] In addition, a compensation process under the CHRA is different than that of a Court where a class action may be filed.

[69] Additionally, this Panel indicated in the Compensation Decision at para. 188 the following:

> The CHRA model is based on a human rights approach that is purposive and liberal and that is aimed at vindicating the victims of discriminatory practices whether considered systemic or not see section 50 (3) (c) of the CHRA

[70] Moreover, the Panel already voiced the crucial context of this case namely, the mass removal of children from their respective First Nations along with "the impracticalities and the risk of revictimizing children which outweigh the difficulty of establishing a process to compensate all the victims/survivors and the need for the evidence presented of having a child testify on how it felt to be separated from its family and community." (Compensation Decision at para. 189).

[71] Finally, on this point, all the above support an order providing compensation to First Nations children living on reserve and in the Yukon Territory, who were taken into care prior to or on January 1, 2006 and remained in care on January 1, 2006 and to their parents or caregiving grandparents. The Panel agrees with the Caring Society and the AFN that the discrimination experienced by those children and their caregivers, as they experienced the same harms rooted in the very same set of facts which led the Tribunal to find discrimination, was the same as that experienced by the children who came into care after January 1, 2006.

[72] Finally, the AGC advances that it has announced it would compensate the children affected by the discriminatory underfunding found in the Merit Decision, even where the children affected fall outside the terms of the complaint and that a class action, would be an appropriate vehicle to do so. The Panel believes this important acknowledgment that First Nations children will be compensated supports the Caring Society and the AFN's request. Also, the Panel notes that the Caring Society's submissions at page 3, para.11 refer to the December 11, 2019 House of Commons motion, passed unanimously and reproduced below:

> That the House call on the government to comply with the historic ruling of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal ordering the end of discrimination against First Nations children, including by:

> (a) fully complying with all orders made by the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal as well as in ensuring the children and their families don't have to testify their trauma in court; and
>
> (b) establishing a legislated funding plan for future years that will end the systemic shortfalls in First Nations child welfare.
>
> (Canada, Parliament, House of Commons Debates, 43rd Parl, 1st Sess, Vol 149, No 5 (December 11, 2019) at 279 [Motion 296])

[73] Given the above, it is surprising that the AGC now opposes this.

H. Orders

[74] The Panel relies on its Compensation Decision Order in 2019 CHRT 39 and adds the following further orders:

[75] Canada is ordered to pay compensation under s. 53(2)(e) pain and suffering ($20,000) and s. 53(3) wilful and reckless discriminatory practice ($20,000) to First Nations children living on reserve and in the Yukon Territory, who were removed from their homes and taken into care for compensable reasons prior to or on January 1, 2006 and remained in care on January 1, 2006, per the Tribunal's Compensation Decision Order.

[76] Canada is also ordered to pay compensation under s. 53(2)(e) pain and suffering ($20,000) and s. 53(3) wilful and reckless discriminatory practice ($20,000) to First Nations parents or caregiving grandparents living on reserve and in the Yukon Territory of First Nations children living on reserve and in the Yukon Territory, who were removed from their homes and were taken into care for compensable reasons prior to or on January 1, 2006 and remained in care on January 1, 2006, per the Tribunal's Compensation Decision Order.

IV. Question 3) Should compensation be paid to the estates of deceased individuals who otherwise would have been eligible?

[77] Decision: Yes

A. The First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada's Position

[78] The Caring Society submits that the AGC's litigation strategy has caused significant procedural delays in this case. Moreover, to deny payment to the estates of any since-deceased victims of discrimination would be, to allow Canada to benefit improperly from these delays. More importantly, the Caring Society submits that hundreds of child victims have died in care since the Complaint was commenced.

[79] Significantly, Canada ought not benefit from a financial windfall simply because children, youth and family members have died waiting for Canada's discrimination to end. This is particularly so given the Tribunal's findings that Canada's discrimination is wilful and reckless and ongoing in the case of the First Nations Child and Family Service Program. Additionally, the Caring Society contends that one of the purposes of compensation pursuant to the CHRA is to remove the economic incentive for discrimination by ensuring that some measure of the cost savings respondents achieve by discriminating are returned to victims. Indeed, allowing Canada to financially benefit due to its own delays in having this case resolved could set a dangerous precedent and entice other respondents to delay cases in the future where a particularly vulnerable group or individual brings a case forward.

[80] In addition to caselaw cited by the Commission and some other provincial decisions, the Caring Society raises the 2003 Ontario case of Clark v. Toshack Brothers (Prescott) Ltd., 2003 HRTO 27. In that decision, the Ontario Human Rights Tribunal adopted a similar principled analysis to that of this Tribunal in Stevenson v. Canadian National Railway Company, 2001 CanLII 38288 (CHRT) [Stevenson], ruling that the dual purposes of serving public and private interests militated in favour of ultimately allowing the proceedings to continue after the death of a complainant.

[81] Furthermore, on March 3, 2020, the Panel provided the parties with a case on this matter (Commission des droits de la personne c. Bradette Gauthier, 2010 QCTDP 10 (Gauthier)) and requested feedback. In Gauthier, the Quebec Human Rights Tribunal awarded discrimination remedies to the children of a complainant who died prior to the issuance of a decision in his case.

[82] The Caring Society adopts the submissions of the Commission on Gauthier.

[83] Regarding Canada (Attorney General) v. Hislop, 2007 SCC 10 [Hislop], the Caring Society acknowledges that s. 15 Charter damages generally do not survive the death of a claimant. However, they argue that it does not follow that this approach should be carried over to CHRA cases, pointing to the different language in s. 24(1) of the Charter as compared to ss. 53(2)(e) and 53 (3) of the CHRA, as well as the differing overarching legislative objectives. To support its position, the Caring Society points to academic commentary which argues that cross-fertilization between constitutional equality rights and statutory human rights regimes should only happen to enrich equality jurisprudence and not when doing so would undermine either's statutory objectives.

[84] The Caring Society raises several cases of individuals who otherwise would have qualified for compensation pursuant to the Compensation Decision but have since died. According to the Caring Society, these cases demonstrate the unfairness that would result from allowing Canada to effectively benefit (via cost savings) from their deaths.

[85] Finally, the Caring Society also makes an "in the alternative" argument that the Tribunal possesses the statutory authority as master of its own house to retroactively backdate its orders, and provides a variety of possible dates to do so. The prospective dates to which the order could be backdated include the date the Commission referred the complaint to the Tribunal, the originally-scheduled final hearing date on the merits, the actual final hearing date on the merits, the release date of the decision on the merits, the final date of the hearing on compensation or the release date of the compensation decision.

[86] The Caring Society submits that, in a scenario where the Tribunal opts to craft a Hislop-type rule, the earliest possible date would be the most just.

B. The Assembly of First Nations' Position

[87] The AFN's position on this matter is also that an otherwise-eligible individual who died prior to receiving compensation should see the compensation awarded to their estate. They rely on the same cases cited by the Commission and the Caring Society, pointing out that while Hislop, British Columbia v. Gregoire, 2005 BCCA 585 [Gregoire] and Giacomelli Estate v. Canada (Attorney General), 2008 ONCA 346 [Giacomelli] have been applied in several contexts, they are not determinative of the issue at hand. The AFN raises several contemporary cases including the recent case of Pankoff v. St. Thomas (City), 2019 HRTO 993, an interim decision on a matter with a deceased complainant who was alleging discrimination in the context of government services, to support the argument that this issue is not settled law.

[88] The AFN provided extensive submissions on the Ontario case of Morrison v. Ontario Speed Skating Association, 2010 HRTO 1058 [Morrison], also raised by the Commission. In that case, a complainant filed an employment discrimination complaint but died shortly thereafter. The respondent brought a motion to dismiss, citing Gregoire, Hislop and Giacomelli. The Ontario Human Rights Tribunal (HRTO) found that common-law principles about abatement on death did not apply to statutory claims under the Ontario Human Rights Code, RSO 1990, c H.19. The AFN argues that the HRTO distinguished the Gregoire and Charter cases from the case before it, being a private employment relationship, but expressly left the question of its precedential value to similar cases of government services in the human rights context open, at para 31:

> The Gregoire decision itself is also distinguishable. Although both Gregoire and the present Application involve claims of breaches of provincial human rights statues, Gregoire involved an allegation that the provincial government had breached the applicant's right to be free from discrimination on the basis of disability under the British Columbia Human Rights Code by failing to provide appropriate supervision, treatment and counselling services. It was a claim against the government with respect to the provision of government services or benefits. In contrast, the Application before me involves an allegation of discrimination by a private employer. It is unnecessary for me to decide in this case whether Gregoire is a compelling precedent in the situation of a claim for government benefits and services, as this Application does not involve such a claim.

[89] The AFN also adopts the submissions of the Commission on Gauthier; while adding several additional submissions of their own. First, they point out that the Quebec Charter contains no language which would suggest the victim of discrimination must be alive to be compensated. Second, they suggest that there are parallels in terms of vulnerability and exploitation as between the victims of discrimination in Gauthier (nursing home residents) and here (First Nations children). Additionally, they argue that the payment of an award to the victim's children in Gauthier was appropriate in the given context. As many of the victims in this case were children themselves and may not yet have produced heirs, an award to their estates would be more appropriate.

[90] Finally, the AFN submits that an individual who became deceased should still be able to pass on the compensation award to their estate.

C. The Canadian Human Rights Commission's Position

[91] The Commission provided extensive submissions on the issue of payments to estates. They are prefaced by a reminder that, in the view of the Commission, the progress of this case was stalled by multiple lengthy delays, often caused by Canada, and that it was sadly inevitable that some individuals will have died while awaiting the remedies stage.

[92] The Commission argues that the Tribunal's own caselaw is supportive of paying awards to estates, as is a purposive reading of the Tribunal's statutory remedial powers. The Tribunal's ruling in Stevenson, is put forward as the only occasion on which the Tribunal has dealt with the question of a complainant's death.

[93] In that case, a matter was settled in principle but the complainant died before the settlement was finalized. While the Tribunal ruled in Stevenson that the complaint could continue, there was no explicit ruling as to whether remedies for pain and suffering or wilful and reckless discrimination could also flow to the complainant's estate. The Commission notes that in its ruling in Stevenson the Tribunal cited Barber v. Sears Inc (No. 2), (1993) 22 C.H.R.R. D/409 (Ont. Bd. Inq.) [Barber]. The Barber case was also a preliminary ruling where the Board found that it could continue with a complaint, even though the complainant had died after filing. In the subsequent decision on the merits, the Board found discrimination, and ordered the respondent to pay general damages to the complainant's estate. The Commission points out that two other provincial cases from the same time period similarly awarded remedies to estates, being Allum v. Hollyburn Properties Management Inc. (1991), 15 C.H.R.R. D/171 and Baptiste v. Napanee and District Rod and Gun Club (1993), 19 C.H.R.R. D/24.

[94] Furthermore, the Commission adds that two additional policy considerations militate in favour of paying estates. First, disallowing payments to estates could create perverse incentives for respondents to delay cases, contrary to the requirement in 48.9(1) of the CHRA that hearings be conducted "as informally and expeditiously as the requirements of natural justice and the rules of procedure allow". Second, the Commission stresses that family separations often have intergenerational impacts, making it ever more important that payments should flow through estates to benefit the heirs to the victims of discriminatory practices.

[95] In addition to the above analysis of the Tribunal's own statute and jurisprudence, the Commission provided submissions on cases from other jurisdictions where human rights adjudicators have considered the impact of a complainant's death on the survival of proceedings/remedies.

[96] In Gregoire, the British Columbia Court of Appeal distinguished the CHRT's decision in Stevenson and held that the estate of a deceased complainant was not a "person" within the meaning of the BC Code (which, the Commission notes, is worded differently than the federal legislation). This case can and should be distinguished, the Commission argues.

[97] Regarding Hislop, the Commission stresses that it should be read contextually and was never meant to lay down a blanket rule. This is echoed by the Manitoba Court of Appeal, who noted that the Supreme Court declined to lay down a clear broad declaration that the right to redress for Charter violations ends on death (see Grant v. Winnipeg Regional Health Authority et al, 2015 MBCA 44). The Commission stresses that Hislop was decided on different facts: there, the individuals whose estates were looking to pursue equality claims had died prior to the passage of the legislation from which they alleged they were discriminatorily excluded. They were not alive at the time of the rights infringements, in contrast to the case at hand. Consequently, the Commission argues that Hislop should be distinguished, on the basis of the factual matrix as well as the language found in the differing statutory regimes.

[98] The Commission also cites provincial human rights jurisprudence (from Manitoba, Nova Scotia, Alberta and Ontario), where results on the issue differ. While not binding on the Tribunal, these cases are somewhat persuasive. Of note is Morrison where Stevenson is followed and Gregoire and Hislop are distinguished.

[99] With respect to the Gauthier case provided by the Panel, generally, the Commission finds the decision supportive of its proposed approach to compensating estates in this case. However, they do point out that there, payments were made to the complainant's successors rather than his estate. Payments to estates would be more appropriate in this case where it may not be possible to determine the proper beneficiaries at the outset of an awards process. The decision is further distinguishable on the basis that the respondents did not attend the hearing or make submissions about remedy. Furthermore, it is unclear when exactly the complainant died, which complicates assessing it in light of Hislop. And ultimately, it is persuasive rather than binding, being from a provincial body under a different piece of legislation.

D. The Chiefs of Ontario's Position

[100] The COO did not take any position on this question.

E. The Nishnawbe Aski Nation's Position

[101] NAN adopted the submissions of the Caring Society on this question.

F. Canada's Position

[102] The AGC points to the case of Hislop for the proposition that the estate of an individual is not a legal entity capable of experiencing discrimination (see paras. 72-73). Hislop was a Charter case concerning discrimination against same-sex partners under survivorship rules for the Canada Pension Plan. In Hislop, the Court crafted an approach whereby any members of the class who were alive at the time that the first hearing and arguments had concluded could take advantage of the judgement.

[103] The AGC's position is that the estates of individuals who were alive as of the time that the hearing of the original decision on the merits of the discrimination concluded (being October 24, 2014) should be entitled to compensation. Conversely, the AGC argues, those of any individuals who passed away after that date ought not to be. The AGC notes that such a determination by the Tribunal would not necessarily preclude potential class actions from including such estates in any settlement negotiated between those parties.

[104] Canada does not believe that Gauthier provides any assistance to the Tribunal. They point out that it is from a different jurisdiction, under different legislation, and conflicts with more persuasive approaches from guiding courts (namely Hislop).

G. Analysis

[105] The specific facts and context of this case and the CHRA's objective and purpose are the starting point in the Panel's analysis (Compensation Decision at paras. 94-97 and 132): "The proper legal analysis is fair, large and liberal and must advance the Act's objective and account for the need to uphold the human rights it seeks to protect. […] [O]ne should not search for ways and means to minimize those rights and to enfeeble their proper impact." (Compensation Decision at para.135).

[106] Furthermore, in the Compensation Decision, the Panel relied on this specific quote from the Supreme Court in CN v. Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission):

> Human rights legislation is intended to give rise, amongst other things, to individual rights of vital importance, rights capable of enforcement, in the final analysis, in a court of law. I recognize that in the construction of such legislation the words of the Act must be given their plain meaning, but it is equally important that the rights enunciated be given their full recognition and effect. We should not search for ways and means to minimize those rights and to enfeeble their proper impact. Although it may seem commonplace, it may be wise to remind ourselves of the statutory guidance given by the federal Interpretation Act which asserts that statutes are deemed to be remedial and are thus to be given such fair, large and liberal interpretation as will best ensure that their objects are attained. First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (see CN v. Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission), 1987 CanLII 109 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 1114, at, p. 1134) cited in 2015 CHRT 14 at, para.13)
> (Compensation Decision at para. 133)

[107] The Panel also adopts the reasoning in Canada (Attorney General) v. Morgan, [1992] 2 FC 401(FCA) at para. 49 where MacGuinan J.A (dissenting on other grounds) wrote "A strict tort or contract analogy should not be employed, since what is in question is not a common law action but a statutory remedy of a unique nature".

[108] Moreover, the Panel agrees with the Caring Society's position that compensating estates is consistent with the remedial purposes of the CHRA, and that human rights legislation is not, according to the Supreme Court of Canada, to be limited or 'read down' in anything but the clearest cases of express legislative intent.

[109] On this point, the Supreme Court of Canada, ruled that human rights tribunals and courts cannot limit the meaning of terms in human rights legislation that are meant to advance the quasi-constitutional purposes of the CHRA: "the Canadian Human Rights Act is a quasi-constitutional document and we should affirm that any exemption from its provisions must be clearly stated" (Canada (House of Commons) v. Vaid, 2005 SCC 30 at para. 81).

[110] What is more, the issue of the Tribunal's ability under the CHRA to deal with a complaint after a complainant's death was discussed by the former Tribunal Vice-Chair Grant Sinclair, as he then was, in Stevenson. There, the Tribunal emphasized that prohibiting a victim's estate from proceeding with a claim would extinguish all interests of said victim, including the important public interest (see Stevenson at para 32). The Tribunal also found in Stevenson at paras. 23-35 as follows:

> [23] The core of CN's argument is that this common law principle applies so that the complaint terminates with the death of the Complainant. No provision in the Act or any other relevant legislation, nor a liberal interpretation of the Act allows for an Estate or Estate representative to continue the complaint before the Tribunal.
> [24] The starting point is the Act, which must be read in light of its nature and purpose. The purpose of the Act as set out in section 2, is to give effect to the principle of equal opportunity for individuals by eradicating invidious discrimination. That task should not be approached in a narrow, literal fashion. Rather the Act is to be given a large and liberal interpretation that will best obtain the objectives of the Act [(2)].
> [25] Reference to section 2 and other relevant provisions of the Act demonstrates that the Act extends beyond just individual rights and engages the broader public interest of freedom from discrimination.

[26] Section 40 of the Act permits an individual or group of individuals alleging discrimination to file a complaint with the Commission. These persons need not be the victims of the alleged discrimination. The Commission itself may initiate a complaint under Section 40(3) of the Act.

[27] As well, section 50(1) recognizes there may be "interested parties" to the complaint. The Tribunal has on many occasions given intervenor status to such parties in the hearing of the complaint.

[28] The Commission is a party in the hearing of a complaint. In such case the Commission does not appear as the representative of the individual Complainant but is there to represent the public interest (section 51).

[29] The Commission also exercises a screening role by way of the discretion given to it under sections 40(2) and Section 41 of the Act. In the exercise of this discretion, the Commission can determine whether or not a complaint goes forward to a hearing.

[30] The remedies provided by the Act are corroborative of the broader reach of the Act, beyond the interests of an individual complainant. Thus, under section 53(2), in addition to compensating the complainant, the Tribunal can:

- issue a cease and desist order against the person who committed the discriminatory practice;

- order such person to take or adopt practices in consultation with the Commission to redress the discriminatory practice, including the adoption of a special program under section 16(1) of the Act or the making of an application under section 17 of the Act.

[31] In my opinion, having regard to the regime of the Act, one must conclude that a human rights complaint filed under the Act is not in the nature of and does not have the character of an "action" as referenced in the actio personalis principle of law. The Act is aimed at the removal of discrimination in Canada, not redressing a grievance between two private individuals.

[32] If CN has its way, the death of the complainant would extinguish not only the interests of that complainant, but also all the other interests involved in the complaint, including the very significant public interest.

[33] Should the maxim actio personalis, a maxim that has its origins in medieval common law, a maxim whose anachronism is illustrated by the fact that in England and all common law jurisdictions in Canada the rule has been abolished,[(3)] be allowed to override the purpose and objectives of the Canadian Human Rights Act? I think not.

[34] Counsel cited a number of authorities. In my opinion, the most relevant case on this issue is Barber v. Sears Canada Inc. (No.2)[(4)]. This case supports > the conclusion that, taking into account public interest considerations, a human rights complaint should not be stayed because of the death of the Complainant.

> [35] Accordingly, for the above reasons, I have concluded that the actio personalis maxim does not and should not apply to a human rights complaint under the Act and this proceeding should not be stayed on that ground.

[111] The Panel agrees with the Tribunal's reasoning in Stevenson above and finds it is applicable to this case.

[112] Furthermore, the HRTO, adopted a similar principled analysis to that of this Tribunal in Stevenson, ruling that the death of a complainant does not terminate a proceeding under the Ontario Human Rights Code and does not abolish the HRTO's jurisdiction to hear the complaint. In fact, the dual purposes of serving public and private interests militated in favour of ultimately allowing the proceedings to continue after the death of a complainant. (see Clark v. Toshack Brothers (Prescott) Ltd., 2003 HRTO 27 at paras. 13-14).

[113] Although it is not bound by the HRTO decision, given the nature of the HRTO's analysis, the Tribunal finds the HRTO's reasoning persuasive in this case.

[114] However, in Stevenson, the issue of awards of compensation payments to the estates of complainants or victims for pain and suffering or for wilful and reckless conduct under the CHRA was not decided.

[115] Nevertheless, the Tribunal in Stevenson relied on an interesting case from the Ontario Board of Inquiry (the "Board") in Barber where the Board determined there is certainly a public interest affected immediately by the resolution of this case. This interest does not expire with the death of the complainant.

[116] More importantly here, in the subsequent decision on the merits, the Board found discrimination, and ordered the respondent to pay general damages of $1,000 to the complainant's estate, "…as compensation for the loss to Mrs. Barber's dignity arising out of the infringement." (see Barber at para. 18 (ON BOI), and Barber v. Sears Canada Inc. (No. 3), (1994), 22 C.H.R.R. D/415 at para. 98 (ON BOI)). While this case is also not binding on this Tribunal, the Panel agrees with its reasoning. The reasoning is consistent with the objective and purpose of the CHRA and is also applicable to this case.

[117] The Panel believes, in the event that a question arises concerning the CHRA, the best reference is the Act itself, case law interpreting the Act and case law that is similar to the case at hand.

[118] The AGC relies on Hislop to support its position that only estates of individuals who were alive at the time the hearing of the original decision on the merits of the discrimination concluded (being October 24, 2014) should be entitled to compensation.

[119] Moreover, the AGC submits that the Supreme Court of Canada decided that an estate is just a collection of assets and liabilities of a person who has died. It is not an individual and it has no dignity that may be infringed.

[120] While the AGC's assertion is true, a closer look at the Supreme Court's analysis and selected wording is helpful. Moreover, the Court reiterates a paramount principle to be used in every case: the importance of the specific context of the case. In Hislop, this specific context is, as aptly argued by the Commission, that one of the issues was whether a limitation period under the Canada Pension Plan had a discriminatory effect by effectively blocking the estates of deceased same sex survivors from benefitting from remedial legislation that was passed after their deaths. The Supreme Court's statements were made in a context where the deceased survivors whose estates sought to pursue equality claims had died before the passage of the remedial legislation from which they were being excluded. Consequently, the claims were not based on alleged infringements that took place while the survivors were still alive. It was in this particular context that the Supreme Court held that estates do not have standing to "commence" s. 15(1) Charter claims:

> […] in the context in which the claim is made here, an estate is just a collection of assets and liabilities of a person who has died. It is not an individual and it has no dignity that may be infringed. The use of the term "individual" in s. 15(1) was intentional. For these reasons, we conclude that estates do not have standing to commence s. 15(1) Charter claims. In this sense, it may be said that s. 15 rights die with the person

[121] The Panel agrees with the Commission's position on Hislop above and finds that the context of the claim analysed in Hislop differs considerably from the case at hand.

[122] Additionally, the Panel distinguishes the Supreme Court of Canada's reasoning in Hislop, which is made on specific facts involving persons who desire to commence actions on behalf of alleged victims who are now deceased, and the case at hand, where the complainants [who have standing] are First Nations organizations representing First Nations children and families, the victims in the present case. Of note, in this case, the victims' suffering was already established in the evidence and explained in the findings and reasons of the Tribunal's decisions and rulings. Given the above, the two cases are completely different given the facts, the context, the evidence and the Panel's findings in the present case.

[123] Also, on this point, the Panel agrees with the Manitoba Court of Appeal who has stressed the importance of context when considering the Supreme Court's decision in Hislop. As Mainella J.A. stated for a unanimous Court of Appeal:

> I do not read such careful language [from Hislop] as endorsement for the broad proposition that redress for a violation of a Charter right ends on death, regardless of the context. The court could have easily made such a broad declaration, but chose instead to keep its remarks tailored to the context of claims on behalf of persons who were already deceased at the time the change to the CPP occurred.
> (Grant v. Winnipeg Regional Health Authority et al., 2015 MBCA 44 at para. 66).

[124] On the facts that were before it, the Court of Appeal went on to dismiss a motion to strike a Charter claim that had been brought in circumstances where the alleged infringement was said to have contributed to the death of the claimant.

[125] Furthermore, the Panel agrees with the Complainants and the Commission that, in any event, while s. 15(1) Charter jurisprudence may be of assistance when interpreting analogous human rights statutes such as the CHRA, the two regimes are separate and distinct. What is more, the wording of s. 53 of the CHRA is more prescriptive than the very general remedial language used in s. 24(1) of the Charter. The CHRA language arguably creates a stronger presumption that meaningful remedies will flow where it has been found that a victim has experienced a discriminatory practice in his or her lifetime.

[126] Moreover, there is no explicit wording or language in the CHRA barring payment of compensation to estates for pain and suffering or wilful and reckless discrimination. In fact, the Panel finds it would be unfair to the victims who have died to deny them and their estates the compensation that they are entitled to.

[127] The Panel finds that misapplying the Hislop reasoning to victims may seriously thwart the victims' human rights. While estates may not have standing to commence Charter actions, this in no way abolishes the victims' rights to receive compensation for the discrimination found by this Panel. In this instance, one of the worst cases of racial discrimination and suffering was found.

[128] Furthermore, cases before this Tribunal and the case at hand, involve the very important public interest namely, to protect human rights and to deter those who violate those fundamental rights and discriminate on the basis of those fundamental rights.

[130] Moreover, paying compensation to victims who have suffered discrimination but died before a compensation order is made is consistent with the objectives of the CHRA. Human rights laws are remedial in nature. They aim to make victims of discrimination "whole" and to dissuade respondents from discriminating in the future. Both of these important policy goals can be achieved by conferring compensation to the victims in this case who are deceased: it ensures that the estate of the victim is compensated for the pain and suffering experienced by the victim and ensures that Canada is held accountable for its racial discrimination and wilful and reckless discriminatory conduct.

[131] Taking all this into account, it is by no means obvious that the reasoning from Hislop should be directly carried over into the present context. Unlike Hislop, there is no doubt here that any deceased beneficiaries under the Compensation Decision Order actually experienced discriminatory impacts during their lives.

[132] For all these reasons, the Panel does not apply Hislop directly to this case and rejects the AGC's argument to only pay compensation to the estates of individuals who were alive at the time the hearing of the original decision on the merits of the discrimination concluded

(being October 24, 2014). The Panel disagrees with the AGC's argument that any individuals who passed away after that date ought not to receive compensation.

[133] In Gregoire, the B.C. Court of Appeal found that the B.C. Human Rights Code allows claims to be made by an individual "person" or group of "persons," and that the estate of a deceased complainant was not a "person" within the meaning of the statute.

[134] The Panel finds that the Gregoire decision can be distinguished from the case at hand. The two cases have a very different factual matrix. In the case at hand, we are dealing with a complaint filed by representative organisations on behalf of children and families who are victims as opposed to the case in Gregoire of a single representative of an individual complainant who had passed before the hearing occurred.

[135] Moreover, the B.C. Court of Appeal itself distinguished a complaint on behalf of a group or class of persons alleging a human rights violation against them and a complaint on behalf of an individual:

> CNR v. Canada (Human Rights Commission), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1114 is cited for the proposition that a complaint can be heard absent any allegations of individual violations. The complaint in that case was lodged by a public interest group about what was alleged to be systemic discrimination of women in respect of employment by the Railway without any one of them being specifically named. But the case is of no particular assistance here. The complaint filed by Ms. Gregoire was not filed on behalf of a group or class of persons alleging a human rights violation against them. It was filed on behalf of an individual. I see nothing in the CNR case that is at odds with the judge's conclusion that Mr. Goodwin's rights abated with his death. The question raised here did not arise in that case.
> (Gregoire at para. 10).

[136] What is more, the Tribunal already analysed the word "victim" in the CHRA and the wording on remedies in the CHRA in its recent Compensation Decision (see paras. 112-124 and 129-155). The Panel continues to rely on this interpretation of "victim" in the CHRA. This Panel found that victims of discrimination in this case have suffered. The fact that some have died and some have not should not be determinative of who receives compensation remedies for the racial discrimination and the pain and suffering that Canada caused or for Canada's wilful and reckless conduct.

[137] Furthermore, the Panel finds there are compelling public interest arguments in favour of awarding compensation to estates of children who have died in care.

[138] The Panel agrees with the Caring Society that Canada should not benefit financially because children, youth and family members have died waiting for Canada's racial discrimination to end. The Panel must not encourage incentives for respondents to delay the resolution of discrimination complaints. Even more so, when the victims are children.

[139] Moreover, the Panel agrees with the Commission that this would be of particular concern in the case of victims who were discriminated against in connection with a terminal illness or advanced old age, where it could be anticipated that death might occur before a hearing can be concluded.

[140] The Panel also agrees with the Commission that in the context of this particular case, it must be remembered that many of the discriminatory practices at stake involved the forced separation of families and communities, and could therefore have intergenerational impacts. In these circumstances, it is entirely appropriate to direct Canada to make payments that will flow through estates to the heirs of the victims of its discriminatory practices. This outcome is responsive to the nature of the harms, and best advances the goal of reconciliation between First Nations peoples and the Crown.

[142] Finally, the Panel notes that no party has raised or discussed the important question of what needs to be done if an estate has been closed under Provincial statutes.

[143] The Indian Act governs estates for registered "Indians" however, not all First Nations children in care were registered or have kept their status.

[144] This prompts the question as to what should be the guidelines if a First Nations child was adopted in a Non-First Nations' family and lost status or if a First Nations child was not registered?

[145] For example, if there is a need to petition the Superior Court for the appointment of an administrator of the estate in case of intestacy (absence of a will) should funding and assistance be provided to avoid placing burdens on beneficiaries?

[146] The Panel believes this should be addressed in the parties' discussions on the compensation process especially given the possibility that numerous victims who have died did not have wills.

[147] Additionally, in deciding which date should be considered for compensation payments to estates of victims, the Tribunal must consider the claim, the specific facts of the case, the evidence and the CHRA. In this case, representatives of complainant organizations successfully proved that First Nations children and their families were harmed by Canada's discriminatory practices and have suffered before and after the original cut-off date of January 1, 2006 found in the Compensation Decision. This is demonstrated as early as the year 2000, as explained above. The Panel already found in the Compensation Decision that the complainant organizations were speaking on behalf of a group of victims in this case. The fact that some victims in the group were alive and others deceased at the time the complaint was filed does not change the fact that all victims of Canada's discriminatory practices found in this case have suffered. Moreover, all victims should be compensated or have their estates compensated. The Panel finds that the fact that some victims have suffered and died prior to and during these proceedings should not preclude them from receiving some form of vindication in having their suffering recognized and their estates compensated. This reasoning becomes even more important if victims have died as a result of the discriminatory practices. A technical argument distinguishing living victims and deceased victims in this case does not advance the remedial purposes of the CHRA.

[148] There is no doubt that the Tribunal has the ability under the CHRA to make compensation orders considering the discriminatory practices that took place prior to the filing of the complaint. The Tribunal has already explained above and, in the Compensation Decision, that the claim is broader than the complaint form.

[149] Furthermore, the Panel agrees with the Commission that Canada should pay compensation in respect of all the victims of its discriminatory practices, including those who passed away after experiencing suffering that would make them eligible under the Compensation Decision Order. The Panel also finds it should also include the further orders contained within this ruling. Paying compensation awards for pain and suffering (s. 53(2)(e)) and special compensation (s. 53(3)) to the victims' estates will further the remedial purposes of the quasi-constitutional CHRA.

[150] Finally, for those reasons, the Panel's chosen temporal scope for compensation to estates of victims of Canada's discriminatory practices is the same as for all victims/survivors in the Compensation Decision and this ruling. Consequently, the Panel sets aside the other alternative proposed dates of 2008 (filing of the complaint), 2014 (final arguments) and 2016 (Merit Decision).

H. Order

[151] The Panel relies on its Compensation Decision Order in 2019 CHRT 39 and adds the following further order:

[152] Canada is ordered to pay compensation under s. 53(2)(e) pain and suffering ($20,000) and s. 53(3) wilful and reckless discriminatory practice ($20,000) to the estates of all First Nations children and parents or caregiving grandparents who have died after suffering discriminatory practices described in the Compensation Decision Order, including the referenced period in the Order above mentioned in Question 2.

I. Other Important Considerations

[153] The AGC made arguments on the issue of the temporal scope for the compensation order under Jordan's Principle (see para.48 above). For the Panel, this raises an important point concerning victims who have experienced discrimination found in these proceedings prior to December 12, 2007 or on December 12, 2007. The Panel strongly believes that in light of the above reasons and further orders, the parties should now consider whether compensation to the estate of Jordan River Anderson and the estate of his deceased mother and, First Nations peoples in similar situations, should be paid as part of this Tribunal's compensation process. While the Panel is not making a final determination on this issue, the evidence and findings in this case may support it and Jordan River Anderson is the reason why Jordan's Principle exists. While Motion 296 on Jordan's Principle did not yet exist, the life story of Jordan River Anderson and his family and the discrimination that they have experienced prior to December 12, 2007 birthed Jordan's Principle. This is the very reason why Motion 296 was brought forward and adopted. This forms part of the Tribunal's evidence. The Panel also believes that Jordan River Anderson's father should also be considered for compensation in a similar fashion as the parents/grandparents discussed in question 2.

[154] Furthermore, the Panel requests submissions on this point and, on whether First Nations children living on reserve or off-reserve who, as a result of Canada's racial discrimination found in this case, experienced a gap, delay and/or denial of services, were deprived of essential services and were removed and placed in out-of-home care in order to access services prior to December 12, 2007 or on December 12, 2007 and their parents or caregiving grandparents living on reserve or off-reserve should receive compensation. The Panel also requests submissions on whether First Nations children living on reserve or off-reserve who were not removed from the home but experienced a gap, delay and/or denial of services, were deprived of essential services as a result of the discrimination found in this case prior to December 12, 2007 or on December 12, 2007 and their parents or caregiving grandparents living on reserve or off-reserve should be compensated.

[156] Additionally, the interested parties, the Chiefs of Ontario and the Nishnawbe Aski Nation have requested further amendments to the compensation orders to broaden the compensation orders to include off-reserve First Nations children and to include a broader class of caregivers reflecting caregiving practices in many First Nations communities including aunties, uncles, cousins, older siblings, or other family members/kin who were acting in a primary caregiving role, amongst other things. The Panel has questions for the interested parties and parties on these issues. The Panel will establish a schedule for parties to make submissions on the Panel's questions and will make a determination once the questions are fully answered. Depending on the outcome, the Panel may further amend the compensation orders.

V. Retention of Jurisdiction

[157] The Panel retains jurisdiction until the issue of the process for compensation has been resolved by consent order or otherwise and will then revisit the need for further retention of jurisdiction on the issue of compensation. This does not affect the Panel's retention of jurisdiction on other issues in this case.

Compensation Process Ruling on Outstanding Issues in Order to Finalize the Draft Compensation Framework

I. Introduction

[1] This ruling follows this Tribunal's compensation decision and orders rendered on September 6, 2019 (First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (representing the Minister of Indigenous and Northern Affairs Canada), 2019 CHRT 39 [Compensation Decision]) and subsequent ruling on additional compensation requests emanating from some parties arising out of the compensation orders (First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (representing the Minister of Indigenous and Northern Affairs Canada), 2020 CHRT 7).

[2] In the Compensation Decision, Canada was ordered to pay compensation in the amount of $40,000 to victims of Canada's discriminatory practices under the First Nations Child and Family Services Program (FNCFS program) and Jordan's Principle. This Panel ordered Canada to enter into discussions with the Assembly of First Nations (AFN) and the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada (Caring Society) and to consult with the Canadian Human Rights Commission (Commission) and the interested parties, the Chiefs of Ontario (COO) and the Nishnawbe Aski Nation (NAN), to co-develop a culturally safe compensation process framework including a process to locate the victims/survivors identified in the Tribunal's decision, namely First Nations children and their parents or grandparents. The parties were given a mandate to explore possible options for the compensation process framework and return to the Tribunal. The AFN, the Caring Society and Canada have jointly indicated that many of the COO, the NAN and the Commission's suggestions were incorporated into the Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan. The Panel believes that this is a positive outcome.

[3] However, some elements of the Draft Compensation Framework are not agreed upon by all parties and interested parties. In particular the two interested parties, the COO and the NAN, made additional requests to broaden the scope of the Compensation Decision orders with which the other parties did not agree, as it will be explained below. Further, the COO and the NAN made a number of specific requests for amendments to the Draft Compensation Framework. The NAN's requests mainly focus on remote First Nations communities, some of which will be discussed below. This reflects the complexity of this case in many regards. The Panel is especially mindful that each First Nation is unique and has specific needs and expertise. The Panel's work is attentive to the inherent rights of self-determination and of self-governance of First Nations which are also important human rights. When First Nations parties and interested parties in this case present competing perspectives and ask this Tribunal to prefer their strategic views over those of their First Nations friends, it does add complexity in determining the matter. Nevertheless, the Panel believes that all the parties and interested parties' views are important, valuable and enrich the process. This being said, it is one thing for this Panel to make innovative decisions yet, it is another to choose between different First Nations' perspectives. However, a choice needs to be made and the Panel agrees with the joint Caring Society, AFN, and Canada submissions and the AFN's additional submissions on caregivers which will be explained below. At this point, the Panel's questions have now been answered and the Panel is satisfied with the proposed Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan and will not address all of the interested parties' suggestions that were not accepted by the other parties (i.e. the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada) ordered to work on the Draft Compensation Framework. The Panel will address the contentious issue involving specific definitions including some suggestions from the NAN concerning remote First Nations communities and two substantial requests from the COO and the NAN to broaden the scope of compensation below. For the reasons set out below, the Panel agrees with the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada's position on the COO and the NAN's requests.

[4] Discussions between Canada, the AFN and the Caring Society on a compensation scheme commenced on January 7, 2020. The discussions resulting in the Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan have been productive, and the parties have been able to agree on how to resolve most issues. At this point, there remains disagreement on three important definitions on which the parties cannot find common ground. These definitions are "essential service", "service gap" and "unreasonable delay". While the Panel is not imposing the specific wording for the definitions, the Panel provides reasons and guidance to assist the parties in finalizing those definitions as it will be explained below.

[5] The Caring Society, the AFN and Canada wish to clarify the proposed process for the completion of the Tribunal's orders on compensation. As the AGC outlined in its April 30, 2020 letter, the Complainants and the Respondent are submitting the Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan for the Tribunal's approval in principle. Once the Tribunal releases its decision on the outstanding Compensation Process matters, the Draft Compensation Framework will be adjusted to reflect said orders and will undergo a final copy edit to ensure consistency in terms. The Complainants and the Respondent will then consider the document final and will provide a copy to the Tribunal to be incorporated into its final order. The Panel agrees with this proposed process.

[6] The Panel wishes to thank the Caring Society, the AFN, Canada, the COO, the NAN and the Commission for their important contributions to the realization of the Draft Compensation Framework.

II. Reconciliation and Jordan River Anderson and his Family

[7] In its recent ruling dealing with three questions related to the compensation process (2020 CHRT 7), the Panel asked the parties to consider whether compensation to the estate of Jordan River Anderson and the estate of his deceased mother and also to his father and First Nations peoples in similar situations should be paid as part of this Tribunal's compensation process. While the Panel did not make a final determination on this issue, the Panel requested further submissions from the parties and interested parties on this point.

[8] While the AFN and the Caring Society agreed with the spirit of this possible amendment to the Tribunal's compensation orders, they feared this could jeopardize the compensation process as a whole given that Canada opposes it. Canada previously submitted that with respect to compensation under Jordan's Principle, the Panel was clear. At paragraph 251 of the Compensation Decision, compensation was granted for a defined period, Dec. 12, 2007- to November 2, 2017. These dates were also placed in bold in the judgment.

[9] Canada argues that their comments on the temporal scope above do not suggest a reopening of these compensation orders under Jordan's Principle. Additionally, Canada submits that the complaint mentioned Jordan's Principle and did not mention services prior to the adoption of Jordan's Principle in December 2007.

[10] The NAN also made submissions in favour of such broadened compensation orders as described above. However, upon consideration, the Panel does not want to jeopardize the compensation process as a whole.

[11] In light of the above, the Panel strongly encourages Canada to provide compensation to Jordan River Anderson's estate, his mother's estate, his father and siblings as a powerful symbol of reconciliation.

III. Framework for the Payment of Compensation under the Compensation Decision (Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan)

[12] The Panel has studied the Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan alongside all the parties', including interested parties', submissions and requests. The Panel approves the Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan "in principle", with the exception of the issues addressed below. The "in principle" approval should be understood in the context that this framework is not yet finalized and that the parties will modify this Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan to reflect the Panel's reasons and orders on the outstanding issues regarding compensation. The Draft Compensation Framework, Draft Notice Plan and the accompanying explanations in the joint Caring Society, AFN and Canada submissions provide the foundation for a Nation-wide compensation process. The opt-out provision in the Draft Compensation Framework addresses the right of any beneficiary to renounce compensation under this process and pursue other recourses should they opt to do so. The opt-out provision protects the rights of people who disagree with this process and who prefer to follow other paths. The Panel expects that the parties will file a final Draft Compensation Framework and final Draft Notice Plan seeking a consent order from this Tribunal.

[13] The reasons on the outstanding compensation issues are included below.

IV. The COO and the NAN Request for the Compensation Decision Order to Apply Equally to First Nations Persons On or Off Reserve in Ontario

[14] The Panel has considered all the parties and interested parties' submissions to determine this request. In the interest of brevity, the Panel has not reproduced all of those submissions. Rather it focuses on the COO's submissions on this point, summarized below, given that the Panel provides reasons to the COO explaining why it does not accept its request.

Key Positions of the Parties

[15] The COO submits that in Ontario, the Compensation Decision Order should apply equally to First Nations persons on or off reserve. From an Ontario-specific perspective, the COO urges the Panel to consider the scope of the definition of "beneficiary" for the purposes of First Nations people in Ontario who would benefit from the Compensation Decision Order. The NAN adopts the COO's submissions on this point.

[16] The COO advances that the Panel's findings with respect to the delivery of child and family services in Ontario pursuant to the Memorandum of Agreement Respecting Welfare Programs for Indians (1965 Agreement) at First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada), 2016 CHRT 2 [Merit Decision] (found at paras. 217-246) rightly centre the locus of racial discrimination in the 1965 Agreement[1]. The Panel held, at paragraph 392, that there was discrimination under the 1965 Agreement because First Nations children did not receive all the services set out in the Ontario child welfare legislation, the Child and Family Services Act, RSO 1990, c C.11 [CFSA], and its predecessors (now replaced by the Child, Youth and Family Services Act, 2017, SO 2017, c 14, Sch 1 [CYFSA]). Rather, Canada underfunded services to First Nations children under the 1965 Agreement by funding only some of the services set out in provincial legislation, and failed to keep up to date with Ontario legislation (Merit Decision at paras. 222-226).

[17] The COO submits the resulting discrimination runs through Ontario's programs and funding formulas, which apply equally to First Nations children receiving services from First Nations child welfare agencies and those receiving services from provincial "mainstream" child welfare agencies, as noted by the Panel in the Merit Decision at para. 222. The programs and funding formulas apply equally whether on or off reserve.

[18] The COO contends that it is helpful to remember that the 1965 Agreement does two main things. One, it requires Canada to pay a cost-share to Ontario, and that cost-share is indeed based on a calculation that uses the population of registered Indians mainly (though not exclusively) on reserve. Two, it requires Ontario to make the listed services available to "Indians" throughout the province, and not merely to those on reserve. The very nature of the 1965 Agreement is that service provision extends, via the Government of Ontario, both on and off reserve.

[19] The COO submits that from the perspective of a First Nations child, parent, or grandparent as a service recipient, the service they received was discriminatory both on and off reserve. The system of service provision under the 1965 Agreement does not draw a reserve-based distinction at the service delivery level.

[20] The NAN's Chiefs Committee on Children, Youth, and Families has highlighted that NAN First Nations have members who live off-reserve in Ontario who have also experienced discrimination in child and family services. The NAN submits these individuals should not be excluded from eligibility for compensation solely for reasons of off-reserve residency.

[21] The NAN adopts and relies upon the submissions of the COO on the topic of eligibility for off-reserve First Nations children and their caregivers in relation to the 1965 Agreement.

Reasons on Compensation Off-Reserve in Ontario

[22] The Panel understands the COO's comment on First Nations children, parents or grandparents' perspective as service recipients and it is true to say that the Panel found the 1965 Agreement discriminatory. Given this important perspective, the Panel reviewed the record, its own findings, the complaint, the parties' and the interested parties' Statements of Particulars and amended Statements of Particulars, the parties' and interested parties' final arguments, the remedies requested in 2014, 2019 and 2020 and the Tribunal's own findings in the Merits Decision. After a thorough review of the documents referred to above, the Panel finds it does not support the COO's position of a broadened compensation under the Compensation Decision to include those children who were removed off-reserves. The COO's own Statement of Particulars mentions on-reserve First Nations and adopts the Commission's theory of the case and requested remedies contained in its amended Statement of Particulars which refer to on-reserve First Nations. The Commission and the COO's final arguments, while addressing the 1965 Agreement's discriminatory impacts, did not adduce sufficient evidence and arguments on off-reserve children and families. Rather, they focused towards on-reserve First Nations in Ontario and, in so doing, were able to meet their onus. The Tribunal's findings were made after having carefully considered the COO and the Commission's positions, the evidence, the submissions and the final arguments. Moreover, the Panel crafted its Compensation Decision orders based on the above. The Panel posed compensation questions to the parties prior to the compensation hearing held in 2019. The COO did not make written submissions on the issue of compensation. In their oral submissions, the COO advised it is content with the other parties' requests for compensation.

[23] The Panel did invite parties to propose categories of children that could be added so the COO and the NAN's request is completely understandable, however, the requests need to be connected to the claim and supported by the evidence and the findings. The Panel to arrive at its Merit Decision and rulings, did not consider if First Nations children in Ontario were unnecessarily removed from their homes off-reserves under the 1965 Agreement because it was not argued, proven or requested until now. The Panel believes that doing so now would require additional evidence and submissions and that it would be unfair to authorize this to take place at this late stage. In fact, in its ruling granting the NAN interested party status, the Tribunal wrote:

> However, given we are at the remedial stage of these proceedings, the NAN's written submissions should only address the outstanding remedies and not > re-open matters already determined. The hearing of the merits of the complaint is completed and any further evidence on those issues is now closed. The Panel's role at this stage of the proceedings is to craft an order that addresses the circumstances of the case and the findings already made in the [Merit] Decision (see 2016 CHRT 11, at para.14).

[24] Additionally, reopening matters to adduce new evidence and arguments could jeopardize the compensation process entirely as it may be viewed as unfair by some parties and this could significantly delay compensation to the victims identified in this case. The new evidence that the Panel accepts is geared towards the effectiveness and implementation of the Panel's orders for immediate, mid-term and long-term reform including the order to cease and desist from the discriminatory practices identified in the Merit Decision and in its subsequent rulings. The off-reserve discriminatory impacts of the 1965 Agreement towards First Nations children off-reserve can be addressed by reform of the 1965 Agreement and Jordan's Principle but unfortunately not under the Tribunal's Compensation Decision orders outside of Jordan's Principle orders.

[25] Nonetheless, in the Merit Decision, the Panel found the 1965 Agreement discriminatory and found:

> AANDC's design, management and control of the FNCFS Program, along with its corresponding funding formulas and the other related provincial/territorial agreements have resulted in denials of services and created various adverse impacts for many First Nations children and families living on reserves. Non-exhaustively, the main adverse impacts found by the Panel are:
>
>
> - The application of the 1965 Agreement in Ontario that has not been updated to ensure on-reserve communities can comply fully with Ontario's Child and Family Services Act (see Merit Decision at para. 458, emphasis added).
> Despite being aware of the adverse impacts resulting from the FNCFS Program for many years, AANDC has not significantly modified the program since its inception in 1990. Nor have the schedules of the 1965 Agreement in Ontario been updated since 1998. Notwithstanding numerous reports and recommendations to address the adverse impacts outlined above, including its own internal analysis and evaluations, AANDC has sparingly implemented the findings of those reports. While efforts have been made to improve the > FNCFS Program, including through the EPFA and other additional funding, those improvements still fall short of addressing the service gaps, denials and adverse impacts outlined above and, ultimately, fail to meet the goal of providing culturally appropriate child and family services to First Nations children and families living on-reserve that are reasonably comparable to those provided off-reserve (see Merit Decision at para. 461, emphasis added).

> Pursuant to these sections of the CHRA, the Complainants and Commission request immediate relief for First Nations children. In their view, this can be accomplished by ordering AANDC to remove the most discriminatory aspects of the funding schemes it uses to fund FNCFS Agencies under the FNCFS Program and child and family services in Ontario under the 1965 Agreement; and, requiring AANDC to properly implement Jordan's Principle. Moving forward in the long term, the Complainants and Commission request other orders that AANDC reform the FNCFS Program and the 1965 Agreement to ensure equitable levels of service, including funding thereof, for First Nations child and family services on-reserve (see Merit Decision at, para. 475, emphasis added).
>
> The AFN requests similar reform, including commissioning a study to determine the most effective means of providing care for First Nations children and families and greater performance measurements and evaluations of AANDC employees related to the provision of First Nations child and family services. Similarly, in Ontario, the COO requests that an independent study of funding and service levels for First Nations child welfare in Ontario based on the 1965 Agreement be conducted (see Merit Decision at para. 478, emphasis added).
> The Panel is generally supportive of the requests for immediate relief and the methodologies for reforming the provision of child and family services to First Nations living on reserve, but also recognizes the need for balance espoused by AANDC. AANDC is ordered to cease its discriminatory practices and reform the FNCFS Program and 1965 Agreement to reflect the findings in this decision. AANDC is also ordered to cease applying its narrow definition of Jordan's principle and to take measures to immediately implement the full meaning and scope of Jordan's principle (see Merit Decision at para. 481).

[26] The 1965 Agreement is discriminatory and needs to be entirely reformed and the Ontario Special study of the 1965 Agreement may be a helpful tool to achieve this goal for the benefit of First Nations children in Ontario.

[27] For those reasons, the Panel denies the COO and the NAN's request to broaden the scope of compensation to include First Nations children who were not resident on reserves or ordinarily resident on reserves and who were unnecessarily removed from their off-reserve homes.

V. The COO and the NAN Request that the Category of Eligible Caregivers Be Expanded from Parents or Grandparents to Other Caregivers

Key Positions of the Parties

[28] In sum, the COO believes that the reality of families in First Nations communities means that aunts, uncles and other family members may well have been caring for children at the time of removal, and submits that such people should not be precluded from entitlement to compensation.

[29] In sum, the NAN submits it is not unusual in NAN First Nations for individuals other than parents or grandparents to act in a primary caregiving capacity. This reality is not reflected in the Compensation Decision Order. The NAN requests the category of eligible caregivers be expanded from parents or grandparents to include aunts, uncles, cousins, older siblings, or other family members and kin who were acting in a primary caregiving role.

[30] While the Panel issued the Compensation Decision after thoughtful deliberations, the Panel still reconsidered its decision based on the NAN and the COO's suggestions. However, for the reasons explained below, the Panel denies their request.

Reasons on Compensation Eligibility for Additional Caregivers

[31] The COO and the NAN made extensive suggestions on how this compensation process could potentially work to include an expanded category of caregivers. Many suggestions have merit, however, the approach proposed by the NAN and the COO significantly departs from the approach the Tribunal adopted in the Compensation Decision where it agreed with the Caring Society and the AFN that children should not be retraumatized by being forced to testify about their circumstances and the trauma of being removed from their homes. This approach is paramount and is reflected in the Compensation Decision.

[32] The Panel entirely agrees with the AFN's compelling submissions, summarized below, and believes those submissions are a full answer to the COO and the NAN's request on this issue. Moreover, the AFN's submissions convey the Panel's findings, goal and approach to compensation and reasons why it chose to adopt such an approach. The Panel's decision was carefully crafted to shield children from additional trauma and to account for the need to adopt a culturally safe and appropriate process.

[33] Moreover, unless the parties in this case agree in a settlement to create an adjudicative function outside the Tribunal, the Tribunal has no jurisdiction to order the creation of another tribunal to delegate its functions under the Canadian Human Rights Act, RSC 1985, c H-6 in order to adjudicate compensation arising out of its compensation orders. The AFN, the Caring Society and Canada reject this approach and the Panel agrees with them. This is consistent with the Panel's Compensation Decision.

[34] Furthermore, the AFN submits it is deeply concerned about the COO and the NAN's request to expand the definition of "caregiver" to other individuals. Both the COO and the NAN's proposals would greatly complicate the compensation process and give rise to competing claims of who was the rightful caregiver. The Panel believes this to be true.

[35] The AFN notes that this Panel's Compensation Decision Order was modeled after the Indian Residential Schools Settlement Agreement's Common Experience Payment. The trigger that would entitle an individual to compensation is the apprehension of a child or the denial or delay of a service under Jordan's Principle. There would be no reason for a person to justify any individual harm, nor would it require an individual to provide evidence to justify why they are entitled to compensation. This Panel opted to adopt a similar approach to the Common Experience Payment in determining eligibility for compensation to victims to avoid the burdensome and potentially harmful task of scaling the suffering per individual in remedies that are capped. A simple administrative process of verification is all that is required to make the payments as the government is in possession of the relevant documentation. Both the COO's and the NAN's recommendations would mark a significant departure from the Common Experience Payment model. Currently, one must demonstrate that they or their child/grandchild was apprehended/removed or impacted by the misapplication of Jordan's Principle. Upon verification they would be paid compensation.

However, both the COO and the NAN suggest that the compensation process now include an adjudicative function whereby a parent or grandparent must participate in contested proceedings along with the child's uncles, aunts, cousins or other relatives. Under this proposed process, the parent/grandparent may have to prove: (1) they were the relevant caregiver; (2) they were financially responsible or paid more to support the child; (3) they loved the child more than others; and (4) they maintained a parental role or bond. They may also be expected to obtain the child's written testimony that they believed their parents/grandparents were the primary caregivers. Again, the Panel believes this to be exact.

[36] The AFN submits that this proposed process is not in the best interests of the beneficiaries. This process will be traumatic for all involved, especially the child who might face pressure, coercion, bullying and stress in stating who stood in their life as the parental figure.

[37] Much like the COO and the NAN, the AFN agrees that every child is very important to the extended family. It is often recognized in First Nations that "it takes a community to raise a child". As such, every member of the child's family, the Chief and Council, educators, health professionals and others all owe a sacred duty to the child. Children are the most precious resource of a First Nations community.

[38] Building on the importance of family that both the COO and the NAN identify, the AFN acknowledges that other factors also play a significant role in how First Nations children are raised. For instance, this Panel has accepted evidence that housing shortages in First Nations communities exist. Typically, this results in more than two families living in a single housing unit. Often members of the same family would occupy such a residence. It therefore would not be unusual for a child to live with their parents, grandparents, uncles, aunts or older cousins. Strong family bonds are created in such a setting and a child may rely on more than one adult figure for things such as getting food to eat, seeking assistance in homework, etc.

[39] According to the AFN, despite the close kinship, the biological parents or grandparents of the child remain the most important figures in the child's life, followed by the child's siblings.

[40] Additionally, the AFN submits this Panel took notice of the widespread poverty many First Nations individuals suffer. Poverty related issues, systemic discrimination in the criminal justice system, and pursuit of economic opportunities can result in one or both parents leaving the community for a short period of time. During the brief period of a parent's absence, a grandparent or other family member may care for the child.

[41] Under the COO and the NAN's proposal, any of these adults living in the same dwelling as the child, and those who temporarily are looking after a child while their parents are away working or temporarily incarcerated would be able to contest an application for compensation filed by a parent. The AFN submits that the compensation plan has to be practical and very clear on who is eligible for compensation.

[42] Both the COO and the NAN assert that guidelines can be developed by the parties to address these types of competing claims. However, determining what types of caregiving was provided and the length of time associated therewith would require intrusive and in-depth investigation into potential beneficiary's history. It is clear that this form of compensation process would be ripe for abuse. There is the potential that people could be compensated whom the apprehended child may not even know or remember. In the circumstance of a child who was apprehended, this system raises the specter that individuals who cared for the child on and off for a few months could become entitled to compensation. In addition, situations may arise where a family member filed and obtained compensation prior to and without the knowledge of the parents or grandparents applying for compensation. The Panel agrees with the AFN's position.

[43] The AFN submits that both the COO and the NAN appear to focus on those individuals who were willing to assist in caregiving and/or contributing financially towards the care of a child as a determining element of compensation. The AFN submits that this may not be the best approach. The purpose of compensation is not meant to repay expenses or address the inconveniencing of family members. Rather, compensation is meant to compensate for the trauma of losing a family member who was apprehended as a result of Canada's discrimination.

[44] The AFN adds that when compensation is expanded to other caregivers, the compensation is no longer for the loss of a biological child or grandchild by apprehension or misapplication of Jordan's Principle. The nature and purpose of the compensation changes to that of compensating people for their time, expense and love for the child. The AFN submits that the purpose of the compensation awarded by the Panel is to compensate a biological parent or grandparent for the loss of their child to a system that targeted them because they were First Nations.

[45] The AFN submits the compensation scheme is meant to be objective, not subjective. To investigate the relationship between an adult and child removes the objective element and replaces it with an interrogatory process, which goes against AFN's strong position that children in care not be subjected to the same traumatic process as Residential School survivors in the Independent Assessment Process. The Panel finds this to be the correct interpretation of the approach taken by the Panel in the Compensation Decision.

[46] Additionally, the COO asserts that caregivers beyond parents and grandparents aligns more closely with the family structures and practices experienced in many First Nations communities.

[47] However, the AFN contends that the COO references Canadian case law and legislation to suggest principles such as physical care, presentation of a parent-like relationship, financial contributions and intention to treat a child like their own should be determinative in this assessment. Likewise, while the NAN asserts First Nations laws, practices and traditions should be the guiding factors in determining who may be a potential caregiver, the NAN also seeks to avail to Canadian jurisprudence and legislation to compel the Central Administrator to make a subjective consideration on who is the most appropriate caregiver. This would import an adjudicative function into the compensation process that would likely require the creation of an industry that employs third party adjudicators and lawyers.

[48] The AFN strongly disagrees with the suggestion that a child's perspective on who the appropriate caregiver is should be taken into account. The NAN does not propose a method on how the child's perspective will be recorded. The only viable mechanism to adduce this information would be to question current or former children in care or Jordan's Principle candidates about which caregiver, parent or grandparent they loved more, or who is more deserving of compensation. This approach would be traumatic as it effectively puts the relationship between a child and their family members on trial, which would certainly stress and potentially harm the emotional bonds between a child and their family members.

[49] Finally, the AFN does not support the COO's proposal on how to address Ontario's CYFSA and under-identification. The Ontario CYFSA was enacted in 2017. It replaced the former Ontario CFSA which was in place in Ontario from 1990-2017. The 1990 CFSA does not include an interpretation section which outlines the definition of "child in need of protection". Therefore, the COO's concerns would only capture children and youth beneficiaries from 2017 to 2020 and will not apply to the majority of beneficiaries in Ontario, much less the rest of Canada. The original taxonomy suggested by the Complainants and the Respondent would apply in almost all circumstances and cover those children impacted by the CYSFA. The Panel accepts this position.

[50] For those reasons, the Panel denies the COO and the NAN's request for additional orders to expand the category of caregivers in this compensation process.

VI. The NAN Request Relating to Remote First Nations Communities

Key Positions of the Parties

[51] The NAN provided a reply to the responding joint submissions filed on behalf of the Caring Society, the AFN, and Canada and to the additional submissions filed on behalf of the AFN and on behalf of Canada. The NAN's reply submissions address two novel issues raised in the joint submissions and additional submissions: (1) conflicting messages regarding the Framework's responsiveness to remote First Nations; and (2) Canada's suggestion that it would be procedurally unfair for this Tribunal to consider the NAN and the COO's submissions of May 1, 2020 regarding caregivers given that the round of submissions was closed on March 16, 2020.

[52] In sum, the NAN submits that the parties oppose the NAN's proposed modification to section 6.3 of the Draft Compensation Framework, a modification which would list considerations specific to remote First Nations, when determining resourcing requirements on the basis that such inclusion "risks excluding the unique needs of other First Nations communities." At the same time, the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada oppose affirmation of the unique needs of other First Nations through incorporation of a proposed guiding principle that would affirm that "the compensation process is intended to be responsive to the diversity (linguistic, historical, cultural, geographic) of beneficiaries and of First Nations." For the NAN, these are contradictory messages. In the context of proceedings in which substantive equality has been central, the NAN is surprised and confused by the opposition to the proposed guiding principle.

[53] The NAN argues that the concern regarding section 6.3 can be addressed by a simple drafting change indicating that the specific considerations listed by the NAN are not an exclusive or exhaustive list. The NAN provided the following copy of section 6.3, with the NAN's initial proposed modifications underlined, and the NAN's new proposed modification underlined and in bold:

> 6.3 First Nations will require adequate resources to provide support to beneficiaries. Canada will assist First Nations where requested by providing reasonable financial or other supports. In providing these support and determining what constitutes "reasonable financial or other supports" and what constitutes "sufficient resources" in section 6.2(b), consideration will be given to all relevant factors, including the particular needs and realities of remote First Nations with limited resources or infrastructure for providing support to beneficiaries, and who face increased costs in provision of services due to remoteness.

[54] The NAN contends that in its submission of May 6, 2020, the AFN opposes the NAN's position that the Compensation Framework needs to be implemented in a way that takes into account regional specificities. However, in the same submissions, the AFN states that "regional considerations are adequately incorporated into the Draft Compensation Framework."

[55] With respect to the NAN's submission, the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada submit the intention is not for "discussions to continue" on any substantive issues outlined in the Draft Compensation Framework, Draft Notice Plan and accompanying products prior to or after the final rulings. For greater clarity, the Complainants and the Respondent have not filed the Draft Compensation Framework, Draft Notice Plan and accompanying products subject to any right by the NAN to return before the Tribunal "should an issue of concern arise". It is the view of the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada that this was not the process envisioned by the Tribunal.

Reasons on the Proposed Modifications to Section 6.3

[56] The Panel is not privy to the Parties discussions on this Draft Compensation Framework and does not wish to rewrite the framework achieved by the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada in consultation with the Commission and the interested parties, the COO and the NAN. However, the Panel finds there is merit to the NAN's argument and finds the proposed amendments to section 6.3 above to be appropriate. This provision addresses resources to support beneficiaries financially or otherwise and while the Compensation Decision orders and process are Nation-wide support to beneficiaries should account for their specific needs including the particular needs and realities of remote First Nations. The Panel does not see why adding a precision such as this one poses a difficulty or risks excluding the unique needs of other First Nations communities. The Panel's substantive equality approach focuses on unique needs of First Nations including remote First Nations. Moreover, this reality has formed part of the Tribunal's findings since 2016.

[57] The Panel directs the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada to discuss this possible amendment further when they finalize the Draft Compensation Framework. If this poses a significant roadblock preventing the finalization of the Draft Compensation Framework, the parties should inform the Tribunal and provide sufficient information to assist the Panel in understanding the underlying issues. This is not an invitation for the interested parties to return to the Tribunal with other issues surrounding the Draft Compensation Framework given that the objective is to finalize it shortly. The Panel is satisfied that the interested parties were consulted, some of their suggestions were included, another one identified above was found acceptable by this Panel and the other suggestions put before the Tribunal have been answered in the negative by the other parties and the Panel accepts this outcome.

Reasons on Procedural Fairness in Considering the NAN and the COO's May 1, 2020 Submissions regarding Caregivers

[58] This being said, on the issue of procedural unfairness raised by Canada, the Panel's response mirrors what it has mentioned in previous rulings to reject Canada's unfairness argument:

> Moreover, the Federal Court of Canada in regards to remedies stated in Grover v. Canada (National Research Council) (1994), 24 CHRR D/390 (FC) at para. 40 [Grover], "[s]uch a task demands innovation and flexibility on the part of the Tribunal in fashioning effective remedies and the Act is structured so as to encourage this flexibility." (emphasis added) [emphasis in original]. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 39).

Additionally, this intricate task necessarily requires some back and forth between the Tribunal and the parties.

> In this case, it is very different as the Tribunal has heard the merits of the case extensively and made findings and orders. It retained jurisdiction given the complexity of the remedies and the immediate, mid-term and long-term relief remedies and the necessity to assess if remedies are effective and implemented. This necessarily requires some back and forth between the parties and the Tribunal unless all parties agree and propose consent orders to the Tribunal [emphasis added]. (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 47).

[59] In another ruling the Tribunal's referred to Grover and to the notion that it is an intricate task to fashion effective remedies to a complex dispute:

> Consistent with this approach, and as this Panel has previously stated, the aim in making an order under section 53 of the Act is to eliminate and prevent discrimination. On a principled and reasoned basis, in consideration of the particular circumstances of the case and the evidence presented, the Tribunal must ensure its remedial orders are effective in promoting the rights protected by the Act and meaningful in vindicating any loss suffered by the victim of discrimination. However, constructing effective and meaningful remedies to resolve a complex dispute, as is the situation in this case, is an intricate task and may require ongoing supervision (see 2016 CHRT 10 at paras. 13-15 and 36) [emphasis added]. (see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 29).

[60] Furthermore, after the Panel's questions to the COO and the NAN, the Panel allowed the parties to respond to the COO and the NAN's submissions. Finally, the Panel rejected the COO and the NAN's requests. Additionally, the other parties' replies to the COO and the NAN's supplemental submissions were instrumental in assisting the Panel in determining the issues. In light of the above, the Panel rejects the AGC's procedural unfairness argument.

VII. Definitions for Essential Service, Service Gap, Unreasonable Delay

[61] The remaining points on which the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada require the Tribunal's direction are the definitions of the terms "service gap", "unreasonable delay", and "essential service" for the purposes of eligibility for Jordan's Principle compensation. The parties submit these are important threshold terms in deciding the types of situations that qualify as a "worst-case scenario" for the purposes of receiving compensation as set out in the Tribunal's Compensation Decision order from September 6, 2019.

[62] In sum Canada submits the Tribunal has ordered compensation for Canada's failure to provide "essential services" to First Nations children. The word "essential" is thus a significant qualifier, and should be interpreted in a common-sense way. Canada proposes that it include those services considered necessary for the child's safety and security, while considering substantive equality, cultural appropriateness and best interests of the child. "Service gap" is a concept that the Tribunal has used to describe a failure to provide a necessary service for reasons such as incompatibility between government programs, or Canada's use of an unduly narrow definition of Jordan's Principle. The definition Canada proposes helps ensure that the "gap" was a circumstance that resulted in a serious need going unmet for discriminatory reasons. An "unreasonable delay" is one that could reasonably have had an adverse impact, there was no reasonable justification for the delay, and the delay was outside a normative standard.

[63] Canada argues that providing clear definitions to these terms will greatly facilitate the compensation process. The definitions will help identify First Nations children intended to be beneficiaries. The definitions should be succinct and clear, so as not to encourage unreasonable expectations of receiving compensation, and not to discourage those who may be eligible from applying.

[64] Each of these three definitions is discussed in turn below. The Panel carefully reviewed all of the parties and interested parties' submissions, however, in the interest of brevity not all views will be discussed here. Rather, the Panel will focus its summaries and reasons on the contentious areas surrounding the definitions.

A. Service Gap

[65] Canada's proposed definition is as follows:

> "Service gap" is a situation where a child requested a service that was not provided because of a dispute between jurisdictions or departments as to who should pay; would normally have been publicly funded for any child in Canada; was recommended by a professional with expertise directly related to the service; but the child did not receive the service due to the federal government's narrow definition of Jordan's Principle.

[66] Canada submits that the Tribunal's Merit Decision identified two types of service gap. One type of gap arises from the narrow definition of Jordan's Principle applied by Canada at certain points in the past. The second involves the lack of coordination among the various programs intended to address First Nations children's health. The Tribunal expressed the concept in the following paragraph:

> In the Panel's view, it is Health Canada's and AANDC's narrow interpretation of Jordan's Principle that results in there being no cases meeting the criteria for Jordan's Principle. This interpretation does not cover the extent to which jurisdictional gaps may occur in the provision of many federal services that support the health, safety and well-being of First Nations children and families. Such an approach defeats the purpose of Jordan's Principle and results in service gaps, delays and denials for First Nations children on reserve. Coordination amongst all federal departments and programs, especially AANDC and Health Canada programs, would help avoid these gaps in services to First Nations children in need (see Merit Decision at para. 381).

[67] According to Canada, the Compensation Decision itself also suggests that the reason for giving compensation for children experiencing service gaps in relation to Jordan's Principle was that the service gaps led to some children being placed “outside of their homes, families, and communities in order to receive those services.” (see Compensation Decision at para. 250). Placing these children outside their families, homes and communities could itself be seen as a harm.

[68] There is substantial agreement between the parties as to how service gaps arose under the application of Jordan’s Principle when Canada was applying an unduly narrow definition. Canada also agrees that where a child did not receive a service simply because the lack of co-ordination of programs meant no payment was permitted, compensation is appropriate.

[69] The essence of the dispute between the parties in relation to this definition concerns whether some necessary limitations should apply to ensure that there was indeed a gap. Canada proposes that the service in question must be one that was ordinarily provided to other children in Canada under certain conditions: such conditions could include the need to travel to certain locations, eligibility criteria including specific age brackets, limited frequency, and within certain income thresholds. This is less a limitation than inherent in the understanding of the word “gap”: the need to compensate arises because there was a gap between the services a First Nations child was receiving and the services other Non-First Nations children received.

[70] The second part of Canada’s definition is aimed at ensuring that the service in question was recommended by a professional with the relevant expertise to determine that the service is essential to meet the child’s needs. As Valerie Gideon described, it is sometimes the case in considering Jordan’s principle cases that a service request is supported by a recommendation from someone who does not have the required professional expertise. In these cases, the Department will offer support for the child to access the needed professional referral. Such situations should not be compensable, since they do not provide evidence either of a service gap or of unreasonable delay. They are just a necessary step to ensure that the approved service will meet the assessed need of the child.

[71] Finally, Canada submits it is important to note that many programs are not universally available across communities. This may cause differences in the availability of supports, products or services, but this a common practice among governments to respond to specific needs where they arise; it is not based on discriminatory treatment of specific children.

[72] Governments must prioritize resources and will do so based on varying criteria: unmet needs, conditions for success of the initiative, demonstration of results for future implementation in other communities. A proper understanding of the existence of a service "gap" must recognize that the availability of programs to First Nations children must be assessed against programs that are generally available to most other children.

[73] Canada adds that there are a number of ameliorative programs that consider the specific needs of children, such as the Non-Insured Health Benefits program, the Home and Community Care and Assisted Living programs on-reserve.

[74] Canada proposes a definition of "service gap" where (a) a child "requested" a service; (b) the service was not provided due to a dispute between jurisdictions or departments as to who should pay; (c) the service would normally be publicly funded for any child in Canada; and (d) was recommended by a professional with expertise directly related to the service.

[75] The AFN requests that this Panel reject the requirement that claimants must have made a request to Canada to receive a product or service. Canada's historical approach to Jordan's Principle and requests for products or services not normally funded under the First Nations Inuit Health Benefits Program would have dissuaded individuals from making a formal request. Put simply, if one knew their request would be declined or not even considered, why would one apply for the service at all? This Panel noted that Canada's narrow definition of Jordan's Principle resulted in not a single application being approved (see Merit Decision at para. 381).

[76] Secondly, the AFN submits that Canada's proposed definition could be viewed as regressive, particularly in situations where one level of government was required to provide a specific service or product for all other children. The present definition of Jordan's Principle now enables Canada to fund goods and services not normally provided to other Canadians, based on the principle of substantive equality. Finally, the requirement that the service be recommended by a professional with expertise directly related to the services is too narrow. A medical or other certified professional should be able to direct a treatment and their assessment should not be subject to the verification or agreement of a specialist in a particular field.

[77] The AFN adds that one must be cognizant to the fact that parents were desperately seeking services for their sick, disabled, or special needs child after the House of Commons adopted Motion 296 (Canada, Parliament, House of Commons Debates, 43rd Parl, 1st Sess, Vol 149, No 5 (December 11, 2019) at 279). In some cases, the First Nations government assisted, in other situations family members contributed or pooled funds.

[78] Unfortunately, there are examples where these vulnerable children did not receive the service they required. With respect to "service gaps", this Panel addressed "gaps" in its 2017 CHRT 14 ruling: The Decision found Canada's similarly narrow definition and approach to Jordan's Principle to have contributed to service gaps, delays and denials for First Nations children on reserve. Specifically, the evidence before the Panel in determining the Merit Decision indicated Health Canada and INAC's approach to Jordan's Principle focused mainly on "inter-governmental disputes in situations where a child has multiple disabilities requiring services from multiple service providers" (see Merit Decision at para. 380 and more generally paras. 350-382).

> Indeed, the Panel specifically highlighted gaps in services to children beyond those with multiples disabilities. For example, an INAC document referenced in the Decision, entitled INAC and Health Canada First Nation Programs: Gaps in Service Delivery to First Nation Children and Families in BC Region, indicates that these gaps non-exhaustively include mental health services, medical equipment, travel for medical appointments, food replacement, addictions services, dental services and medications (see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 47).

[79] The AFN submits the definition for "service gaps" should focus on an unmet medical or other need(s) of a First Nations child. This would cover a product or service a medical or other professional who is licensed or who has the necessary expertise has recommended, based on the best interests of the child. It should also give consideration to overcoming historic disadvantages and address substantive equality.

> “Service gap” is a situation where a child needed a service that
>
> • was necessary to ensure substantive equality in the provision of services, products and/or supports to the child;
>
> • was recommended by a professional with expertise directly related to the service need;
>
> but the child’s needs were not met due to the federal government’s discriminatory definition of and approach to Jordan’s Principle.
>
> For greater certainty, the discriminatory definitions and approach employed by the federal government demanded satisfaction of all the following criteria during the following time periods:
>
> a) Between December 12, 2007 and July 4, 2016
>
> • A child registered as an Indian per the Indian Act or eligible to be registered and resident on reserve;
>
> • Child with multiple disabilities requiring multiple service providers;
>
> • Limited to health and social services;
>
> • A jurisdictional dispute existed involving different levels of government (disputes between federal government departments and agencies were excluded);
>
> • The case must be confirmed to be a Jordan’s Principle case by both the federal and provincial Deputy Ministers; and
>
> • The service had to be consistent with normative standards
>
> b) Between July 5, 2016 and November 2, 2017
>
> • A child registered as an Indian per the Indian Act or eligible to be registered and resident on reserve (July 5, 2016 to September 14, 2016);
>
> • The child had a disability or critical short- term illness (July 5, 2016 to May 26, 2017);
> • The service was limited to health and social services (July 5, 2016 to May 26, 2017).

[81] The Caring Society strongly disagrees with three of the requirements that Canada would impose on the definition of a "service gap". Canada says that: (a) there must have been a "request" for a service; (b) there must have been a dispute between jurisdictions or departments as to who should pay; and (c) the service must have been normally publicly funded for any child in Canada.

[82] The Caring Society argues that these three requirements impose restrictions arising from aspects of Canada's approach to Jordan's Principle that the Tribunal has already ruled to be discriminatory. The Caring Society's position is that a "service gap" should be defined with reference to a child's confirmed needs at the time and in keeping with the principles of a child's best interests, substantive equality, and consideration of distinct circumstances. The Caring Society's proposition is that needs that were not met due to the discriminatory definition and implementation of Jordan's Principle ought not to be equated to a frivolous request that was never made.

[83] The Caring Society submits that as demonstrated by Canada's witnesses and the documents it filed before the Tribunal, Canada's discrimination shaped both its definition of Jordan's Principle and the approach to implementing it. In particular, Canada did not publicize Jordan's Principle, did not have an application process for Jordan's Principle, did not have a systematic process for documenting requests, and the few cases that managed to surface as "requests" never met Canada's requirements to be termed a Jordan's Principle case.

[84] Canada is relying on its "old mindset" to support its contention that compensation should only be awarded where an individual applied for a service or a product. As the record indicates, Canada's approach to Jordan's Principle until July 2016 ensured that First Nations children did not have a path to come forward with a service or product request when they had a need. Indeed, during the hearing on the merits, Canada's witness, Ms. Corinne Baggley (Senior Policy Manager at Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development responsible for Jordan's Principle between 2007-2014) provided important insight into how Canada's "old mindset" contributed to so few requests coming forward. Canada's approach was constructed in such a manner that the public knew little to nothing about Jordan's Principle. During her testimony, Ms. Baggley spoke directly to Canada's decision to not "publicize" Jordan's Principle:

> […] that wasn't within our mandate when we implemented Jordan's Principle to publicize the approach. We had a communications strategy in place that was more reactive, so we weren't really permitted to publicize, you know, the – where to bring Jordan's Principle cases to. (Examination-in-Chief of Ms. Corinne Baggley, May 1, 2014 (Steno Tran Transcript Vol 58) at p 32 line 8 to line 14.)

[85] The Caring Society submits that Ms. Baggley also confirmed that federally appointed focal points, on whom Canada relied to manage Jordan's Principle cases, were not identified to the public. In fact, when the AFN requested a list of focal points in 2009, it was only furnished three years later. This highlights a deep flaw in Canada's reliance on "requests" to identify compensable Jordan's Principle cases. It is entirely unclear why Canada would require a "request" to identify a compensable Jordan's Principle case when it specifically failed to establish any public mechanism for such requests to come forward.

[86] There was also no mechanism for requestors to apply for products or services under Jordan's Principle. Indeed, Ms. Baggley's evidence directly confirmed this point:

> Ms. Arsenault: Is it or was it possible to apply for Jordan's Principle funding?
>
> Ms. Baggley: No. It is -- as I explained earlier, it's not a program, so like the other programs we have across the federal family, there are no Terms and Conditions, there are no eligible beneficiaries, eligible recipients, eligible expenditures identified, it is very much a policy initiative and it is very much a process that is used to resolve cases. (See Examination-in-Chief of Ms. Corinne Baggley, April 30, 2014 (Transcript Vol 57) at p 128 line 13 to line 23).

[87] Furthermore, even if a request did come forward, focal points had no special training on how to handle Jordan's Principle cases, other than general periodic procedural discussions.

[88] However, Ms. Baggley's testimony also illuminated significant shortcomings in Canada's process for receiving and documenting those Jordan's Principle requests that did come forward despite the obstacles imposed by Canada.

[89] According to Ms. Baggley, First Nations were not involved in the formulation of Canada's definition of Jordan's Principle:

> Mr. Poulin: But there is no First Nation -- my understanding is there is no First Nation agreement on the definition that is used by the federal government.
> Ms. Baggley: Well, it's a federal definition, as I have explained, and we didn't go out seeking agreement with our definition, and we certainly do acknowledge in any documents that we develop through the agreements for example, if there are other definitions that the parties are working with, we do acknowledge and reference those. (See Cross-Examination of Ms. Corinne Baggley, May 1, 2014, (Steno Tran Transcript Vol 58) at p 11 line 13 to line 24).

[90] The Caring Society contends that it is important to acknowledge that Canada's definition shaped its approach to Jordan's Principle, including its system for receiving and documenting requests. The documentation that Canada did produce is sparse, is often region-specific, and restricted to children with disabilities. Taken together, the record before the Tribunal shows that Canada crafted a system that blocked service and product requests from coming forward, and now seeks to benefit from that system to reduce the scope of victims entitled to compensation for their pain and suffering resulting from this wilful and reckless discrimination.

[91] The result of Canada's proposed approach would limit compensation to those who received direct denials prior to 2016 as, even when cases came to Canada's attention, they employed an approach that failed to yield a single Jordan's Principle case prior to the Tribunal's 2016 decision. As the Tribunal noted in its May 2017 Ruling, "it was Health Canada's and INAC's narrow interpretation of Jordan's Principle that resulted in there being no cases meeting the criteria for Jordan's Principle" (see 2017 CHRT 14 at para 77, citing Merit Decision at paras. 379-382).

[92] In the same way that the Caring Society argued in its February 21, 2020 submissions that Canada ought not profit by denying beneficiaries compensation because they died waiting for Canada to end its discrimination, the Caring Society contends that Canada ought not profit by restricting compensation to persons who "requested" compensation when it was Canada's discrimination that directly suppressed such requests from coming forward in the first place.

[93] As such, the Caring Society's position is that a "request" is not required for a "service gap" to exist. Rather, the analysis should focus on the child's need(s) that arose during the period of Canada's discrimination. Such needs should be assessed based on the child's best interests, substantive equality and consideration of distinct circumstances – all guiding principles that the Tribunal has already made clear must apply in this case.

[94] Furthermore, the Caring Society argues the approach to Jordan's Principle ordered by the Tribunal focuses on the ability of First Nations children to access services and products that were required, and not those that were requested. This is logical as, until 2017, processes did not exist for requests to come forward. As noted above, the Tribunal found in May 2017 that "Canada's previous definition of Jordan's Principle led to families not coming forward with potential cases and urgent cases not being considered as Jordan's Principle cases. Canada admittedly had difficulties identifying applicable children" (2017 CHRT 14 at para. 112). In such circumstances, where the Tribunal has already reached an unchallenged conclusion that Canada's approach was so discriminatory that families did not know they could come forward, it defies logic to require a request to have been made in order to identify a service gap.

[95] The Caring Society's position is supported by contrasting "service gaps" to "denials" and "unreasonable delays". Unlike service gaps, denials and delays presume that requests have been made. Denials and delays have as their point of reference the request that was made for a service or product. In the case of a denial, a specific "ask" was refused. For delays, the "clock" on unreasonable delay begins running when the request was made. Requiring a "request" in order to identify a service gap would be entirely redundant, as all "requests" result in approvals, denials, or delays and would be covered by those terms, such that there would be no "definitional work" left for a service gap.

[96] Indeed, a gap is entirely different than a denial or a delay, as it references unmet needs that are not addressed by existing services. The Panel addressed "service gaps" most directly at paragraphs 381-382 of its Merit Decision:

> In the Panel's view, it is Health Canada's and AANDC's narrow interpretation of Jordan's Principle that results in there being no cases meeting the criteria for Jordan's Principle. This interpretation does not cover the extent to which > jurisdictional gaps may occur in the provision of many federal services that support the health, safety and well-being of First Nations children and families. Such an approach defeats the purpose of Jordan's Principle and results in service gaps, delays and denials for First Nations children on reserve. Coordination amongst all federal departments and programs, especially AANDC and Health Canada programs, would help avoid these gaps in services to First Nations children in need.

> More importantly, Jordan's Principle is meant to apply to all First Nations children. There are many other First Nations children without multiple disabilities who require services, including child and family services. Having to put a child in care in order to access those services, when those services are available to all other Canadians is one of the main reasons this Complaint was made (see Merit Decision at paras. 381-382, italics added).

[97] Even where a service request had been made, Canada would also require that the service "was not provided because of a dispute between jurisdictions or departments as to who should pay". Adding such a requirement flies in the face of the Tribunal's 2017 CHRT 14 decision, which held that "[w]hile Jordan's Principle can apply to jurisdictional disputes between governments (i.e., between federal, provincial or territorial governments) and to jurisdictional disputes between departments within the same government, a dispute amongst government departments or between governments is not a necessary requirement for the application of Jordan's Principle." (see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 135(1)(B)(v), see also 2017 CHRT 35 at para. 10).

[98] The Caring Society contends that it is evident even in Canada's own briefing materials produced following the Tribunal's Merit Decision that a dispute between governments should not be required in order for a service gap facing a First Nations child to constitute a "worst-case scenario" of discrimination.

[99] On February 11, 2016, sixteen days after the Merit Decision, Canada produced a document titled The Way Forward for the Federal Response to Jordan's Principle – Proposed Definitions. In this document, which the Tribunal found "relevant and reliable", (2017 CHRT 14 at para. 51). Canada acknowledged that "[t]he focus on a dispute does not account for potential gaps in services where no jurisdiction is providing the required services" (see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 50). The Tribunal agreed (see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 71).

[100] The Caring Society submits it is entirely unclear why Canada is attempting to reintroduce this definitional requirement more than four years after recognizing that disputes between or within governments do not account for service gaps. In essence, Canada is trying to get a “new decision” on previously adjudicated points that Canada lost and chose not to judicially review. This cannot be permitted.

[101] The NAN submits that in any process developed to process claims for Jordan’s Principle-related compensation, the NAN believes the following principles should apply in order to be responsive to the unique reality experienced by children and families in remote and isolated First Nations:

> a) Canada should not benefit from its discriminatory conduct;
>
> b) A claimant should not automatically be denied eligibility for being unable to demonstrate that a request for a service/support was made; and
> c) A claimant should not automatically be denied eligibility for being unable to establish that the service/support was, historically, recommended by a professional.

[102] Individuals involved in processing claims should be familiar with systemic gaps specific to the region in which the claimant lived.

[103] In many instances, however, the reality will be far-removed from the ideal because Canada’s discriminatory conduct, as found by this Tribunal, prevented or discouraged a referral and/or a request from being made in the first place. As a result, the process for determining eligibility must not require proof of a request for a service from Canada, nor proof of a recommendation or referral from a professional.

[104] The NAN’s concern about a requirement that an individual must establish historical proof of an assessment, referral and recommendation for a service or product to be eligible for compensation is this: the requirement will unfairly bar from compensation citizens of NAN First Nations who were never able to access assessment and identification services due to systemic barriers and gaps.

[105] While the proof of assessment, referral or recommendation for a service or product can help establish a successful claim, their absence should not automatically disentitle a claimant.

Reasons on the Definition of "Service Gap"

[106] The Panel agrees with the AFN and the Caring Society's positions, summarized above, and their characterisation of the Tribunal's past findings and approach to remedying discrimination by ensuring substantive equality. It is accurate to say that the Tribunal focuses on the ability of First Nations children to access services and products that were required, and not those that were requested. Moreover, a "service gap" should be defined with reference to a child's confirmed needs during the period of Canada's discrimination and such needs should be assessed based on the principles of a child's best interests, substantive equality, overcoming historic disadvantages and consideration of distinct circumstances. The AFN and the Caring Society are correct in affirming that those are all guiding principles that the Tribunal has already made clear apply in this case.

[107] Therefore, the Panel rejects the following parameters proposed by Canada that there must have been a "request" for a service; there must have been a dispute between jurisdictions or departments as to who should pay; and the service must have been normally publicly funded for any child in Canada.

[108] Also, the Panel relies on its unchallenged Merit Decision and subsequent rulings especially the Panel's orders on Jordan's Principle definition (see 2017 CHRT 14 and 35) and believes they provide an answer to the dispute over this definition.

[109] This definitional exercise should focus on what the Tribunal meant in its rulings when it referred to essential services, service gaps and unreasonable delay. This is done in reference to the Tribunal's findings and evidence in the record.

[110] In terms of parties bringing suggestions and new perspectives, this is more appropriately directed to the efficiency of the compensation process than to the definitional exercise.

[111] The Panel finds that Canada is bringing forward some arguments that were raised and addressed in the Merit Decision and previous rulings. For example, the arguments in the two paragraphs below were advanced at the hearing on the merits, considered and rejected after weighing the evidence as a whole.

[112] Canada already argued at the merits hearing and again advances in this matter that governments must prioritize resources and will do so based on varying criteria including unmet needs, conditions for success of the initiative, and demonstration of results for future implementation in other communities. A proper understanding of the existence of a "service gap" must recognize that the availability of programs for First Nations children must be assessed against programs that are generally available to most other children.

[113] Similarly, Canada adds that there are a number of ameliorative programs that consider the specific needs of children, such as the Non-Insured Health Benefits program, the Home and Community Care and Assisted Living programs on-reserve.

[114] The above arguments were advanced by Canada in the hearing on the merits where an exhaustive list of programs on reserves was filed in evidence and tested. Canada's arguments on programs addressing needs of First Nations children were rejected and discussed at length. The Panel already found that Canada was unable to measure comparability with provincial services offered to children.

[115] Without repeating all the previous reasons found in multiple rulings, a few examples are reproduced below:

> In another document dealing with AANDC's expenditures on Social Development Programs on reserves it states that, despite the federal government acting as a province in the provision of social development programs on reserve, federal policy for social programs has not kept pace with provincial proactive measures and thus perpetuates the cycle of dependency (see Annex, ex. 33 at pp. 1-2 [Explanations on Expenditures of Social Development Programs document]). The document describes AANDC's social programs as "…limited in scope and not designed to be as effective as they need to be to create positive social change or meet basic needs in some circumstances" (Explanations on Expenditures of Social Development Programs document at p. 2). It goes on to say that if its current social programs were administered by the provinces this would result in a significant increase in costs for AANDC (see Merit Decision at para. 267, italics added).

Correspondingly, a 2006 presentation regarding AANDC social programs on reserves, including the FNCFS Program, describes those programs as being remedial in focus, not always meeting provincial/territorial rates and standards, and not well-integrated across jurisdictions (see Annex, ex. 34 at p. 5 [Social Programs presentation] (see Merit Decision at para. 268, italics added).

The difficulties in performing this comparative analysis were also identified in a document entitled Comparability of Provincial and INAC Social Programs Funding, authored by AANDC employees and to be included in a Ministerial Briefing Binder (see Annex, ex. 44). The document explains that for a number of reasons, such as differences in the way social programs are delivered in the provinces in terms of types of services, the number of services and the allocation of funding, it is difficult to arrive at conclusive and comparable numbers (see Comparability of Provincial and INAC Social Programs Funding at p. 1). In addition, provincial data may not be directly comparable as it could include costs such as overhead or program costs not funded through the FNCFS Program (see Comparability of Provincial and INAC Social Programs Funding at p. 4). Where total expenditures per child in care are compared, there is some indication that AANDC funds child and family services at higher levels compared to some provinces. However, the Comparability of Provincial and INAC Social Programs Funding document, at page 4, notes that funding levels do not relate to the real needs of children and their families:

> this analysis is not able to recognize that disadvantaged groups may have higher levels of need for services (due to poverty, poor housing conditions, high levels of substance abuse, and exposure to family violence) or that the services or placement options they require may be at a substantially higher cost for services." (See Merit Decision at para. 336, underlining added).

MS CHAN: […] Can you tell, or is there a way for the Program to know if they are comparable in terms of the services that are being provided on-Reserve?

Because we are talking about different types of communities, different types of systems and different types of services that are being administered by different service delivery agents. So what I mean by this is, one First Nation community off-Reserve who looks exactly the same as an off-Reserve community isn't actually going to get the same services as that other community, they are going to get culturally specific services that that Agency deems appropriate for the children and families that they are serving.

> (Transcript Vol. 51 at p. 183) (see Merit Decision at, para. 337, italics added. See also paras. 463-464).

[116] The Panel is concerned by those submissions contesting systemic discrimination already found in the Merit Decision. The Compensation process is focused on harms to individuals caused by the systemic discrimination found in the Merit Decision.

[117] This being said, the Panel agrees there is merit in Canada's argument that a service should have been recommended by a professional with the relevant expertise to determine that the service is essential to meet the child's needs. This criterion is consistent with the amendments agreed to by the parties in this case and the Tribunal in 2017 CHRT 35 at. paragraph 135: "[…] Canada may only engage in clinical case conferencing with professionals with relevant competence and training before the recommended service is approved and funding is provided to the extent that such consultations are reasonably necessary to determine the requestor's clinical needs […]". This could bring objectivity and efficiency to the compensation process as beneficiaries can indicate the service that was recommended but not obtained. However, the Panel agrees in part with the AFN that a medical or other certified professional should be able to direct a treatment and their assessment should not be subject to the verification or agreement of a specialist in a particular field. This being said, the Panel believes exceptions should be made when the treatment also contains risks to the child that require a specialist to determine if the treatment's benefits outweigh the risks. Ultimately, the decision concerning the child will belong to the parent or guardian. Those situations are not the norm and should not be used as a criterion to exclude children. Rather, it accounts for some situations that may arise in the treatment of children. This flexibility should be reflected in the compensation process. Moreover, the Panel recognizes the systemic barriers encountered by many First Nations peoples in accessing services and agrees with the NAN that the absence of proof of assessment, referral or recommendation should not automatically disentitle a claimant. This flexibility should also be reflected in the parameters of the compensation process.

[118] The next step to require that a request was made is to be entirely rejected given the accurate interpretation of the Tribunal's findings made by the AFN and the Caring Society, mentioned above. As already mentioned, the Panel's past Merit Decision, rulings and findings are a full answer to this aspect of Canada's request.

[119] Moreover, the criteria that a jurisdictional dispute occurred is to be rejected as it would be less inclusive than what the Panel found in past unchallenged rulings and in the definition agreed to by the parties and the Tribunal in 2017 CHRT 35 at. paragraph 135: "[…] Canada's definition and application of Jordan's Principle shall be based on the following key principles […] While Jordan's Principle can apply to jurisdictional disputes between governments (i.e., between federal, provincial or territorial governments) and to jurisdictional disputes between departments within the same government, a dispute amongst government departments or between governments is not a necessary requirement for the application of Jordan's Principle.". The Panel has no intention to reopen this matter. The parties who successfully proved their case in this matter disagree and understandably view this as regressive, trying to reopen matters that were previously decided and not challenged. Consequently, this request is denied.

[120] Similarly, the Panel rejects Canada's requirement that the service must normally have been publicly funded for any child in Canada given the Panel's substantive equality findings and its orders accepted by Canada in 2017 CHRT 14 and in 2017 CHRT 35 at paragraph 135: "[…] When a government service, including a service assessment, is not necessarily available to all other children or is beyond the normative standard of care, the government department of first contact will still evaluate the individual needs of the child to determine if the requested service should be provided to ensure substantive equality in the provision of services to the child, to ensure culturally appropriate services to the child and/or to safeguard the best interests of the child […]".

B. Essential Service

Key Positions of the Parties

[121] Canada's proposed definition is as follows:

> "Essential service" is a support, product or service that was:
>
> > requested from the federal government;
> >
> > necessary for the safety and security of the child, the interruption of which would adversely impact the child's ability to thrive, the child's health, or the child's personal safety.
>
> In considering what is essential for each child the principles of substantive equality and the best interests of the child will be considered to ensure that the focus is on the individual child.

[122] Canada submits the term "essential service" appears nine times in the Compensation Decision, but is not specifically defined. However, in paragraph 226 of the Compensation Decision, the Tribunal gave considerable guidance as to its meaning:

> First Nations Children are denied essential services. The Tribunal heard extensive evidence that demonstrates that First Nations children were denied essential services after a significant and detrimental delay causing real harm to those children and their parents or grandparents caring for them. The Supreme Court of Canada discussed the objective component to dignity to mentally disabled people in the Public Curator case above mentioned and the Panel believes this principle is applicable to vulnerable children in determining their suffering of being denied essential services. Moreover, as demonstrated by examples above, some children and families have also experienced serious mental and physical pain as a result of delays in services.

[123] In considering Canada's proposed definition, the concepts of safety and security should be interpreted to capture situations in which the child's ability to thrive, health or personal safety would be compromised by failure to provide the support, product or service concerned. This approach encompasses the requirement that there be a prospect of real harm flowing from a failure to respond appropriately to a request for such support, service or product.

[124] The Tribunal's reference to "real harm" is a significant qualifier, one that accords with a common-sense understanding of what is truly "essential". Not all supports, products and services are equally necessary, and the failure to provide them, or the failure to provide them in a timely way, should not be compensable. Canada is not suggesting that the harm actually had to occur, since the child may have obtained a product or service by other means and avoided the harm. However, the potential harm for non-provision should have had to have been at least objectively foreseeable for compensation to be given.

[125] Canada submits the affidavit of Valerie Gideon includes as an exhibit a chart of the broad range of supports, products and services that have been provided under Jordan's Principle since the Tribunal set out its definition in 2017 CHRT 14 and 2017 CHRT 35. The chart demonstrates that Canada has not interpreted Jordan's Principle narrowly and has implemented child-centric decision-making. In particular, it has applied the principles of substantive equality and best interests of the child in a way that has resulted in the provision of hundreds of thousands of supports, products and services, as the Tribunal has approvingly noted (see Compensation Decision, at para. 222).

[126] But not every service on that chart is equally necessary. Ms. Gideon's affidavit also includes examples of services that the Caring Society definition of "essential services" would encompass, and demonstrates why an overly-expansive definition is unjustified.

[127] To be compensable, a product, support or service must accord with a reasonable interpretation of what is "essential". Canada's definition does that.

[128] Another difference between the parties is that Canada's definition requires that the child, or someone on the child's behalf, must have made a request. It need not be the case that the person applying used the term "Jordan's Principle," but they must have brought the service request to Canada's attention. While the Caring Society is correct that Canada did not make a significant effort to establish a simple mechanism for families or service providers to come forward with Jordan's Principle requests, Canada did provide a number of other mechanisms for families or service providers to reach out, including through the Non-Insured Health Benefits Program and other community-based programs, including navigators. Unless the definition includes the making of a request as a condition, the process risks becoming a search back in time for a service that might have been requested had the person chosen to do so. Canada cannot be accused of discrimination for failing to respond to requests that were never made. Compensation should not be provided in such cases.

[129] The AFN submits that First Nations children face unique challenges in accessing services, and Jordan's Principle is an essential mechanism for ensuring their human, constitutional, and treaty rights.

[130] The AFN argues that Canada is proposing a definition of “essential service” as a product or service that was (i) requested from the federal government; and (ii) is necessary for the safety and security of the child, the interruption of which would adversely impact the child’s ability to thrive, the child’s health, or the child’s personal safety.

[131] The AFN submits that Canada’s proposal is limited in scope. First, it would only cover those services requested from the federal government. This Panel has ruled that Jordan’s Principle is to apply to all jurisdictional disputes (see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 135).

[132] Secondly, the AFN argues that Canada’s definition means that services would have to be necessary and any interruption would adversely impact a child. This definition assumes that a child was able to secure a service and was already receiving treatment, and as a result, the operative element would focus on the interruption of existing services. Evidence was provided to this Panel illustrating that not all individuals were able to access services. The AFN would support a definition of “essential services” that is consistent with the finding of this Panel. In this Panel’s 2017 CHRT 14 decision, this Panel noted that Jordan’s Principle is designed to ensure substantive equality for First Nations children (see 2017 CHRT 14 at paras. 69-75).

[133] Building on international standards, the AFN recommends that the definition for “essential services” incorporate some recognized international principles. Under international human rights law, defining what an essential medical service or treatment is for a child must follow components of the right to health for children. These components have been drafted and agreed upon by the international community and provide that children are entitled “to the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health and to facilities for the treatment of illness and rehabilitation of health.” (United Nations’ Convention on the Rights of the Child, Can. T.S. 1992 No. 3, Article 24 [CRC]). This right is articulated in Article 24 of the CRC, which is a widely ratified international human rights instrument and consolidates all previous treaties on the rights of children. Further, international human rights law provides that the right to health for children has long been understood to be an “inclusive” right, which extends beyond protection from immediately identifiable infringements, such as limitations on access to health care or services, and includes the wide range of rights and freedoms that are determinate to children's health, such as the rights to non-discrimination and access to health-related education and information.

[134] Moreover, it is defined in international human rights law that the right to health, outlined in Article 12 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 993 U.N.T.S. 3 in General Comment 14 of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, includes the following core components:

> a) Availability: Refers to the need for a sufficient quantity of functioning public health and health care facilities, goods and services, as well as programmes for all.
> b) Accessibility: Requires that health facilities, goods, and services must be accessible to everyone. Accessibility has four overlapping dimensions:
>
> - non-discrimination
> - physical accessibility
> - economical accessibility (affordability)
> - information accessibility.
>
> c) Acceptability: Relates to respect for medical ethics, culturally appropriate, and sensitivity to gender. Acceptability requires that health facilities, goods, services and programmes are people-centred and cater to the specific needs of diverse population groups and in accordance with international standards of medical ethics for confidentiality and informed consent.
>
> d) Quality: Facilities, goods, and services must be scientifically and medically approved. Quality is a key component of Universal Health Coverage, and includes the experience as well as the perception of health care. Quality health services should be:
>
> - Safe – avoiding injuries to people for whom the care is intended;
> - Effective – providing evidence-based healthcare services to those who need them;
> - People-centred – providing care that responds to individual preferences, needs and values;
> - Timely – reducing waiting times and sometimes harmful delays.

> • Equitable – providing care that does not vary in quality on account of gender, ethnicity, geographic location, and socio-economic status;
>
> • Integrated – providing care that makes available the full range of health services throughout the life course;
> • Efficient – maximizing the benefit of available resources and avoiding waste.

[135] Lastly, the World Health Organization has provided its definition of quality of care as "the extent to which health care services provided to individuals and patient populations improve desired health outcomes. In order to achieve this, health care must be safe, effective, timely efficient, equitable and people-centred."[2] This is critical in how essential services within states are to operate and the degree of care needed for not only children, but all individuals in the state.

[136] The Caring Society suggests the following definition of "essential service" is appropriate:

> "Essential service" is a support, product or service that was:
>
> > • necessary to ensure substantive equality in the provision of services, products and/or supports to the child.
>
> In considering what is essential for each child, the focus will remain on the principles of substantive equality (taking into account historical disadvantage, geographic circumstances, and the need for culturally appropriate services, products and/or supports) and the best interests of the child.

[137] The Caring Society argues that Canada also proposes to narrow "essential services" to consider only the safety and security of children, or their "ability to thrive". The Caring Society views safety and security as part of a child's best interests, but not limited thereto.

[138] The Caring Society understands that Canada takes the position that the existence of a "request" having been made of the federal government is an important limitation that it would like to impose on compensation under the Tribunal's order. However, for the reasons outlined above in the Caring Society's submissions regarding "service gaps", this would not be appropriate due to Canada's discriminatory approach to Jordan's Principle having foreclosed those with need from coming forward.

[139] The Caring Society submits the notion of a "request" is inherent in situations where an essential service was "denied" (as denials can only follow requests) or "unreasonably delayed" (as, once again, delays can only be calculated with respect to the time of the request). Accordingly, any requirement for a "request" should be dealt within relation to the definition of a "service gap", such that the matter of a request need not be dealt with when defining the words "essential service". Services are essential, whether requested or not. Canada's definition of "essential service" also limits the eligible range of services, supports or products to those "necessary for the safety and security of the child, the interruption of which would adversely impact the child's ability to thrive, the child's health, or the child's personal safety."

[140] However, the Caring Society argues this definition appears to roll back Jordan's Principle to Canada's definition in place from July 5, 2016 to May 26, 2017, which focused on disabilities and critical needs for health and social supports. The Tribunal ruled that that definition was discriminatory in the 2017 CHRT 14 decision, confirmed with amendments approved by the Tribunal following the consent of the parties in 2017 CHRT 35. Canada discontinued its judicial review of the 2017 CHRT 14 decision on November 30, 2017.

[141] Moreover, Jordan's Principle is designed to ensure substantive equality to First Nations children. In keeping with the purpose of the CHRA, Jordan's Principle is a particular tool to provide First Nations children "an opportunity equal with other individuals to make for themselves the lives that they are able and wish to have and to have their needs accommodated, consistent with their duties and obligations as members of society, without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices" (CHRA, s. 2, explained in 2017 CHRT 14 at paras. 69-75).

[142] The Caring Society contends the Tribunal provided a very clear metric of the importance of substantive equality to this analysis in its Merit Decision. Speaking in the context of the FNCFS Program, the Tribunal said that Canada "is obliged to ensure that its involvement […] does not perpetuate the historical disadvantages endured by Aboriginal peoples. If AANDC's conduct widens the gap between First Nations and the rest of Canadian society rather than narrowing it, then it is discriminatory" (see Merit Decision at paras. 399-404).

[143] The Caring Society submits the metric of an "essential service" should be whether the service in question was necessary to ensure substantive equality in the provision of services, products and/or supports to the First Nations child. Effectively, wilful and reckless conduct that widened the gap between First Nations children and the rest of Canadian society and caused pain and suffering should be compensable whenever it occurred, and not only when it had an adverse impact on the health or safety of a First Nations child.

[144] Canada ought not be permitted to shield itself from compensation for its discriminatory conduct by recirculating arguments that the Tribunal has already rejected.

[145] The Commission submits it would be inappropriate to effectively penalize the claimant for not having approached Canada in this context. First Nations children and families in vulnerable circumstances should not be expected to have made hopeless service requests in order to take the benefit of human rights protections.

Reasons on the Definition of an "Essential Service"

[146] The Panel already provided reasons above rejecting Canada's proposal that the definition include the requirement that a request was made. This same reasoning applies here in denying this aspect of Canada's proposed requirement. The Panel agrees with the AFN, the Caring Society and the Commission's positions above. Given the discrimination findings in this case, it is not appropriate to require that a request was made for beneficiaries to be eligible for compensation under this Tribunal process.

[147] The Panel also agrees with the AFN and the Caring Society's positions on the definition of what is an "essential service" mentioned above. The Panel agrees that an "essential service" should be whether the service in question was necessary to ensure substantive equality in the provision of services, products and/or supports to the First Nations child. The Panel also agrees that a conduct that widened the gap between First Nations children and the rest of Canadian society and caused pain and suffering should be compensable whenever it occurred, and not only when it had an adverse impact on the health or safety of a First Nations child.

[148] Nevertheless, the Panel agrees with Canada that not all supports, products and services as currently approved by Canada since the Tribunal's rulings in 2017 CHRT 14 and 2017 CHRT 35 are equally necessary and lack thereof or delay cause harm to First Nations children. Therefore, some measure of reasonableness is acceptable. The examples provided in the Merit Decision and subsequent rulings and Compensation Decision refer to the clear examples of harm to children caused by Canada's discriminatory practices. However, as already explained in the Merit Decision and subsequent rulings, the adverse impacts experienced by First Nations children and their caregiving parents or grandparents as a result of Canada's discrimination amount to harm and the Panel opted for a compensation process that would avoid measuring the level of harm borne by each victim. However, some measure of reasonableness should be applied given that some examples recently brought forward by Canada may not be considered real harm by this Panel. The Panel is not privy to the parties' discussions and the full context surrounding those examples of services and is not in a position to make findings on an untested affidavit however, one example stands out. If a request for a laptop at school is made in July for the September start of the school year, Canada must make this determination within the prescribed timeframe despite the laptop not being required for two months (see Affidavit of Dr. Gideon of April 30, 2020, at para. 9). This is an example where it is difficult to see any harm to a child. A reasonableness analysis is particularly helpful in this case.

[149] The Panel also understands that Canada is bringing forward examples of supports, products and services that were approved by Canada after the Tribunal's rulings 2017 CHRT 14 and 2017 CHRT 35 showing the wide range of services to support this valid aspect of their argument.

[150] Moreover, the Panel agrees that Canada has not interpreted Jordan's Principle narrowly and has implemented child-centric decision-making and that it has applied the principles of substantive equality and best interests of the child in a way that has resulted in the provision of hundreds of thousands of supports, products and services after the Tribunal's 2017 CHRT 14 and 2017 CHRT 35 rulings. The Compensation period for Jordan's Principle ends on the day the Tribunal released its ruling in 2017 CHRT 35. All the evidence showing compliance is helpful to inform the reasonableness interpretation.

[151] The Panel agrees with Canada that to be compensable, a product, support or service must accord with a reasonable interpretation of what is "essential" and that the definition should foresee this and should be finalised by the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada. However, the Panel disagrees that Canada's definition does that in an effective way given it is too narrow for the reasons mentioned above. This reasonable interpretation of what is essential must be done through an adequate substantive equality lens. The Panel agrees with the AFN and the Caring Society's arguments on this point.

[152] Furthermore, Canada already made the argument as part of the hearing on the merits of this case that it provided a number of other mechanisms for families or service providers to reach out, including through the Non-Insured Health Benefits Program and other community-based programs, including navigators. This was part of their defense and cannot be reopened here. This was rejected by the Panel as it reviewed the arguments and evidence. The Panel found that this was insufficient to meet the real needs of First Nations children and their families. The Panel need not reiterate all its reasons detailed in its Merit Decision and many rulings to reject this argument. The Merit Decision and those earlier rulings provide a full answer on this point.

C. Unreasonable Delay

Key Positions of the Parties

[153] Canada's proposed definition is as follows:

> "Unreasonable delay" is informed by:
>
> > the nature of the product, support or service sought;
> >
> > the reason for the delay;
> >
> > the potential of delay to adversely impact the child's needs;
> > the normative ranges for providing the category or mode of support or services across Canada by provinces and territories.

> For greater certainty, where a child was in palliative care with a terminal illness, and a professional with relevant expertise recommended a service that was not provided through Jordan's Principle or another federal program, delay resulting from administrative procedures or jurisdictional dispute will be considered unreasonable.

[154] Canada argues that all Canadians understand that some amount of delay is endemic in our health care system. Few, however, would expect to receive compensation where they experienced some delay in getting the service. To be worthy of compensation, the delay must, in some objective sense, be unreasonable based on the harm (actualized or potential) experienced by the individual.

[155] Canada's definition would accept that if the reason for delay was jurisdictional wrangling over who should pay, the delay was unreasonable. That is a reality that First Nations children experienced that other Canadian children did not, or were much less likely to experience. Jordan's Principle is now in place to prevent these situations from occurring.

[156] As pointed out above, Canada submits the Tribunal was concerned in its Compensation Decision about the possibility of harm to children because of delay. Conversely, where there was no reasonable possibility of harm, that factor should weigh against the provision of compensation.

[157] The essence of the dispute between the parties under this definition is whether the Tribunal's judgment imposing 12- and 48-hour standards for the provision of services should be the touchstone for compensation. However, as the affidavit of Valerie Gideon sets out, those standards exceed the standards set by the federal government with respect to services to children and families, and those of provinces and territories.

[158] The fact that Canada is bound by the Tribunal's order to observe much higher standards is a mechanism to ensure the longstanding injustices experienced by First Nations children will cease. However, minor deviations from those high standards should not lead to compensation: it is simply not evidence of discrimination to fail to achieve standards that exceed those of other jurisdictions and experienced by other children.

[159] Instead, what Canada proposes is that the failure to achieve normative standards, that is, standards which other Canadian jurisdictions strive to achieve with respect to services to children, should be the benchmark against which the reasonableness of delay is assessed. On that standard, the evidence is that Canada is achieving such standards.

[160] The AFN recognizes the fears and helplessness parents and children encounter when waiting for a service or product to be provided, especially in cases of medical treatments or services that can improve the quality of life of an individual. It is all too tragic where a delay in accessing services results in permanent disability, long-term adverse health impacts, or even death.

[161] The AFN agrees with the Commission's suggestion that the definition of "unreasonable delay" should incorporate the Jordan's Principle service standards that were agreed to by all Parties. Urgent individual cases should generally be determined within 12 hours, and non-urgent individual cases within 48 hours. These timeframes should set the basis on which a common understanding should be built.

[162] Nevertheless, the AFN recognizes that not all delays past 12 hours in urgent cases or 48 hours in non-urgent cases will be unreasonable in every circumstance. However, claimants should not have to bear the onus of proving that a delay was unreasonable. That burden should rest solely on Canada. In these circumstances, Canada should be required to rebut the presumption of unreasonable delay by providing the Central Administrator with the particulars related to an individual's compensation application. The process for this rebuttal can be further explored in the ongoing discussions between Canada, the AFN and the Caring Society.

[163] The Caring Society proposes the following definition of "unreasonable delay":

> "Unreasonable delay" will be presumed where a request was not determined within 12 hours for an urgent case, or 48 hours for other cases. Canada may rebut the presumption of unreasonable delay in any given case with reference to the following list of contextual factors, none of which is exclusively determinative:
>
> • the nature of the product, support and/or service sought;
>
> • the reason for the delay;
> • the potential for the delay to adversely impact the child's needs;

> • whether the child's need was addressed by a different service, product and/or support of equal or greater quality, duration and quantity, otherwise provided in a reasonable time;
>
> • the normative standards for providing the support, product and/or services across Canada by provinces and territories, that were in force at the time of the child's need; and
>
> • the timelines established on November 2, 2017 by the CHRT[3] for Canada to determine requests under Jordan's Principle: 12 hours for urgent cases, 48 hours for other cases.
>
> As part of the Guide, the parties will agree on a process for Canada to provide the Central Administrator with information on the factors noted above in order to rebut the presumption.

[164] The Caring Society submits that in its Compensation Decision, the Tribunal recalled a case that embodies the tragic human consequences of Canada's unreasonable delay in providing services and products to children in need:

> In another case, a child with Batten Disease, a fatal inherited disorder of the nervous system, had to wait sixteen months to obtain a hospital bed that could incline 30 degrees in order to alleviate the respiratory distress that resulted from her condition (see Compensation Decision at para. 224).

[165] The Caring Society argues that the Tribunal found as a fact in its Merit Decision that delays were built into Canada's response to Jordan's Principle:

> The 2009 and 2013 Memorandums of Understanding have delays inherently built into them by including a review of policy and programs, case conferencing and approvals from the Assistant Deputy Minister, before interim funding is even provided. It should be noted that the case conferencing approach was what was used in Jordan's case, sadly, without success (see Merit Decision at para. 379).

[166] This conclusion was restated in the Tribunal's summary of its findings and orders made with respect to Jordan's Principle in its 2017 CHRT 14 decision:

> In the [Merit] Decision, this Panel found Canada's definition and implementation of Jordan's Principle to be narrow and inadequate, resulting in service gaps, delays and denials for First Nations children. Delays were inherently built into the process for dealing with potential Jordan's Principle cases (see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 5).

[3] See the decision of the CHRT in 2017 CHRT 35.

[167] The Tribunal found that these problems were not cured by the Merit Decision, as Canada's implementation of Jordan's Principle operated without timelines until sometime in February 2017:

> While Canada has provided detailed timelines for how it is addressing Jordan's Principle requests, the evidence shows these processes were newly created shortly after Ms. Buckland's cross-examination. There is no indication that these timelines existed prior to February 2017. Rather, the evidence suggests a built-in delay was part of the process, as there was no clarity around what the process actually way (see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 92).

[168] The Caring Society submits that Canada's system for considering Jordan's Principle cases was rife with built-in delays, claimants should not bear the onus of proving that their delay was unreasonable if it exceeded the 12- or 48-hour standards for evaluating and determining requests.

[169] However, the Caring Society recognizes that not all delays in excess of 12-hours in urgent cases or 48-hours in non-urgent cases will be unreasonable. As such, the Caring Society suggests that the factors outlined in its proposed definition afford Canada with a fair opportunity to rebut the presumption of unreasonable delay by providing the Central Administrator with particular details related to the child's case. Much like the other processes laid out in the Compensation Process Framework, this mechanism's operation will be spelled out in further discussions between Canada, the AFN and the Caring Society.

Reasons on the Definition of "Unreasonable Delay"

[170] Again, the Panel believes that the analysis of the term "unreasonable delay" should start by considering what the Tribunal meant by unreasonable delay.

[171] The Panel agrees that some delay in receiving services is acceptable in some circumstances. This is why the Panel used the words "unreasonable delay". The Panel believes that some reasonableness should form part of the analysis. The Panel agrees that minor deviations in some cases from those high standards ordered by the Tribunal and agreed to by all parties including Canada (see Consent order in 2017 CHRT 35) such as in the example outlined by Canada of providing a laptop to a child, mentioned above, should not lead to compensation. The opportunity for Canada to rebut the presumption of unreasonable delay by providing the Central Administrator with the particulars related to an individual's compensation application is an acceptable suggestion in this compensation process framework to avoid having claimants bear the onus of proving that a delay was unreasonable. That burden should rest solely on Canada.

[172] The question here is fully answered when looking at the reference period for compensation which is from December 12, 2007 to November 2, 2017. This period coincides with Canada's systemic discriminatory practices adversely impacting children. The Panel discussed examples in the Compensation Decision and previous rulings and the Merit Decision of harm caused by delays. Again, this was discussed at length in the unchallenged Merit Decision and subsequent rulings. While Canada argues it complies with normative provincial standards for service provision this is not what the Tribunal found occurred in this case up to November 2, 2017. The Caring Society and the AFN's examples referred to in the Tribunal's previous unchallenged Merit Decision and rulings, summarized above, indicate that those delays were unreasonable and caused harm to children. There is abundant evidence in this case of unreasonable delays causing harm to children. The recognition that Canada was abiding by the Panel's specific orders is reflected in the compensation period ending in November 2017.

[173] Advancing arguments and evidence now to challenge the Tribunal's previous systemic discrimination findings for the same reasons already mentioned in the service gaps section cannot be permitted. Current compliance to the Tribunal's orders is not the appropriate lens to assess compensation for past discrimination. The Panel rejects this approach.

[174] This being said, the Panel believes that making the argument for exceptions to the "high standards" must be possible to avoid situations such as the "laptop situation" referred to above. As mentioned above, the rebuttal of the presumption of unreasonable delay is an adequate option to account for those exceptional situations.

[175] For the above reasons, the Panel agrees with many aspects of the Caring Society and the AFN's proposed definitions and with some aspects proposed by Canada. The Panel generally agrees with the Caring Society's first three proposed general principles (see Annex 1). The Panel directs the parties to consider the Panel's reasons above mentioned and to adapt the three definitions to reflect the Panel's reasons in the finalization of the Draft Compensation Framework.

VIII. Retention of Jurisdiction

[176] The Panel retains jurisdiction until the process for compensation issue has been resolved by consent order or otherwise and will then revisit the need for further retention of jurisdiction on the issue of compensation. This does not affect the Panel's retention of jurisdiction on other issues in this case.

Annex 1: General Principles

1. For greater certainty, where a child was in palliative care with a terminal illness, and a professional with relevant expertise recommended a service, support and/or product to safeguard the child's best interests that was not provided through Jordan's Principle or another program, delay will be considered unreasonable.

2. Seeing as the principle of substantive equality involves consideration of a First Nations child's needs and circumstances in relation to cultural, linguistic, historical and geographic factors, Canada will provide the Central Administrator with access to the information in its possession regarding the historical and socio-economic circumstances of First Nations communities. The Central Administrator will make use of the information to inform the determination of what was an "essential service", a "service gap" or "unreasonable delay".

3. Individual claims are required in all cases, even where more than one child in a community faced similar unmet needs due to the lack of access to the same or similar essential services.

I. Context

[1] The Complainants, the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada (the Caring Society) and the Assembly of First Nations (the AFN) filed a human rights complaint alleging that the inequitable funding of child welfare services on First Nations reserves amounts to discrimination on the basis of race and national or ethnic origin, contrary to section 5 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, RCS 1985, c H-6 (the CHRA).

[2] In First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada), 2016 CHRT 2 (the Merit Decision), this Panel found the Complainants had substantiated their complaint that First Nations children and families living on reserve and in the Yukon are denied equal child and family services, and/or differentiated adversely in the provision of child and family services, pursuant to section 5 of the CHRA.

[3] In the Merit Decision, this Panel found Canada's definition and implementation of Jordan's Principle to be narrow and inadequate, resulting in service gaps, delays and denials for First Nations children. Delays were inherently built into the process for dealing with potential Jordan's Principle cases. Furthermore, Canada's approach to Jordan's Principle cases was aimed solely at inter-governmental disputes between the federal and provincial government in situations where a child had multiple disabilities, as opposed to all jurisdictional disputes (including between federal government departments) involving all First Nations children (not just those with multiple disabilities). As a result, Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada (AANDC), now Indigenous Services Canada (ISC), was ordered to immediately implement the full meaning and scope of Jordan's Principle (see the Merit Decision at paras. 379-382, 458 and 481).

[4] Three months following the Merit Decision, INAC and Health Canada indicated that they began discussions on the process for expanding the definition of Jordan's Principle, improving its implementation and identifying other partners who should be involved in this process. They anticipated it would take 12 months to engage First Nations, the provinces and territories in these discussions and develop options for changes to Jordan's Principle.

[5] In a subsequent ruling (2016 CHRT 10), this Panel specified that its order was to immediately implement the full meaning and scope of Jordan's Principle, not immediately start discussions to review the definition in the long-term. The Panel noted there was already a workable definition of Jordan's Principle, which was adopted by the House of Commons, and saw no reason why that definition could not be implemented immediately. INAC was ordered to immediately consider Jordan's Principle as including all jurisdictional disputes (including disputes between federal government departments) and involving all First Nations children (not only those children with multiple disabilities). The Panel further indicated that the government organization that is first contacted should pay for the service without the need for policy review or case conferencing before funding is provided (see 2016 CHRT 10 at paras. 30-34).

[6] Thereafter, INAC indicated that it took the following steps to implement the Panel's order:

- It corrected its interpretation of Jordan's Principle by eliminating the requirement that the First Nations child on reserve must have multiple disabilities that require multiple service providers;
- It corrected its interpretation of Jordan's Principle to apply to all jurisdictional disputes and now includes those between federal government departments;
- Services for any Jordan's Principle case will not be delayed due to case conferencing or policy review; and
- Working level committees comprised of Health Canada and INAC officials, Director Generals and Assistant Deputy Ministers will provide oversight and will guide the implementation of the new application of Jordan's Principle and provide for an appeals function.

[7] It also stated it would engage in discussions with First Nations, the provinces and the Yukon on a long-term strategy. Furthermore, INAC indicated it would provide an annual report on Jordan's Principle, including the number of cases tracked and the amount of funding spent to address specific cases. INAC also updated its website to reflect the changes above, including posting contact information for individuals encountering a Jordan's Principle case.

[8] While the Panel was pleased with these changes and investments in working towards enacting the full meaning and scope of Jordan's Principle, it still had some outstanding questions with respect to consultation and full implementation. In the 2016 CHRT 16 ruling, the Panel requested further information from INAC with respect to its consultations on Jordan's Principle and the process for dealing with Jordan's Principle cases. Further, INAC was ordered to provide all First Nations and First Nations Child and Family Services Agencies (FNCFS Agencies) with the names and contact information of the Jordan's Principle focal points in all regions.

[9] Finally, the Panel noted that INAC's new formulation of Jordan's Principle once again appeared to be more restrictive than formulated by the House of Commons. That is, INAC was restricting the application of the principle to "First Nations children on reserve" (as opposed to all First Nations children) and to First Nations children with "disabilities and those who present with a discrete, short-term issue for which there is a critical need for health and social supports." The Panel ordered INAC to immediately apply Jordan's Principle to all First Nations children, not only to those residing on reserve. In order for the Panel to assess the full impact of INAC's formulation of Jordan's Principle, it also ordered INAC to explain why it formulated its definition of the principle as only being applicable to First Nations children with "disabilities and those who present with a discrete, short-term issue for which there is a critical need for health and social supports" (see 2016 CHRT 16 at paras. 107-120).

[10] In May 2017, the Panel made additional findings in light of the new evidence before it and has partially reproduced some of them below for ease of reference:

> Accordingly, the Panel finds the evidence presented on this motion establishes that Canada's definition of Jordan's Principle does not fully address the findings in the [Merit] Decision and is not sufficiently responsive to the previous orders of this Panel. While Canada has indeed broadened its application of Jordan's Principle since the [Merit] Decision and removed some of the previous restrictions it had on the use of the principle, it nevertheless continues to narrow the application of the principle to certain First Nations children.
> (see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 67).
> Furthermore, the emphasis on the "normative standard of care" or "comparable" services in many of the iterations of Jordan's Principle above does not answer the findings in the Decision with respect to substantive equality and the need for culturally appropriate services (see [Merit] Decision at para. 465). The normative standard of care should be used to establish the minimal level of service only. To ensure substantive equality and the provision of culturally appropriate services, the needs of each individual child must be considered and evaluated, including taking into account any needs that stem from historical disadvantage and the lack of on-reserve and/or surrounding services (see [Merit] Decision at paras. 399-427),

(see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 69).

However, the normative standard may also fail to identify gaps in services to First Nations children, regardless of whether a particular service is offered to other Canadian children. As The Way Forward for the Federal Response to Jordan's Principle – Proposed Definitions document identifies above, under the "Considerations" for "Option One": "The focus on a dispute [over payment of services between or within governments] does not account for potential gaps in services where no jurisdiction is providing the required services."

(see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 71, addition to quotation in original).

This potential gap in services was highlighted in the Pictou Landing [Band Council v. Canada (Attorney General), 2013 FC 342] case and in the [Merit] Decision. Where a provincial policy excluded a severely handicapped First Nations teenager from receiving home care services simply because he lived on reserve, the Federal Court determined that Jordan's Principle existed precisely to address the situation (see Pictou Landing at paras. 96-97).

Furthermore, First Nations children may need additional services that other Canadians do not, as the Panel explained in the [Merit] Decision at paragraphs 421-422:

> [421] In her own recent comprehensive research assessing the health and wellbeing of First Nations people living on reserve, Dr. Bombay found that children of Residential School survivors reported greater adverse childhood experiences and greater traumas in adulthood, all of which appeared to contribute to greater depressive symptoms in Residential School offspring (see Annex, ex. 53 at p. 373; see also Transcript Vol. 40 at pp. 69, 71).
> [422] Dr. Bombay's evidence helps inform the child and family services needs of Aboriginal peoples. Generally, it reinforces the higher level of need for those services on-reserves. By focusing on bringing children into care, the FNCFS Program, corresponding funding formulas and other related provincial/territorial agreements perpetuate the damage done by Residential Schools rather than attempting to address past > harms. The history of Residential Schools and the intergenerational trauma it has caused is another reason - on top of some of the other underlying risk factors affecting Aboriginal children and families such as poverty and poor infrastructure - that exemplify the additional need of First Nations people to receive adequate child and family services, including least disruptive measures and, especially, services that are culturally appropriate.

[11] Also, in the 2017 CHRT 14 ruling the Panel made additional findings that are relevant to the questions before us as part of this ruling:

> Therefore, the fact that it is considered an "exception" to go beyond the normative standard of care is concerning given the findings in the [Merit] Decision, which findings Canada accepted and did not challenge. The discrimination found in the [Merit] Decision is in part caused by the way in which health and social programs, policies and funding formulas are designed and operate, and the lack of coordination amongst them. The aim of these programs, policies and funding should be to address the needs for First Nations children and families. There should be better coordination between federal government departments to ensure that they address those needs and do not result in adverse impacts or service delays and denials for First Nations. Over the past year, the Panel has given Canada much flexibility in terms of remedying the discrimination found in the [Merit] Decision. Reform was ordered. However, based on the evidence presented on this motion regarding Jordan's Principle, Canada seems to want to continue proffering similar policies and practices to those that were found to be discriminatory. Any new programs, policies, practices or funding implemented by Canada should be informed by previous shortfalls and should not simply be an expansion of previous practices that did not work and resulted in discrimination. They should be meaningful and effective in redressing and preventing discrimination.
> (see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 73, emphasis added).
> Canada's narrow interpretation of Jordan's Principle, coupled with a lack of coordination amongst its programs to First Nations children and families […] along with an emphasis on existing policies and avoiding the potential high costs of services, is not the approach that is required to remedy discrimination. Rather, decisions must be made in the best interest of the children. While the Ministers of Health and Indigenous Affairs have expressed their support for the best interest of children, the information emanating from Health Canada and INAC, as highlighted in this ruling, does not follow through on what the Ministers have expressed.

(see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 74).

Overall, the Panel finds that Canada is not in full compliance with the previous Jordan's Principle orders in this matter. It tailored its documentation, communications and resources to follow its broadened, but still overly narrow, definition and application of Jordan's Principle. Presenting a criterion-based definition, without mentioning that it is solely a focus, does not capture all First Nations children under Jordan's Principle. Furthermore, emphasizing the normative standard of care does not ensure substantive equality for First Nations children and families. This is especially problematic given the fact that Canada has admittedly encountered challenges in identifying children who meet the requirements of Jordan's Principle and in getting parents to come forward to identify children who have unmet needs (see Transcript of Cross-Examination of Ms. Buckland at p. 43, lines 1-8).

(see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 75).

[12] Further in the ruling, the Panel wrote:

Despite Jordan's Principle being an effective means by which to immediately address some of the shortcomings in the provision of child and family services to First Nations identified in the [Merit] Decision while a comprehensive reform is undertaken, Canada's approach to the principle risks perpetuating the discrimination and service gaps identified in the [Merit] Decision, especially with respect to allocating dedicated funds and resources to address some of these issues (see [Merit] Decision at para. 356)

(see 2017 CHRT 14, at para. 78).

Despite this, nearly one year since the April 2016 ruling and over a year since the [Merit] Decision, Canada continues to restrict the full meaning and intent of Jordan's Principle. The Panel finds Canada is not in full compliance with the previous Jordan's Principle orders in this matter. There is a need for further orders from this Panel, pursuant to section 53(2)(a) and (b) of the Act, to ensure the full meaning and scope of Jordan's Principle is implemented by Canada.

(see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 80).

The orders made in this ruling are to be read in conjunction with the findings above, along with the findings and orders in the [Merit] Decision and previous rulings (2016 CHRT 2, 2016 CHRT 10 and 2016 CHRT 16). Separating the orders from the reasoning leading to them will not assist in implementing the orders in an effective and meaningful way that ensures the essential needs of First Nations children are met and discrimination is eliminated.

(see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 133).

[13] Akin to what was said in 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 16, the above will also inform some of the reasons in this ruling.

[14] The Tribunal's May 26, 2017 order (2017 CHRT 14) required Canada to base its definition and application of Jordan's Principle on key principles, one of which was that Jordan's Principle is a child-first principle that applies equally to all First Nations children, whether resident on or off reserve.

[15] Canada challenged some aspects of the 2017 CHRT 14 ruling by way of a judicial review which was subsequently discontinued following a consent order from this Tribunal essentially amending, on the consent of the parties, some aspects of the orders pertaining to timelines and clinical case conferencing. No part of this judicial review questioned or challenged the Tribunal's order that Canada's definition and application of Jordan's Principle must apply equally to all First Nations children, whether resident on or off reserve.

[16] In 2017 CHRT 35, the Tribunal amended its orders to reflect some wording changes suggested by the parties. The Jordan's Principle definition ordered by the Panel and accepted by the parties is reproduced in bold below:

> B. As of the date of this ruling, Canada's definition and application of Jordan's Principle shall be based on the following key principles:
>
> > i. Jordan's Principle is a child-first principle that applies equally to all First Nations children, whether resident on or off reserve. It is not limited to First Nations children with disabilities, or those with discrete short-term issues creating critical needs for health and social supports or affecting their activities of daily living.
> >
> > ii. Jordan's Principle addresses the needs of First Nations children by ensuring there are no gaps in government services to them. It can address, for example, but is not limited to, gaps in such services as mental health, special education, dental, physical therapy, speech therapy, medical equipment and physiotherapy.
> >
> > iii. When a government service, including a service assessment, is available to all other children, the government department of first contact will pay for the service to a First Nations child, without engaging in administrative case conferencing, policy review, service navigation or any other similar administrative procedure before the recommended service is approved and funding is provided. Canada may only engage in clinical case conferencing with professionals with relevant competence and training before the recommended service is approved and funding is provided to the extent that such consultations are reasonably necessary to determine the requestor's clinical needs. Where professionals with relevant competence and training are already involved in a First Nations child's case, Canada will consult those professionals and will only involve other professionals to the extent that those professionals already involved cannot provide the necessary clinical information. Canada may also consult with the family, First Nation community or service providers to fund services within the timeframes specified in paragraphs 135(2)(A)(ii) and 135(2)(A)(ii.1) where the service is available, and will make every reasonable effort to ensure funding is provided as close to those timeframes where the service is not available. After the recommended service is approved and funding is provided, the government department of first contact can seek reimbursement from another department/government;

iv. When a government service, including a service assessment, is not necessarily available to all other children or is beyond the normative standard of care, the government department of first contact will still evaluate the individual needs of the child to determine if the requested service should be provided to ensure substantive equality in the provision of services to the child, to ensure culturally appropriate services to the child and/or to safeguard the best interests of the child. Where such services are to be provided, the government department of first contact will pay for the provision of the services to the First Nations child, without engaging in administrative case conferencing, policy review, service navigation or any other similar administrative procedure before the recommended service is approved and funding is provided. Clinical case conferencing may be undertaken only for the purpose described in paragraph 135(1)(B)(iii). Canada may also consult with the family, First Nation community or service providers to fund services within the timeframes specified in paragraphs 135(2)(A)(ii) and 135(2)(A)(ii.1) where the service is available, and will make every reasonable effort to ensure funding is provided as close to those timeframes where the service is not > available. After the recommended service is provided, the government department of first contact can seek reimbursement from another department/government.

>
> v. While Jordan's Principle can apply to jurisdictional disputes between governments (i.e., between federal, provincial or territorial governments) and to jurisdictional disputes between departments within the same government, a dispute amongst government departments or between governments is not a necessary requirement for the application of Jordan's Principle.
> C. Canada shall not use or distribute a definition of Jordan's Principle that in any way restricts or narrows the principles enunciated in order 1(b).

[17] The Panel found that while it is accurate to say the Tribunal did not provide a definition of a "First Nation child" in its orders, it is also true to say that none of the parties including Canada sought clarification on this point until this motion. To be fair, on this issue, the Panel believes that it should focus on ensuring its remedies are efficient and effective in light of the evidence before it and in the best interests of children more than on Canada's compliance (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 20).

[18] The parties have been discussing the issue outside the Tribunal process but have not yet reached a consensus on this issue. Therefore, the Caring Society requested adjudication of whether Canada's definition of "First Nations child" for the purposes of implementing Jordan's Principle complies with this Tribunal's orders.

[19] In an interim ruling, the Panel determined the issue of a "First Nations child" definition was best addressed by way of a full hearing. The Panel Chair requested the parties to make arguments on international law including the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (UNDRIP); the recent UN Human Rights Committee's McIvor [McIvor UNHRC] decision findings that sex discrimination continued in the Indian Act, RSC 1985, c I-5; Aboriginal law; human rights and substantive equality; constitutional law and other aspects, in order to allow the Panel to make an informed decision on the issue of the "First Nation child" definition following the upcoming hearing. Doing this analysis through a multi-faceted lens is paramount given the probable incompatibilities between the UNDRIP and the Indian Act (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 22).

[20] The Panel further wrote that:

> […] if the current version of the Indian Act discriminates and excludes segments of women and children, it is possible that but for the sex discrimination, the children excluded would be considered eligible to be registered under the Indian Act.
>

[21] It further wrote that:

> In those circumstances the child would be considered by Canada under Canada's Jordan's Principle eligibility for registration criteria for First Nations children who are not ordinarily resident on-reserve and, who do not have Indian Act status. While this should not be read as a final determination on Canada's current policy under Jordan's Principle, the Panel also wants to ensure to craft effective remedies that eliminate discrimination and prevent it from reoccurring. Needless to say, it cannot condone a different form of discrimination while it makes its orders for remedies. Hence, the need for a full and complete hearing on this issue where the above would be addressed by all parties.
>
>
> During the January 9, 2019 motion hearing, Panel Chair Marchildon expressed the Panel's desire to respect Indigenous Peoples' inherent rights of self-determination and self-governance including their right to determine citizenship in crafting all its remedies. Another important point is that the Panel not only recognizes these rights as inherent to Indigenous Peoples, they are also human rights of paramount importance. The Panel in its [Merit] Decision and subsequent rulings, has recognized the racist, oppressive and colonial practices exerted by Canada over Indigenous Peoples and entrenched in Canada's programs and systems (see for example 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 402). Therefore, it is mindful that any remedy ordered by the Panel must take this into account. In fact, in 2018 CHRT 4, the Panel crafted a creative and innovative order to ensure it provided effective immediate relief remedies to First Nations children while respecting the principles in the UNDRIP, the Nation-to-Nation relationship, the Indigenous rights of self-governance and the rights of Indigenous rights holders. It requested comments from the parties and no suggestions or comments were made by the parties on those specific orders. The Panel has always stressed the need to ensure the best interests of children are respected in its remedies and the need to eliminate discrimination and prevent it from reoccurring.
> (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 23).

This Panel continues to supervise Indigenous and Northern Affairs Canada, now Indigenous Services Canada's, implementation and actions in response to findings that First Nations children and families living on reserve and in the Yukon are denied equal child and family services, and/or are differentiated adversely in the provision of child and family services, pursuant to section 5 of the CHRA (see the [Merit] Decision).

(see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 24)

At the October 30-31, 2019 hearing (October hearing), Canada' witness, Dr. Valerie Gideon, Senior Assistant Deputy Minister of the First Nations and Inuit Health Branch at the Department of Indigenous Services Canada, admitted in her testimony that the Tribunal's May 2017 CHRT 14 ruling and orders on Jordan's Principle definition and publicity measures caused a large jump in cases for First Nations children. In fact, from July 2016 to March 2017 there were approximately 5,000 Jordan's Principle approved services. After the Panel's ruling, this number jumped to just under 77,000 Jordan's Principle approved services in 2017/2018. This number continues to increase. At the time of the October hearing, over 165 000 Jordan's Principle approved services have now been approved under Jordan's Principle as ordered by this Tribunal. This is confirmed by Dr. Gideon's testimony and it is not disputed by the Caring Society. Furthermore, it is also part of the new documentary evidence presented during the October hearing and now forms part of the Tribunal's evidentiary record. Those services were gaps in services that First Nations children would not have received but for the Jordan's Principle broad definition as ordered by the Panel. In response to Panel Chair Sophie Marchildon's questions, Dr. Gideon also testified that Jordan's Principle is not a program, it is considered a legal rule by Canada. This is also confirmed in a document attached as an exhibit to Dr. Gideon's affidavit. Dr. Gideon testified that she wrote this document (see Affidavit of Dr. Valerie Gideon, dated, May 24, 2018 at exhibit 4, at page 2). This document named, Jordan's Principle Implementation-Ontario Region, under the title, Our Commitment states as follows:

No sun-setting of Jordan's Principle

Jordan's Principle is a legal requirement not a program and thus there will be no sun-setting of Jordan's Principle […] There cannot be any break in Canada's response to the full implementation of Jordan's Principle. [Emphasis added]

(see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 25)

The Panel is delighted to hear that thousands of services have been approved since it issued its orders. It is now proven that this substantive equality remedy has generated significant change for First Nations children and is efficient and measurable. While there is still room for improvement, it also fosters hope.

> We would like to honor Jordan River Anderson and his family for their legacy. We also acknowledge the Caring Society, the AFN and the Canadian Human Rights Commission for bringing this issue before the Tribunal and the Caring Society, the AFN, the COO, the NAN, and the Canadian Human Rights Commission for their tireless efforts. We also honor the Truth and Reconciliation Commission for its findings and recommendations. Finally, the Panel recognizes that while there is more work to do to eliminate discrimination in the long term, Canada has made substantial efforts to provide services to First Nations children under Jordan's Principle especially since November 2017. Those efforts are made by people such as Dr. Gideon and the Jordan's Principle team and the Panel believes it is noteworthy. This is also recognized by the Caring Society in an April 17, 2018 letter filed in the evidence (see Dr. Valerie Gideon's affidavit, dated December 21st, 2018, at Exhibit A). This is not to convey the message that a colonial system which generated racial discrimination across the country is to be praised for starting to correct it. Rather, it is recognizing the decision-makers and the public servants' efforts to implement the Tribunal's rulings hence, truly impacting the lives of children.

[22] On February 21, 2019, the Tribunal issued an interim ruling on Jordan's Principle (see 2019 CHRT 7) and found:

> [85] Furthermore, the Panel believes it would be in the best interests of non-status off-reserve children to make a temporary order with parameters that would apply until the "First Nation child" definition has been resolved, so as to avoid situations like the one that occurred in S.J.'s case. Especially that it may take a few months before the issue is resolved.
>
> [86] Finally, the Panel notes that Canada's Registration requirements as per the Indian Act have a direct correlation with whom receives services under Jordan's Principle and therefore support the importance of a full hearing on this issue:
>
> The recognition of Indigenous identity is a complex question. In August 2015, Bill S-3 amended the Indian Act by creating seven new registration categories, in response to the decision in Descheneaux c. Canada rendered by the Superior Court of Quebec in August 2015. These provisions came into force in December 2017 and appropriately, Canada re-reviewed the requests submitted under Jordan's Principle for children who may have been impacted by the decision. (see affidavit of Dr. Valerie Gideon, dated December 21st, 2018, at para.15).
> Additional amendments to the definition under the Indian Act will be developed subsequent to a period of consultation with First Nations. When part B of Bill

S-3 becomes law, Jordan's Principle requests will be processed in compliance with whatever definition affecting eligibility emerges from that process (see affidavit of Dr. Valerie Gideon, dated December 21st, 2018, at para. 16).

[87] The Panel, in light of its findings and reasons, its approach to remedies and its previous orders in this case, above mentioned and, pursuant section 53 (2) a and b of the CHRA, orders that, pending the adjudication of the compliance with this Tribunal's orders and of Canada's definition of "First Nations child" for the purposes of implementing Jordan's Principle, and in order to ensure that the Tribunal's orders are effective, Canada shall provide First Nations children living off-reserve who have urgent and/or life-threatening needs, but do not have (and are not eligible for) Indian Act status, with the services required to meet those urgent and/or life-threatening service needs, pursuant to Jordan's Principle.

[88] This order will be informed by the following principles:

[89] This interim relief order applies to: 1. First Nations children without Indian Act status who live off-reserve but are recognized as members by their Nation, and 2. who have urgent and/or life-threatening needs. In evaluating urgent and/or life-threatening needs due consideration must be given to the seriousness of the child's condition and the evaluation of the child made by a physician, a health professional or other professionals involved in the child's assessment. Canada should ensure that the need to address gaps in services, the need to eliminate all forms of discrimination, the principle of substantive equality and human rights including Indigenous rights, the best interests of the child, the UNDRIP and the Convention on the Rights of the Child guide all decisions concerning First Nations children.

[90] The Panel is not deciding the issue of Jordan's Principle eligibility based on status versus non-status. This issue will be further explored at a full hearing on the merits of this issue.

[91] The Panel stresses the importance of the First Nations' self-determination and citizenship issues, and this interim relief order or any other orders is not intended to override or prejudice First Nations' rights.

[92] This interim relief order only applies until a full hearing on the issue of the definition of a "First Nation child" under Jordan's Principle and a final order is issued.

[23] The present ruling deals with the issue on its merits.

II. Position of the Parties

A. The Caring Society's Position

[24] The Caring Society argues that Canada is impermissibly narrowing the scope of "all First Nations children" in the context of Jordan's Principle, as set out in the Panel's Order in paragraph 135(1)(B)(i) of 2017 CHRT 14. In particular, the Caring Society contends that Canada's interpretation does not comply with the Order in paragraph 135(1)(c) of the same ruling that "Canada shall not use […] a definition of Jordan's Principle that in any way restricts or narrows the principles enunciated in order 1(B)."

[25] The Caring Society identifies three categories of First Nations children it indicates Canada has agreed are within the scope of the order:

A. A child, whether resident on or off reserve, with Indian Act status;

B. A child, whether resident on or off reserve, who is eligible for Indian Act status; and

C. A child, residing on or off reserve, covered under a First Nations self-government agreement or arrangement.

[26] The Caring Society presents three additional categories of First Nations children that it argues Canada is improperly excluding, and who are the focus of its submissions:

A. Children, residing on or off reserve whom a First Nations group, community or people recognizes as belonging to that group, community or people, in accordance with the customs or traditions of that First Nations group, community or people;

B. First Nations children, residing on or off reserve, who have lost their connection to their First Nations communities due to the operation of the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop, or discrimination within the FNCFS Program; and

C. First Nations children, residing on or off reserve, who do not have Indian Act status and who are not eligible for Indian Act status, but have a parent/guardian with, or who is eligible for, Indian Act status.

[27] The Caring Society does not seek to expand Jordan's Principle beyond the categories it identifies. In particular, it does not seek relief for individuals who self-identify as First Nations but lack one of the three objective markers, nor does it seek relief for Inuit and Métis children through this complaint.

[28] The Caring Society submits that the Tribunal's Orders have consistently referred to "all First Nations children" without any limitation based on Indian Act status or on-reserve residency. The Caring Society asserts that Indian Act status or residence on a reserve do not correspond with the discrimination in this case that is "on the basis of race and/or national or ethnic origin" (2016 CHRT 2 at paras 6, 23, 395-396, 459, and 473). The Caring Society contends that applying Jordan's Principle to all First Nations children is consistent with human rights principles that focus on the needs of the children. Failing to consider requests from First Nations children living off-reserve without Indian Act status introduces discrimination on the basis of reserve residency. The Caring Society suggests the focus should be on the best interests and individual needs of each First Nations child and that Indian Act status and on-reserve residency will not identify all First Nations children in need. The Caring Society notes that Jordan's Principle does not mean every child will be granted services. Rather, Jordan's Principle requires the individual needs of all First Nations children to be considered on the merits.

[29] The Caring Society asserts that Canada's definition of First Nations children does not acknowledge First Nations children recognized by a First Nation as belonging to the First Nation. The Caring Society highlighted the Panel Chair's remarks earlier in the case that children are at the heart of First Nations communities. The Caring Society claims that Canada's definition fails to recognize that "[c]ultural and ethnic labels do not lend themselves to neat boundaries" (Daniels v. Canada (Indian and Northern Affairs Development), 2016 SCC 12, at para 17 [Daniels]). In a Nation-to-Nation relationship, it is appropriate to recognize First Nations communities' views of First Nations identity. This is consistent with the position of the Chiefs-in-Assembly and self-determination principles underlying s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (UK), 1982, c 11. The Caring Society also invokes Canada's fiduciary duty to First Nations children as a reason Canada must provide Jordan's Principle services to First Nations children who are recognized by their community.

[30] The Caring Society suggests that Canada's criteria for Jordan's Principle eligibility exclude First Nations children who have lost their connection to their community due to the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop, or discrimination within the First Nation Child and Family Services Program. The Caring Society refers to Panel's finding in 2018 CHRT 4, at para. 452, that "[g]iven the recognition that a Nation is also formed by its population, the systematic removal of children from a Nation affects the Nation's very existence". The Caring Society argues that First Nations children face historical disadvantage regardless of Indian Act status or on-reserve residency. This broad disadvantage is recognized in other contexts such as the criminal justice system (see R. v. Gladue, [1999] 1 SCR 688; R. v. Ipeelee, 2012 SCC 13). Specifically, inter-generational trauma from cultural displacements creates particular disadvantages for First Nations children (see Daniels).

[31] The Caring Society submits that First Nations children with one parent with s. 6(2) Indian Act status and who are not eligible for Indian Act status themselves ought to benefit from Jordan's Principle.[1] Parents and guardians have significant responsibility for securing services for their children and their Indian Act status may cause obstacles in accessing services for their children. Treating two First Nations children differently based on whether their parent has s. 6(1) or s. 6(2) Indian Act status is discrimination on the basis of family status. The Caring Society advances that children who may gain status from the implementation of An Act to amend the Indian Act in response to the Superior Court of Quebec decision in Descheneaux c. Canada (Procureur général), S.C. 2017, c. 25 [Bill S-3] should not be required to wait until the implementation of the Act to receive services under Jordan's Principle.

[32] The Caring Society agrees with Amnesty International's submissions on Canada's international legal obligations.

[33] The Caring Society rejects Canada's argument that Jordan's Principle was not within the scope of the complaint. The Caring Society identifies references to Jordan's Principle in both its own Statement of Particulars and Canada's. Further, the Caring Society relies on Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44 for the assertion that in a case such as this, the Tribunal ought to take a "functional approach" to pleadings. Similarly, the Caring

[1] A child who has one parent with s. 6(1) Indian Act status and one parent without Indian Act status is entitled to s. 6(2) Indian Act status. On the other hand, a child who has one parent with s. 6(2) Indian Act status and one parent without Indian Act status is not eligible for Indian Act status.

Society rejects Canada's argument that the Tribunal's supervisory powers are limited to First Nations children and families ordinarily resident on reserve, noting that Canada did not judicially review the Tribunal's orders relating to Jordan's Principle.

B. The Assembly of First Nations' Position

[34] The AFN submits that Canada's interpretation of "all First Nations children" fails to appropriately consider First Nations jurisdiction over citizenship and self-government rights of First Nations to determine who should be viewed as a "First Nations child". The AFN advances that "all First Nations children" includes children who are recognized by their First Nation as being a member. The AFN highlights that First Nations children who have lost Indian Act status and a connection to their First Nations community through discriminatory practices such as the Indian Residential School System and the Sixties Scoop require specific consideration from this Panel. The AFN contends that the scope of this complaint does not include other off reserve non-status, Métis, or Inuit children.

[35] The AFN specifically requests an order that Jordan's Principle applies to the following groups:

A. A registered Status Indian;

B. A person entitled to be registered as a Status Indian;

C. Individuals who are recognized by their First Nation as a member; and

D. Individuals covered under a self-government agreement.

[36] The AFN takes no position on whether First Nations children who are not eligible for status but have a parent with s. 6(2) Indian Act status should be included in the scope of the order.

[37] The AFN maintains that the Indian Act does not recognize First Nations right to self-determination or Canada's commitment to reconciliation and a Nation-to-Nation relationship with First Nations. The AFN represents that Canada's use of the Indian Act to determine First Nation membership and to identify First Nations children is a continuation of colonial, oppressive and racist policies. Canada should transition responsibility for determining First Nations membership to First Nations. This is further supported by international and domestic law, including s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 and treaties with First Nations. In particular, many of the treaties grant all the descendants of the treaty signatories access to government services and restrictions based on Indian Act status breach those treaty provisions. The treaty relationships, especially the Numbered Treaties, are very important for many First Nations communities and individuals' identities. The treaties should be considered in the determination of a First Nations child.

[38] The AFN submits that both First Nations children who are recognized by their community and those entitled to Indian Act status should be included within a definition of First Nations child. Despite the Indian Act's flaws, including discrimination on the basis of sex such as found in McIvor (UNHRC), it is the only legislation available to determine registered status. For non-registered First Nations children residing off reserve, the AFN argues that a connection to a First Nation's community is required. The AFN argues that defining a "First Nations child" affects First Nations jurisdiction over citizenship even though the definition is in the context of a specific program.

[39] The AFN contends that the Honour of the Crown requires Canada to ensure full participation of First Nations in recognizing who is a First Nations child. Recognizing First Nations rights to determine their citizenship in this manner is consistent with the honourable dealing required from the Crown.

[40] The AFN argues that while the focus of Jordan's Principle eligibility has been on rights of the child and the best interests of the child, the communally held First Nations rights to self-determination and self-government are also affected. Further, the AFN is concerned that First Nations might face legal challenges from individuals a First Nation refuses to recognize as belonging to the community. The AFN is also concerned that broadening eligibility criteria will drain financial resources and deprive already recognized First Nations children of services. The AFN notes that First Nations that have self-government agreements often do not receive funding for First Nations members who do not have Indian Act status. The AFN contends that a child who does not have Indian Act status and resides off reserve would ordinarily have access to provincial or territorial services that a child with status living on reserve does not have access to. The AFN acknowledges that the Tribunal can order Canada to provide additional resources to maintain the availability of Jordan's Principle services for First Nations children already recognized as eligible.

[41] The AFN asserts that defining who is "First Nations" is difficult because the term describes over 63 organic political/cultural groups of people rather than a race from particular areas. First Nations are distinct peoples under customary international law, which creates unique questions of group identity in a human rights context. The definition of "First Nations" is also continuing to evolve as First Nations exercise their self-determination. Given this difficulty in defining a "First Nations child", any definition should not be imposed on First Nations using a top down approach but rather it should incorporate the viewpoints of First Nations communities.

[42] The AFN maintains that it would be inappropriate to adopt tests related to Indigenous identity developed in other circumstances. For example, it would not be appropriate to rely on the R. v. Powley, 2003 SCC 43 test for Métis identity or the R. v. Ipeelee, 2012 SCC 13 test for Aboriginal identity under the Criminal Code, RSC 1985 c. C-46.

[43] The AFN recognizes that Métis, Inuit or non-status Indigenous children may suffer discrimination on the basis of race, national or ethnic origin but argues that such discrimination should be addressed under a different complaint and evidentiary record. Most of the evidence in this complaint has been specific to First Nations with Indian Act status and First Nations children on reserve have been identified by the Panel as particularly vulnerable.

[44] The AFN proposes that a validation method similar to that in Part X of Ontario's Child and Family Services Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.11 for consulting with First Nations would be appropriate to determine whether an applicant under Jordan's Principle is a member of the First Nations community. The application ought to proceed under the presumption that there is a connection to the First Nations community. If the First Nations community responds denying the applicant's membership in the community, Canada ought to make a determination about whether the applicant is eligible. The AFN also identifies that entitlement to Indian Act status is currently changing and argues that this ongoing change should be considered by the Panel. Finally, the AFN submits that if First Nations are involved in the validation process, this method may alleviate concerns raised by the Chiefs of Ontario (COO) and the Nishnawbe Aski Nation (NAN).

C. The Chiefs of Ontario's Position

[45] The COO submissions sought to provide practical considerations for an order that "all First Nations children" includes children recognized by their First Nation as being a member. In particular, the COO seeks to assist in crafting an order that can be implemented without causing delays to children receiving Jordan's Principle services and which respects First Nations' jurisdiction over citizenship. In particular, the COO requests that no duty of care or other legal duty be placed on First Nations to confirm citizenship, that First Nations in no way be required to recognize individuals in a way that is inconsistent with their traditions, laws or customs, that First Nations not be required to undertake new processes or systems, that recognition by a First Nation that a child is a member can be done through email, letter, or phone, and that Canada should provide First Nations and relevant organisations funding to educate First Nations about the Tribunal's order and to develop capacity to recognize citizenship when Jordan's Principle requests are made.

[46] The COO takes no position on the Caring Society's requested relief for children who have lost contact with their First Nations group, community or peoples.

[47] The COO supports First Nations right to determine their own citizenship through their own laws, traditions and customs. Any practical challenges do not mean the COO endorses or accepts the Indian Act, nor does it seek to perpetuate the status quo in Jordan's Principle cases.

[48] The COO identifies barriers to First Nations exercising jurisdiction over citizenship from the imposition of the Indian Act, Canada's failure to provide resources for First Nations individuals recognized through custom membership codes, disruptions to citizenship laws through the Indian Residential Schools System, forced disenfranchisement, the Sixties Scoop, and the First Nations Child and Family Services program. Most First Nations do not have a custom membership code and those that do not do not necessarily have codified or agreed upon citizenship laws, customs or traditions.

[49] The COO asserts that any order regarding recognition of a child by a First Nation should be directed only at the mechanism of evidencing that recognition and not direct First Nations when or how to exercise jurisdiction over citizenship.

[50] The COO highlights that while First Nations should be given an opportunity to voice their perspective on a child's citizenship, First Nations will not necessarily have the capacity to respond. This is particularly true given the 12-48 hour Jordan's Principle timelines. The COO argues First Nations require funding to have the capacity to respond to Jordan's Principle membership questions and that First Nations should ideally be given an opportunity and capacity to develop their own citizenship or membership codes.

D. The Nishnawbe Aski Nation's Position

[51] The NAN supports the Caring Society's position. The NAN submits that Jordan's Principle must be implemented in a non-discriminatory manner that respects First Nations inherent jurisdiction over citizenship and does not impose administrative burdens or legal liability on First Nations. The NAN supports the Caring Society and Amnesty International's submissions, subject to concerns about the best interest of the child. The NAN supports the submissions of the COO regarding First Nations jurisdiction and capacity. The NAN supports the Caring Society and Commission's submissions that Jordan's Principle has always been part of the complaint.

[52] The NAN advances that it is discriminatory and contrary to First Nations self-determination to exclude First Nations children recognized by a First Nation from Jordan's Principle. For Canada to continue to use Indian Act status and on-reserve residency as criteria for Jordan's Principle eligibility is inconsistent with the UNDRIP, Canada's commitment to reconciliation, and human rights principles that prohibit discrimination on the grounds of race, national or ethnic origin, and reserve residency.

[53] The NAN highlights that any discussion of the "best interest of the child" must consider how the principle has been used to support harmful practices such as the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop, and the child welfare system.

E. The Congress of Aboriginal Peoples' Position

[54] The Congress of Aboriginal Peoples (CAP) generally supports the Caring Society's position. The CAP submits that, in order to promote substantive equality, the definition of "First Nations child" should be based on the Honour of the Crown and, consistent with the principles in Daniels v. Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development), 2016 SCC 12, ought to adopt inclusion over exclusion. The CAP requests that consultations be part of the remedy ordered.

[55] The CAP represents off-reserve status and non-status Indians, Métis, and Southern Inuit Indigenous Peoples. The CAP identifies various socio-economic disadvantages suffered by its members in Canadian society. The CAP identifies Canada's policies as a key reason many of its members lack connections to their Indigenous families and communities. The CAP advances that its members are particularly disadvantaged and ought to be included in a remedial process seeking substantive equality.

[56] The CAP contends that the Honour of the Crown is a constitutional principle that affects how the Crown must fulfil its obligations to Indigenous Peoples. The Honour of the Crown requires negotiation in good faith and must be liberally and generously construed.

[57] The CAP advances that Daniels requires an inclusive definition of First Nations child in order to be constitutionally sound.

F. The Canadian Human Rights Commission's Position

[58] The Commission does not take a position on the definition of a "First Nations child" motion, instead providing submissions on the Tribunal's jurisdiction and identifying substantive evidence the Commission believes is relevant to the Panel's decision.

[59] The Commission represents that Jordan's Principle has always been within the scope of the complaint, noting that complaints should not be read as pleadings. The Statements of Particulars did not limit the Jordan's Principle relief requested to individuals with Indian Act status or living on reserve. The Panel has already addressed the scope of Jordan's Principle, including that it applied both on and off reserve, which Canada should not now be entitled to challenge through a collateral attack.

[60] The Commission notes that there is uncertainty on whether Canada currently applies Jordan's Principle to First Nations children who do not have Indian Act status but are included in the membership code of a First Nation with a self-government agreement or self-government legislation. The Commission indicates that ISC staff have recently indicated these children are eligible while Canada's submissions on this motion appear to exclude this group.

[61] The Commission identifies concepts and sources of law that may relate to First Nations citizenship. Indian Act status is one recognition, although it has been found to be discriminatory. Custom membership codes, recognized under the Indian Act, may be more or less extensive than Indian Act status. First Nations with self-government agreements often have provisions to determine their membership. First Nations may have traditional laws with respect to citizenship. Section 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 and UNDRIP both recognize principles of self-determination.

[62] The Commission submits that there is a two-step framework, established in Battlefords and District Co-operative Ltd. v. Gibbs, [1996] 3 SCR 566, typically used to determine whether eligibility criteria for benefits are having a discriminatory impact. The first step is to determine the purpose of the benefit plan at issue. The second step is to determine whether the benefits criteria appropriately provide the benefit to individuals with the needs and circumstances the benefit program is intended to address.

[63] The Commission contends that previous decisions from the Panel have identified the purposes of Jordan's Principle as ensuring services to First Nations children are not delayed due to jurisdictional gaps and promoting substantive equality by providing services that may go beyond the normative standard of care and respond to the actual needs of First Nations children. The Commission argues the Panel ought to consider whether Canada's criteria are appropriate proxies for identifying the First Nations children with the sorts of needs identified by Jordan's Principle. The Commission is unable to identify evidence in the record that First Nations children living off reserve without Indian Act status face jurisdictional gaps in accessing services but the Panel should consider any evidence that these First Nations children have actual needs that go beyond the normative standard of care and are rooted in historical and contemporary disadvantage that underlies a substantive equality analysis. The Commission identifies passages from the Supreme Court of Canada in Daniels and Lovelace v. Ontario, 2000 SCC 37 on the circumstances of off reserve First Nations individuals who do not have Indian Act status.

[64] The Commission opposes including a limitation of liability or indemnity in the final order for First Nations asked to confirm whether a child seeking Jordan's Principle services is a member of the First Nation. The Commission submits an order negating future duties of care or liabilities or ordering Canada to indemnify First Nations is outside the scope of the Tribunal's statutory powers. The Commission argues that such a case can be appropriately addressed if and when it arises.

G. Amnesty International's Position

[65] Amnesty International submits that Canada's interpretation of a "First Nations child" is too narrow to comply with Canada's obligations under international human rights law. The presumption of conformity, per R. v. Hape, 2007 SCC 26, indicates that courts should favour an interpretation of domestic law that conforms with international law. Amnesty International asserts that the Convention on the Rights of the Child, Can. T.S. 1992 No. 3 and the UNDRIP are particularly applicable.

[66] Amnesty International advances that international law protects the right to culture and cultural identity, which would be infringed if Canada's definition of a First Nations child were imposed on First Nations communities. Amnesty International notes that international human rights organisations have declined to adopt a formal definition of "Indigenous Peoples" in light of the harm caused by externally imposed definitions of membership. The UNDRIP specifically identifies an obligation to maintain cultural connections for children living outside their communities.

[67] Amnesty International highlights that Indigenous Peoples right to self-determination is protected in international law such as UNDRIP. The right to self-determination includes Indigenous groups' right to determine their own membership in accordance with their customs and traditions.

[68] Amnesty International contends that the best interests of the child test applies here. The best interests of the child emphasizes eliminating barriers for children receiving services and obliges Canada not to create barriers limiting vulnerable children's ability to access services.

[69] Amnesty International argues that international law, including UNDRIP, requires states to take special measures to eradicate discrimination. That includes measures to redress actions that deprived Indigenous Peoples of their culture and identity. Special measures, aimed at ensuring substantive equality, must be applied in a non-discriminatory manner.

[70] Amnesty International asserts that budgetary considerations should not impact the scope of Canada's human rights obligations, as states must pursue rights fulfilment to the full extent of the nation's available resources.

H. Canada's Position

[71] Canada submits that the eligibility criteria it applies for Jordan's Principle are compliant with the Panel's orders and not only avoids jurisdictional disputes but provides substantive equality by funding services not provided to all other children. In particular, Canada argues that it complies with the orders by providing Jordan's Principle eligibility to:

A. Registered First Nations, living on or off reserve;

B. First Nations children who are entitled to be registered; and

C. Indigenous children, including non-status Indigenous children who are ordinarily resident on reserve.

[72] Canada advances that it is not appropriate to extend the scope of Jordan's Principle to cover the three categories of First Nations children requested by the Caring Society. Canada suggests that the lack of consensus between the parties reflects that the Caring Society seeks an order extending Jordan's Principle beyond the limits of the litigation as reflected in the complaint, the particulars and the evidence and beyond the Tribunal's jurisdiction. While Canada notes some agreement among the other parties to include First Nations children recognized by a First Nation as belonging to that group, community or people, Canada identifies that there is little agreement on how that recognition might occur. Canada represents that the Tribunal lacks the jurisdiction to require First Nations who are not part of this proceeding to participate in any process for recognizing Jordan's Principle applicants.

[73] Canada contends that it has expanded its definition of Jordan's Principle eligibility to remedy the funding gap identified by the Panel and complies with the direction to apply Jordan's Principle "equally to all First Nations children on and off reserve" (2017 CHRT 14, para. 135 1.B.i). Canada submits that "all First Nations children on and off reserve" must be understood in the context of the complaint and the evidence heard, which focused on children subject to Canada's funding regime rather than every child in Canada who identifies as First Nation. Canada asserts that coverage for children with Indian Act status living off reserve recognizes potential service gaps for children perceived by provinces to fall under federal jurisdiction. Coverage for Indigenous children living on reserve who do not have Indian Act status recognizes that most federal programs are residency based and that failing to cover these individuals could cause a gap in coverage. Canada argues that its Jordan's Principle eligibility criteria satisfy the two step test proposed by the Commission for determining if a benefits program is under-inclusive.

[74] Canada submits that the Caring Society's request to expand coverage to additional First Nations children is beyond the scope of the complaint and the evidence. The Jordan's Principle complaint was about how Canada's funding regime caused gaps in the provision of services to First Nations children and families on reserve. Canada advances that the Panel has identified that the complaint against Canada is in relation to funding child welfare programs on reserve, which constitute providing a service under section 5 of the CHRA. First Nations children without Indian Act status who reside off reserve do not receive a service from Canada as they fall exclusively under provincial jurisdiction. Canada argues that the initial complaint, the Statements of Particulars, and key sections of the Panel's reasons refer to First Nations children on reserve. Canada asserts that the Panel has not heard any evidence that First Nations children without Indian Act status who reside off reserve face the sorts of jurisdictional barriers or gaps in services that Jordan's Principle addresses. Canada maintains that the Panel has not been presented with any evidence about the services that First Nations children living off reserve receive from provincial or territorial government, nor that children living off reserve face jurisdictional gaps in accessing services. Regardless of the needs of those children, their needs fall outside the scope of this complaint. Canada asserts that the broad and complex issues of First Nations identity and self-determination should engage broader consultation beyond the scope of this complaint.

[75] Canada advances that its interpretation of Jordan's Principle is consistent with UNDRIP and other international human rights obligations as Canada ensures First Nations children subject to federal funding do not face discrimination. Canada suggests that McIvor (UNHRC) does not support a broader approach to defining a First Nations child for Jordan's Principle eligibility as the changes to Indian Act status will not increase the number of First Nations eligible for Indian Act status nor will it impact any individual's ability to pass on entitlement to Indian Act status to their children. Canada disagrees with Amnesty International's argument that international law broadens the definition of a First Nations child beyond the children at the centre of the complaint.

[76] Canada rejects the argument that it has a fiduciary duty to extend Jordan's Principle. Canada maintains that the Panel's earlier analysis of the fiduciary duty in 2016 CHRT 2 was limited to First Nations children and families receiving services on reserve. Canada notes that none of the three branches of the Elder Advocates of Alberta Society v. Alberta, 2011 SCC 24 are met for First Nations children without Indian Act status living off reserve. Canada does not exercise the required degree of control, discretion or power required to trigger a fiduciary relationship.

[77] Canada submits that the Honour of the Crown is not capable of assisting in the interpretation of a "First Nations child". While Canada acknowledges that the Honour of the Crown requires it to act honourably, the specific obligations that arise in the implementation of a constitutional duty to Indigenous Peoples, fiduciary duties to Indigenous Peoples or treaty making do not apply in this case.

[78] Canada's position is that Daniels does not assist in defining Jordan's Principle eligibility. Daniels determined that constitutional division of powers enables Canada to enact legislation with respect to Métis and Indigenous Peoples without Indian Act status but it does not require Canada to do so. The Daniels complainants sought a declaration to address Canada's failure to accept responsibility for Métis and Indigenous Peoples without Indian Act status which they argued deprived those groups of programs, benefits and treaty opportunities available to individuals with Indian Act status.

[79] Canada asserts that there is no basis to extend Jordan's Principle eligibility beyond the age of majority in the given province or territory. There was no evidence presented during the hearing about services for adults and increasing the age of entitlement has significant implications for other federal, provincial and territorial government programs that have not been canvased.

I. Post-Hearing Developments

[80] Since the Panel held the hearing on this issue and issued an interim ruling, the Caring Society advised the Tribunal of a development in the factual background to the Caring Society's motion regarding the exclusion of First Nations children living off-reserve who do not have, and are not eligible for, registration under the Indian Act from Canada's definition of "First Nations children" under Jordan's Principle.

[81] As was canvassed during the May 9, 2018 cross-examination of Mr. Sony Perron, Bill S-3 did not fully come into force on Royal Assent. The coming into force of sections 2.1, 3.1, 3.2, and 10.1 were delayed to a date to be fixed by the Governor in Council.

[82] The Caring Society advised the Tribunal that the remaining sections of Bill S-3 came into force on August 15, 2019, pursuant to Order-in-Council P.C. 2019-116. The Order-in-Council was also filed with the Tribunal by the Caring Society. ISC has advised the Caring Society that it does not have projections for the number of individuals impacted by the coming into force of these provisions as the range of data and assumptions that would have to be made do not allow for accurate estimations.

[83] The Panel enquired with Canada and the other parties to determine if they desired to provide additional submissions on this specific question. Canada and the other parties indicated they had no further submissions to make on this question.

III. General Considerations in Jordan's Principle Eligibility

A. Considerations only apply for the purpose of Jordan's Principle

[84] The Panel has recognized in its interim ruling that there is a "significant difference" between determining who is a "First Nation child" as a citizen of a First Nation and determining who is a "First Nation child" entitled to receive services under Jordan's Principle and what is the appropriate eligibility criteria to use in the latter case (see 2019 CHRT 11 at para. 49). The present ruling puts the question of eligibility criteria to receive Jordan's Principle services before the Tribunal, but not citizenship, which is the prerogative of First Nations not the Tribunal or Canada. Nevertheless, some First Nations parties are concerned and strongly view the two questions as intertwined. Therefore, the Panel will address their concerns as part of this ruling as it will be further explained below.

[85] The Panel has already mentioned it recognizes the First Nations human rights and inherent rights to self-determination and to self-governance and the importance of upholding those rights. (see 2019 CHRT 7 at paras. 23, 89 and 91).

[86] Moreover,

> [d]uring the January 9, 2019 motion hearing, Panel Chair Marchildon, expressed the Panel's desire to respect Indigenous Peoples' inherent rights of self-determination and self-governance including their right to determine citizenship in crafting all its remedies. Another important point is that the Panel not only respects that these rights are inherent to Indigenous Peoples, the Panel also finds they are also human rights of paramount importance. The Panel in its [Merit] Decision and subsequent rulings, has recognized the racist, oppressive and colonial practices exerted by Canada over Indigenous Peoples and entrenched in Canada's programs and systems (see for example 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 402). Therefore, it is mindful that any remedy ordered by the Panel must take this into account. In fact, in 2018 CHRT 4, the Panel crafted a creative and innovative order to ensure it provided effective immediate relief remedies to First Nations children while respecting the principles in the UNDRIP, the Nation-to-Nation relationship, the Indigenous > rights of self-governance and the rights of Indigenous rights holders. It requested comments from the parties and no suggestions or comments were made by the parties on those specific orders. The Panel has always stressed the need to ensure the best interests of children is respected in its remedies and the need to eliminate discrimination and prevent it from reoccurring.

> (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 23, emphasis omitted).

[87] Additionally, in the interim ruling, the Panel stressed "the importance of the First Nations' self-determination and citizenship issues", and added that "the interim relief order or any other orders is not intended to override or prejudice First Nations' rights" (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 91, emphasis omitted).

B. Jordan's Principle's objective and context for eligibility

[88] The purpose of this ruling is not to change in any way the Tribunal's definition ordered in 2017 CHRT 14 and 35 nor is it intended to revisit previous findings leading to those rulings. Rather this ruling, relying on previous orders, aims to further clarify who is eligible to receive services under Jordan's Principle as per the Tribunal's orders and to determine who should define, and how to define, who is a First Nations child for the purpose of Jordan's Principle.

[89] Jordan's Principle is a human rights principle grounded in substantive equality. The criterion included in the Tribunal's definition in 2017 CHRT 14 of providing services "above normative standard" furthers substantive equality for First Nations children in focusing on their specific needs which includes accounting for intergenerational trauma and other important considerations resulting from the discrimination found in the Merit Decision and other disadvantages such as historical disadvantage they may face. The definition and orders account for First Nations' specific needs and unique circumstances. Jordan's Principle is meant to meet Canada's positive domestic and international obligations towards First Nations children under the CHRA, the Charter, the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the UNDRIP to name a few. Moreover, the Panel relying on the evidentiary record found that it is the most expeditious mechanism currently in place to start eliminating discrimination found in this case and experienced by First Nations children while the National Program is being reformed. Moreover, this especially given its substantive equality objective which also accounts for intersectionality aspects of the discrimination in all government services affecting First Nations children and families. Substantive equality is both a right and a remedy in this case: a right that is owed to First Nations children as a constant and a sustainable remedy to address the discrimination and prevent its reoccurrence. This falls well within the scope of this claim.

[90] The Panel's rulings referred to government services affecting First Nations children including: Federal-Provincial; Federal-Federal; and Federal-Territorial. While the Panel has no jurisdiction over Provinces and Territories, it does have jurisdiction over Canada's Jordan's Principle involvement in all Federal services offered to First Nations children.

[91] Additionally, Jordan's Principle is a broader aspect of the complaint in front of the Tribunal where the Panel found, in the Merit Decision, that while Jordan's Principle is not a strict child welfare concept, it is intertwined with child welfare (see Merit Decision at para. 362). Therefore, the Panel's general reasoning on child welfare is also relevant to Jordan's Principle cases. However, it does not provide the full answer. For Jordan's Principle, the Panel issued additional rulings and orders that form part of the analysis.

[92] Furthermore, as already found by this Panel, Jordan's Principle is a separate issue in this claim. It is not limited to the child welfare program; it is meant to address all inequalities and gaps in the federal programs destined to First Nations children and families and to provide navigation to access these services, which were found in previous decisions to be uncoordinated and to cause adverse impacts on First Nations children and families (see 2016 CHRT 2, 2017 CHRT 14 and 2018 CHRT 4).

[93] Moreover,

> [t]he discrimination found in the [Merit] Decision is in part caused by the way in which health and social programs, policies and funding formulas are designed and operate, and the lack of coordination amongst them. The aim of these programs, policies and funding should be to address the needs for First Nations children and families,
>
> (2017 CHRT 14 at para. 73).

[94] There is a need to take a closer look at the differences between the FNCFS Program and Jordan's Principle which is not a Program rather it is a legal rule and mechanism meant to enable First Nations children to receive culturally appropriate and safe services and overcome barriers that often arise out of jurisdictional disputes within Canada's own organization of Federal Programs and within Canada's constitutional framework including the division of powers.

[95] Additionally, while the existence of a jurisdictional dispute is not required to obtain Jordan's Principle services, the occurrence of a jurisdictional dispute was recognized and included since Motion 296 (Canada, Parliament, House of Commons Debates, 43rd Parl, 1st Sess, Vol 149, No 5 (December 11, 2019) at 279) and in the Panel's previous rulings. This also includes disputes between the Federal government and Provinces/Territories.

[96] Moreover, the Panel agrees with Canada that the evidentiary record and findings focus on Federally funded programs, the lack of coordination and gaps within Federal Programs offered to First Nations children and families and that this is also one important aspect of the service analysis under section 5 of the CHRA that Canada was ordered to remedy.

[97] Additionally, the Tribunal's Jordan's Principle findings also focus on the lack of surrounding services for First Nations children triggering their parents/caregivers or FNCFS agencies to seek services off-reserves. The Panel found a correlation between the Federal Programs' failure to address gaps in services to on-reserve children and the underfunding of the FNCFS Program driving First Nations children in care or to receive services often off-reserve. The on-reserves-off-reserves jurisdictional wrangling was considered by the Panel to arrive at its findings. For example, as part of the evidentiary record, mental health services gaps for First Nations children placed in care off-reserves was considered. Health Canada provided short-term funding for mental health crisis and the Province of British Columbia provided limited mental health funding for ongoing needs of First Nations children in care. This is a clear Jordan's Principle example where the Province should provide the service and then recover the funds from the Federal Government. This situation occurred off-reserve in the Provincial system.

[98] The same document also refers to first-hand provincial scenarios in the BC region and to different definitions of on-reserve/off-reserve residency in relation to gaps in service delivery (see Gaps in Service Delivery to First Nation Children and Families in BC Region at pp. 2-3; see also Merit Decision at para. 372).

[99] Jordan's Principle is about ensuring First Nations children receive the services they need when they need them. Jordan's Principle is available to all First Nations children in Canada. Jordan's Principle, as previously ordered by the Panel, applies to all public services, including services that are beyond the normative standard of care to ensure substantive equality, culturally appropriate services, and to safeguard the best interests of the child. In other words, services above the normative provincial and territorial standards account for substantive equality for First Nations children as a result of the entire discrimination found in this case and further clarified in the Panel's rulings especially 2017 CHRT 14 and 35. Those orders bind Canada on or off-reserves. Moreover, Jordan's Principle provides payment for needed services by the government or department that first receives the request and recovers the funds later. A strict division of powers analysis perpetuates discrimination for First Nations children and is the harm Jordan's Principle aims to remedy.

[100] The focus is on the child and is personalized to the child's specific needs to receive adequate services in a timely fashion without being impacted by jurisdictional disputes or other considerations not in line with what the child requires. First Nations children experience those barriers because of race, national or ethnic origin. This is what causes governments and departments to dispute who pays for the service.

[101] This requires a case-by-case approach considering for example whether a Province or Territory considers a First Nations child a Federal responsibility solely based on Indian Act status or whether it considers broader criteria to avoid providing services or to claim repayment from the Federal government. A Jordan's Principle case analysis of this situation would likely reveal this so as to demonstrate if the criteria used by the Province/Territory and the Federal government generate gaps in services.

> In determining whether there has been discrimination in a substantive sense, the analysis must also be undertaken in a purposive manner "…taking into account the full social, political and legal context of the claim" (see Law v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1999] 1 SCR 497 at para. 30). For Aboriginal peoples in Canada, this context includes a legacy of > stereotyping and prejudice through colonialism, displacement and residential schools (see R. v. Turpin, [1989] 1 SCR 1296 at p. 1332; Corbiere v. Canada (Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs), [1999] 2 SCR 203 at para. 66; Lovelace v. Ontario, [2000] 1 SCR 950 at para. 69; R. v. Kapp, [2008] 2 S.C.R. 483 at para. 59; and, R. v. Ipeelee, [2012] 1 S.C.R. 433 at para. 60).

>
> (Merit Decision at para. 402, emphasis added).

C. Use of the term "All First Nations children" by the Panel

[102] The use of the expression "All First Nations children" used in the Tribunal's rulings and according to the evidence before the Tribunal was not based on a criterion rooted in the Indian Act. None of the Panel's rulings focus on the Indian Act or on status registration under the Indian Act. As demonstrated by the Merit Decision and subsequent rulings, the Panel understands and considered the historical context and its connection to the discrimination found in this case which also triggered orders to provide culturally appropriate services. This context transcends the Indian Act and its colonial perspective on First Nations governments.

[103] This being said, the Tribunal did not provide a definition of who is a "First Nations child" under Jordan's Principle. Instead it provided a definition of Jordan's Principle and its applicability, including how to eradicate the discrimination found in this case.

[104] The 2016 CHRT 16 ruling clarified that "all First Nations children" did not only mean on reserve First Nations children. This was especially true given the fact that Canada's own program was broader and given that the realities experienced by First Nations children as a result of Canada's racial discrimination drove many First Nations families to bring children in care off-reserve in order to access services. The expression "ordinarily on reserve" captures a portion of this aspect. Another reality in this case is that some First Nations children on reserve may not have Indian Act status, yet they live on reserve or ordinarily on reserve and experience the same hardships in accessing services, as all the other children with Indian Act status on reserve in their communities given the adverse impacts and the lack of surrounding services found in the Merit Decision and subsequent rulings. The rulings also clarified that the health condition of a child should not be driving the definition. In other words, a top-down analysis requiring a child to present specific health issues was not an appropriate objective criterion as it was too narrow.

[105] Furthermore, the Panel used the term “all First Nations children” as referred to in the House of Commons Motion 296 adopting Jordan’s Principle. Therefore, the Panel did not define who is a “First Nations child” for eligibility purposes under Jordan’s Principle. The Panel relied on the same terminology employed in the House of Commons Motion 296. The Panel did not focus on the Indian Act, Indian Act status or on reserve residency given the application of Jordan’s Principle to federal government departments/programs affecting children (see 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 391-392; 2017 CHRT 14 at paras. 2, 73-74, 98 and 135). The Panel recognized in a past ruling, that was accepted by Canada, Indigenous Peoples’ right to self-government, Canada’s goal to rebuild the Nation-to-Nation relationship and the Truth and Reconciliation Commission’s (TRC) recommendation to use the UNDRIP as a framework for reconciliation (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 114).

[106] Moreover, the Panel in the same ruling expressed its goal to eliminate the discrimination found in this case and “fully supports Parliament’s intent to establish a Nation-to-Nation relationship and that reconciliation is Parliament’s goal (see Daniels v. Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development), 2016 SCC 12), and commends it for adopting this approach” (2018 CHRT 4 at para. 66).

[107] Furthermore, the Panel in its Merit Decision and subsequent rulings, has recognized the racist, oppressive and colonial practices exerted by Canada over Indigenous Peoples and entrenched in Canada’s programs and systems (see for example 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 402). Therefore, it is mindful that any remedy ordered by the Panel must take this into account (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 23).

[108] The Panel did, however, provide some clarification in previous rulings that the term “all First Nations children” is not limited to on reserve children and that it applied to on and off reserve First Nations children. The Panel ordered INAC, now ISC, to immediately apply Jordan’s Principle to all First Nations children, not only to those residing on reserves (see 2016 CHRT 16 at paras. 107 and 117).

[109] Furthermore, the Panel found that

> On the issue of the breadth of INAC’s new formulation of Jordan’s Principle, the Panel notes that the motion unanimously passed by the House of > Commons did not restrict the application of the principle solely to First Nations children on reserve, but to all First Nations children: "the government should immediately adopt a child first principle, based on Jordan's Principle, to resolve jurisdictional disputes involving the care of First Nations children" (see [Merit] Decision at para. 353, emphasis added). INAC's formulation of Jordan's Principle is also not in line with the eligibility requirements for its own FNCFS Program, which applies to First Nations "resident on reserve or Ordinarily Resident On Reserve" (see ss. 1.3.2 and 1.3.7 of the 2005 FNCFS National Program Manual and s. 1.1 of the 2012 National Social Programs Manual at paras. 52-53 of the [Merit] Decision). That is, the application of Jordan's Principle only to First Nations children living on reserve is more restrictive than the definition included in INAC's FNCFS Program. This type of restriction will likely create gaps for First Nations children and is not in line with the [Merit] Decision (see paras. 362, 364-382 and 391),

>

[110] Furthermore, in the Merit Decision, 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 151:

> The NPR describes the context of First Nations child and family services as including several experiences of massive loss, resulting in identity problems and difficulties in functioning for many First Nations and their families. These experiences include the historical experience of residential schools and its inter-generational effects, and the migration of First Nations out of reserves causing disruption to the traditional concept of family (see NPR at pp. 32-33). As the NPR puts it at page 33:
> > First Nation families have been in the centre of a historical struggle between colonial government on one hand, who set out to eradicate their culture, language and world view, and that of the traditional family, who believed in maintaining a balance in the world for the children and those yet unborn. This struggle has caused dysfunction, high suicide rates, and violence, which have had vast inter-generational impacts.

[111] This is a serious issue that also needs non-pecuniary redress and is justified by the findings and the evidence in this case. The Tribunal ordered Canada in the Merit Decision to cease the discriminatory practice.

[112] This being said, in interpreting the Panel's findings and orders, Canada currently considers a First Nations child eligible for services under Jordan's Principle if the child falls in the categories below:

> a) First Nations children registered under the Indian Act, living on or off reserve;

> b) First Nations children eligible to be registered under the Indian Act, living on or off reserve; and
>
> c) non-status First Nations children without Indian Act status who are ordinarily resident on reserve (the AFN appears to dispute this however, this forms part of the Tribunal's findings in 2016 CHRT 16 at para. 117, quoted above).
> d) First Nations children without Indian Act status who live off-reserve but are recognized as members by their Nation, and who have urgent and/or life-threatening needs as per the Tribunal's interim order in (2019 CHRT 7 at paras. 88-89).

[113] The Panel confirms that all the above categories are eligible to receive services under Jordan's Principle.

[114] The question to be determined here is if Canada's current eligibility criteria under Jordan's Principle remedy the discriminatory practice and are sufficiently responsive to the Panel's reasons, findings and orders.

[115] As mentioned in the interim ruling, the Panel still believes it would be unfair to make a finding of non-compliance of the Tribunal's orders against Canada given that while the Tribunal did not use the Indian Act registration provisions as an eligibility criteria and did not limit Jordan's Principle to children on reserve, it did not provide a definition of who is a First Nations child eligible under its Jordan's Principle orders (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 20). While it is accurate to say the Tribunal did not provide a definition of a "First Nations child" in its orders, it is also true to say that none of the parties including Canada sought clarification on this point until this motion. To be fair, on this issue, the Panel believes that it should focus on ensuring remedies are responsive to the discriminatory practice in light of the evidence before it and in the best interests of children, rather than on Canada's compliance. On this point, the Panel agrees with the NAN and the AFN that the best interests of children should be interpreted through an Indigenous lens. The Panel considers First Nations perspectives of the best interests of their children in determining the matters in this case.

[116] The Panel believes that Canada has been responsive to the Tribunal's Jordan Principle's orders to a great degree and has worked to remedy the discrimination. Canada has now moved from zero Jordan's Principle cases at the time of the hearing to a few hundred a few months after the Merit Decision to thousands of approved requests as of July 2016 to, at the time of this ruling, over 607 000 approved requests for services for First Nations children who otherwise would not have received them since the Tribunal's ruling ordering its definition in 2017 CHRT 14. This is two years after the TRC's final report and one year and a half after the Merit Decision. Of note, this was made possible by the Panel's retention of jurisdiction allowing parties to bring evidence and make additional requests.

[117] In light of the above, the Panel does not make a non-compliance finding against Canada here. Rather, it will examine the responsiveness of Canada's eligibility criteria to Jordan's Principle, including to Jordan's Principle's objective previously found by this Panel and already mentioned above and its responsiveness to the Panel's previous orders. The Panel, following its past approach, will also examine if there is a need for further orders to clarify its previous orders so as to ensure their effectiveness.

D. Objective of Panel's Retention of Jurisdiction

[118] In retaining jurisdiction, the Panel is monitoring if Canada is remedying discrimination in a responsive and efficient way without repeating the patterns of the past (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 50).

[119] If the past discriminatory practices are not addressed in a meaningful fashion, the Panel may deem it necessary to make further orders. It would be unfair for the Complainants, the Commission and the interested parties who were successful in this complaint, after many years and different levels of courts, to have to file another complaint for the implementation of the Tribunal's orders and reform of the First Nations' Child welfare system (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 53).

E. Structure

[120] Issue one will address children, residing on or off reserve whom a First Nations group, community or people recognizes as belonging to that group, community or people, in accordance with the customs or traditions of that First Nations group, community or people.

[121] Issue two will be dealing with the issue of First Nations children, residing on or off reserve, who do not have Indian Act status and who are not eligible for Indian Act status, but have a parent/guardian with, or who is eligible for, Indian Act status.

[122] Issue three will be dealing with the issue of First Nations children, residing off reserve, who have lost their connection to their First Nations communities due to the operation of the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop, or discrimination within the FNCFS Program.

IV. Issue I

> Children, residing on or off reserve whom a First Nations group, community or people recognizes as belonging to that group, community or people, in accordance with the customs or traditions of that First Nations group, community or people.

A. Introduction

[123] The Panel views this first part of the ruling as an interpretation exercise of what the Panel meant to cover under Jordan's Principle under previous findings and rulings as opposed to the two other sections which raise new questions where the Panel will not only do an interpretation exercise but also will make findings in light of the evidence or lack thereof before it.

[124] In the Merit Decision, the Panel applied the test in Moore v. British Columbia (Education), 2012 SCC 61 at para. 33 [Moore] and (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse) v. Bombardier Inc. (Bombardier Aerospace Training Center), 2015 SCC 39 at paras. 44-52 [Bombardier] (see 2016 CHRT 2 at paras, 22-25).

> In the context of this Complaint, under section 5 of the CHRA, the Complainants must demonstrate (1) that First Nations have a characteristic or characteristics protected from discrimination; (2) that they are denied services, or adversely impacted by the provision of services, by AANDC; and, (3) that the protected characteristic or characteristics are a factor in the adverse impact or denial (see Moore v. British Columbia (Education), 2012 SCC 61 at para. 33 [Moore]).

(see Merit Decision at para. 22).

[125] The Panel applied the Moore test as follows and found the complaint was substantiated:

> It is through this lens, and with these principles in mind, that the Panel examined the evidence and arguments advanced by the parties in this case. For the reasons that follow, the Panel finds AANDC is involved in the provision of child and family services to First Nations on reserves and in the Yukon; that First Nations are adversely impacted by the provision of those services by AANDC, and, in some cases, denied those services as a result of AANDC's involvement; and; that race and/or national or ethnic origin are a factor in those adverse impacts or denial.
>
> (see Merit Decision at para. 28).

[126] Additionally, the Panel used an international law framework to support its reasons on substantive equality in the Merit Decision and subsequent rulings.

[127] The Panel finds it is not necessary to redo the same analysis for this first section of this ruling given that the First Nations complainants have met their burden of proof and discrimination was established. Moreover, denials, delays and adverse impacts were all demonstrated and formed part of the Panel's analysis under Jordan's Principle. Jordan's Principle is a separate part of the complaint and is broader than the on-reserve FNCFS Program and applies to all Federal Programs concerning First Nations children. The Panel will be clarifying the use of the terms "all First Nations children" in the legal and evidentiary context that led to previous findings and orders in this case.

[128] The applicable human rights framework will be further discussed under issues two and three of this ruling. In light of the Panel's past findings, reasons, rulings and orders and, for the reasons outlined below, the Panel clarifies that "All First Nations children" also includes on and off-reserve First Nations children without Indian Act status who are recognized as citizens or members of their respective First Nations whether under agreements, treaties or First Nations' customs, traditions and laws who experience the same barriers as on-reserve First Nations children with Indian Act status or who are eligible for Indian Act status. These First Nations children are eligible to be considered on a case-by-case basis using a substantive equality analysis under the Tribunal's Jordan's Principle orders.

B. First Nations identity versus First Nations categories of who is eligible under Jordan's Principle [129] The Panel has recognized in its interim ruling that there is a "significant difference" between determining who is a "First Nation child" as a citizen of a First Nation and determining who is a "First Nation child" entitled to receive services under Jordan's Principle and what is the appropriate eligibility criteria to use in the latter (see 2019 CHRT 11 at para. 49). The present ruling puts the question of eligibility criteria to receive Jordan's Principle services before the Tribunal, but not citizenship which is the prerogative of First Nations not the Tribunal or Canada. Moreover, the AFN, the COO and the NAN all made arguments to this effect and those arguments need to be addressed. First Nations parties are concerned and strongly view the two questions as intertwined. Therefore, the Panel will consider their concerns as part of this ruling. In that regard, the Panel will use the terminology "eligibility criteria under Jordan's Principle" to distinguish it from the terms "definition of a First Nation child'' purposely to avoid any misunderstanding that the Panel is attempting to define who is a First Nations child for any purpose but the eligibility to access Jordan's Principle services.

C. First Nations Rights to Self-Determination

[130] The Panel already mentioned it recognizes First Nations' human rights and inherent rights to self-determination and to self-governance and the importance of upholding those rights. (see 2019 CHRT 7 at paras. 23, 89 and 91).

[131] Moreover,

> [d]uring the January 9, 2019 motion hearing, Panel Chair Marchildon, expressed the Panel's desire to respect Indigenous Peoples' inherent rights of self-determination and self-governance including their right to determine citizenship in crafting all its remedies to respect Indigenous Peoples' inherent rights of self-determination and of self-governance including their right to determine who their citizens are. Another important point is that the Panel not > only respects that these rights are inherent to Indigenous Peoples, the Panel also finds they are also human rights of paramount importance. The Panel in its Decision and subsequent rulings, has recognized the racist, oppressive and colonial practices exerted by Canada over Indigenous Peoples and entrenched in Canada's programs and systems (see for example 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 402). Therefore, it is mindful that any remedy ordered by the Panel must take this into account. In fact, in 2018 CHRT 4, the Panel crafted a creative and innovative order to ensure it provided effective immediate relief remedies to First Nations children while respecting the principles in the UNDRIP, the Nation-to Nation relationship, the Indigenous rights of self-governance and the rights of Indigenous rights holders. It requested comments from the parties and no suggestions or comments were made by the parties on those specific orders. The Panel has always stressed the need to ensure the best interests of children is respected in its remedies and the need to eliminate discrimination and prevent it from reoccurring.

> (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para 23, emphasis omitted).

[132] Additionally, in the interim ruling, the Panel stressed "the importance of the First Nations' self-determination and citizenship issues", and added that the "interim relief order or any other orders is not intended to override or prejudice First Nations' rights" (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 91, emphasis omitted).

[133] In 2018 CHRT 4, the Panel found that:

> national human rights legislation such as the CHRA must be interpreted so as to be harmonious with Canada's commitments expressed in international law including the UNDRIP.
> (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 81).

[134] The Panel also recognized "the Indigenous Peoples' right to self-government and Canada's goal to rebuild the Nation-to-Nation relationship and the TRC's recommendation to use the UNDRIP as a framework for reconciliation" (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 114).

[135] Finally, on this point, the Panel finds that the various domestic and international legal instruments discussed above all support the inherent self-determination right of First Nations to identify their citizens and members outside the narrow lens of the Indian Act. In particular, this approach is consistent with protecting First Nations individual and collective human rights as articulated in the UNDRIP and other relevant international instruments, section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, and the quasi-constitutional CHRA. It is consistent with Canada's public commitment to implement the TRC recommendations, rebuild a Nation-to-Nation relation with First Nations, and advance reconciliation. And it is consistent with the Tribunal's previous approach, in particular as applied in the Merit Decision and in the 2018 CHRT 4 ruling.

D. International Law

[136] Canada has accepted the UNDRIP without reservation, but has not yet enacted it into domestic law. However, Canada has fully endorsed the UNDRIP, and committed to implementing it through the review of laws and policies, as well as other collaborative initiatives and actions. Further, and importantly, this Tribunal has already provided an analysis of the UNDRIP and its relevance to this proceeding.

[137] In 2018 CHRT 4, The Panel also reiterated its findings made in the Merit Decision that the CHRA is a result of the implementation of international human rights principles in domestic law (see the Merit Decision at paras. 437-439 and 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 69).

[138] Furthermore, the Panel made findings that > […] Canada was found liable under the CHRA for having discriminated against First Nations children and their families. Canada has international and domestic obligations towards upholding the best interests of children. Canada has additional obligations towards Indigenous children under UNDRIP, the honor of the Crown, Section 35 of the Constitution and its fiduciary relationship, to name a few. All this was discussed in the [Merit] Decision.

>
> (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 131).

[139] As already mentioned in the Merit Decision, > in Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 817 at para. 239 [Baker] an appeal against deportation based on the position of Baker's Canadian born children, the Supreme Court held procedural fairness required the decision-maker to consider international law and conventions, including the United Nations' Convention on the Rights of the Child, Can. T.S. 1992 No. 3 (the UNCRC). The Court held the Minister's decision should follow the values found in international human rights law.

> (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 70).

As described by the Caring Society, the rights of the child are human rights that recognize childhood as an important period of development with special circumstances.

(see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 71).

[140] The Panel also found that the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (UNDRIP), GA Res. 61/295, UN GAOR, 61st Sess., Supp. No 49 Vol III, UN Doc A/61/49 (2007) (the UNDRIP) is of particular significance especially in this case. It outlines the individual and collective rights of Indigenous Peoples. In May 2016, Canada endorsed the UNDRIP stating that "Canada is now a full supporter of the Declaration, without qualification.

(see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 72).

Moreover, the UNDRIP at Articles 3, 4, 5, 14, 15, 18, 21 support the rights of equal and just services and programs for Indigenous, with consultation on their social, economic and political institutions.

(2018 CHRT 4 at para. 73).

Additionally, the UNDRIP Articles 7, 21 (2), 22 (1) (2), state that Indigenous Peoples have the right to live in freedom and shall not be subject to violence including the forceful removal of their children; that Indigenous People have the right to the improvement of their economic and social conditions; and states will take measures to improve and pay special attention to the rights and special needs of children.

(see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 74, emphasis omitted).

Furthermore, the UNDRIP Articles (Article 2, 7, 22) relate directly to the protection of Indigenous children and their right to be free from any kind of discrimination

(see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 75).

Article 7

> 1. Indigenous individuals have the rights to life, physical and mental integrity, liberty and security of person.
>
> 2. Indigenous peoples have the collective right to live in freedom, peace and security as distinct peoples and shall not be subjected to any act of genocide or any other act of violence, including forcibly removing children of the group to another group.

(see UNDRIP)

[141] Moreover,

> Article 8 of UNDRIP reminds governments of their responsibility to ensure that forced assimilation does not occur and that effective mechanisms are put into place to prevent depriving Indigenous Peoples of their cultural identities and distinctive traits, disposing them of their lands, territories or resources, population transfer which violates or undermines Indigenous rights, forced assimilation or integration, and discriminatory propaganda.
> (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 76).

[142] As such, self-determination is codified by article 3 of the UNDRIP which states:

> Article 3
>
> Indigenous peoples have the right of self-determination. By virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.

[143] Furthermore, self-government is codified under article 4, UNDRIP, which states,

>
> Indigenous peoples, in exercising their right to self-determination, have the right to autonomy or self-government in matters relating to their internal and local affairs, as well as ways and means for financing their autonomous functions.

[144] While the UNDRIP is to be read as a whole with the understanding that all the rights enunciated are interdependent, Articles 5, 9, 15, 18-19, 23, 33-34 and 37 of the UNDRIP are of particular significance:

>
> Indigenous peoples have the right to maintain and strengthen their distinct political, legal, economic, social and cultural institutions, while retaining their right to participate fully, if they so choose, in the political, economic, social and cultural life of the State.
>
> Article 9
>
> Indigenous peoples and individuals have the right to belong to an indigenous community or nation, in accordance with the traditions and customs of the community or nation concerned. No discrimination of any kind may arise from the exercise of such a right.

Article 15

1. Indigenous peoples have the right to the dignity and diversity of their cultures, traditions, histories and aspirations which shall be appropriately reflected in education and public information.

2. States shall take effective measures, in consultation and cooperation with the indigenous peoples concerned, to combat prejudice and eliminate discrimination and to promote tolerance, understanding and good relations among indigenous peoples and all other segments of society.

Article 18

Indigenous peoples have the right to participate in decision-making in matters which would affect their rights, through representatives chosen by themselves in accordance with their own procedures, as well as to maintain and develop their own indigenous decision-making institutions.

Article 19

States shall consult and cooperate in good faith with the indigenous peoples concerned through their own representative institutions in order to obtain their free, prior and informed consent before adopting and implementing legislative or administrative measures that may affect them.

Article 23

Indigenous peoples have the right to determine and develop priorities and strategies for exercising their right to development. In particular, indigenous peoples have the right to be actively involved in developing and determining health, housing and other economic and social programmes affecting them and, as far as possible, to administer such programmes through their own institutions.

Article 33

1. Indigenous peoples have the right to determine their own identity or membership in accordance with their customs and traditions. This does not impair the right of indigenous individuals to obtain citizenship of the States in which they live.

2. Indigenous peoples have the right to determine the structures and to select the membership of their institutions in accordance with their own procedures.

>
> Indigenous peoples have the right to promote, develop and maintain their institutional structures and their distinctive customs, spirituality, traditions, procedures, practices and, in the cases where they exist, juridical systems or customs, in accordance with international human rights standards.
>
>
> 1. Indigenous peoples have the right to the recognition, observance and enforcement of treaties, agreements and other constructive arrangements concluded with States or their successors and to have States honour and respect such treaties, agreements and other constructive arrangements.
> 2. Nothing in this Declaration may be interpreted as diminishing or eliminating the rights of indigenous peoples contained in treaties, agreements and other constructive arrangements.

[145] The rights and the Tribunal's approach mentioned above support a departure from the Indian Act criteria as a sole means to determine who is eligible to receive Jordan's Principle services.

[146] In addition, in 2015, Canada accepted to fully implement the 94 TRC calls for action. Child welfare and Jordan's Principle are first to fifth calls to action.

[147] Of significance, the TRC called for cooperation and coordination between all levels of government and civil society to implement its calls to action, and for government to fully adopt and implement the UNDRIP as the framework for reconciliation.

[148] In 2018, the Panel found that the TRC calls to action and the UNDRIP informed the Panel's reasons and orders in this ruling (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 83). Of note, this specific ruling led to a consultation protocol signed by all parties and included Canada's commitment to comply with all of the Panel's orders including those found in 2018 CHRT 4. This same ruling and orders acknowledged the Nation-to-Nation relationship and the recognition that this relationship meant that First Nations can choose to govern their own child welfare services. As such, Canada accepted this ruling in its entirety which was informed by the UNDRIP.

[149] Of note, the Panel Chair's final remarks in that same ruling mentioned that

> [g]iven the recognition that a Nation is also formed by its population, the systematic removal of children from a Nation affects the Nation's very existence,
>
> The building of a Nation-to-Nation relationship cannot be more significant than by stopping the unnecessary removal of Indigenous children from their respective Nations. Reforming the practice of removing children to shift it to a practice of keeping children in their homes and Nations will create a channel of reconciliation […]
> (see 2018 CHRT 4 at paras. 452-453, emphasis omitted).

[150] Furthermore, when interpreting Canadian law, Parliament is presumed to act in compliance with its international obligations and to respect the values and principles enshrined in international law through the presumption of conformity. Moreover, the Supreme Court in interpreting the scope of the application of the Charter, stated in R. v. Hape, 2007 SCC 26 that:

> …the courts should seek to ensure compliance with Canada's binding obligations under international law where the express words are capable of supporting such a construction.
> (see R. v. Hape, 2007 SCC 26 at para. 56).

[151] Therefore, international instruments such as UNDRIP, should inform the contextual approach to statutory interpretation.

[152] Consequently,

> International law remains relevant in interpreting the scope and content of human rights in Canadian law, as was underlined by the Supreme Court on numerous occasions since Chief Justice Dickson's dissent in Reference Re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), 1987 CanLII 88, [1987] 1 SCR 313.
>
> (see also 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 431).
>
> That is so because Parliament and the provincial legislatures are presumed to respect the principles of international law (see Baker at para. 81).
>
> (see also 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 432).
> This approach often leads the Supreme Court to look at decisions and recommendations of human right bodies to interpret the scope and content of > domestic law provisions in the light of international law (see for example Canada (Human Rights Commission) v. Taylor, [1990] 3 SCR 892 at p. 920; B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 SCR 315 at pp. 149-150; Divito v. Canada (Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness), 2013 SCC 47 at paras 26-27; and, Saskatchewan Federation of Labour v. Saskatchewan, 2015 SCC 4 at paras 154-160).

[153] The Supreme Court of Canada in Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1038, at p. 1056-7, discussed the importance of international law as an important interpretative tool in applying human rights law such as the Charter:

> As was said in Oakes, supra, at p. 136, among the underlying values essential to our free and democratic society are "the inherent dignity of the human person" and "commitment to social justice and equality". Especially in light of Canada's ratification of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, G.A. Res. 2200 A (XXI), 21 U.N. GAOR, Supp. (No. 16) 49, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966), and commitment therein to protect, inter alia, the right to work in its various dimensions found in Article 6 of that treaty, it cannot be doubted that the objective in this case is a very important one. In Reference Re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), supra, I had occasion to say at p. 349:
>
> > The content of Canada's international human rights obligations is, in my view, an important indicia of the meaning of the "full benefit of the Charter 's protection". I believe that the Charter should generally be presumed to provide protection at least as great as that afforded by similar provisions in international human rights documents which Canada has ratified.
>
> Given the dual function of s. 1 identified in Oakes, Canada's international human rights obligations should inform not only the interpretation of the content of the rights guaranteed by the Charter but also the interpretation of what can constitute pressing and substantial s. 1 objectives which may justify restrictions upon those rights. Furthermore, for purposes of this stage of the proportionality inquiry, the fact that a value has the status of an international human right, either in customary international law or under a treaty to which Canada is a State Party, should generally be indicative of a high degree of importance attached to that objective. This is consistent with the importance that this Court has placed on the protection of employees as a vulnerable group in society.
> (emphasis ours).

> In recent years, the Supreme Court expanded the relevance of international law to give effect to Canada's role and actions in the development of norms of international law, particularly in the area of human rights (see United States v. Burns, 2001 SCC 7 at para. 81 [Burns]; and, Canada (Justice) v. Khadr, 2008 SCC 28 at paras. 2-3). In Burns, the Supreme Court found that Canada's advocacy for the abolition of the death penalty, and efforts to bring about change in extradition arrangements when a fugitive faces the death penalty, prevented it from extraditing someone to the United States facing the same sentence without obtaining assurance that it would not be carried out. The same reasoning applies to the case at hand as Canada has expressed its views internationally on the importance of human rights on numerous occasions.
> (see Merit Decision at para. 434).

[154] Moreover, in R. v. Sharpe, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 45 at paragraph 175 citing R. Sullivan, Driedger on the Construction of Statutes (3rd Ed. 1994) at p. 330 the Court stated,

> ... the legislature is presumed to respect the values and principles enshrined in international law, both customary and conventional. These constitute a part of the legal context in which legislation is enacted and read. In so far as possible, therefore, interpretations that reflect these values and principles are preferred.

[155] Furthermore, the Panel wrote in the Merit Decision that:

> [t]he ICESCR [International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 993 U.N.T.S. 3] is considered to be of progressive application. However, in General Comment No. 20, 2 July 2009 (E/C.12/GC/20), the CESCR [Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights] stated that, given their importance, the principles of equality and non-discrimination are of immediate application, notwithstanding the provisions of article 2 of the ICESR (see paras. 5 and 7). The CESCR also affirmed that the aim of the ICESCR is to achieve substantive equality by "…paying sufficient attention to groups of individuals which suffer historical or persistent prejudice instead of merely comparing the formal treatment of individuals in similar situations" (at paras. 8; see also paras. 9 and 10). It added that the exercise of covenant rights should not be conditional on a person's place of residence (see at para. 34).
>
> (2016 CHRT 2 at para. 442), (emphasis ours).
> In addition to the covenants that protect human rights in general, the Panel wrote that Canada is a party to legal instruments that focus on specific issues or aim to protect specific groups of persons. Canada is a party to the International Convention for the Elimination of all Forms of Racial > Discrimination, 660 U.N.T.S. 195 (the ICERD), ratified in 1970. The ICERD clarifies the prohibition of discrimination found in the Universal Declaration, to which it refers to in its preamble. Articles 1 and 2 define racial discrimination and direct States to take all necessary measures to ensure the adequate development and protection of certain racial groups or individuals belonging to them. The purpose is to guarantee them the full and equal enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms, including special measures whenever warranted. Article 5 further highlights rights whose enjoyment must be free of discrimination, including the right to social services, which includes public health, medical care and social security.

> (2016 CHRT 2 at para. 444, emphasis ours).

[156] The Panel in the Merit Decision wrote that "Canada's statements and commitments, whether expressed on the international scene or at the national level, should not be allowed to remain empty rhetoric," (see 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 454).

[157] While the Panel is not making findings of violation of international law as Canada argued the Tribunal lacks jurisdiction to do so, the Panel does have jurisdiction to rely on international law in interpreting the CHRA and domestic human rights. Again, it did so in the unchallenged Merit Decision and previous unchallenged rulings especially in regards to substantive equality which is at the core of Jordan's Principle. The Panel in light of the above, finds that Canada's practice and eligibility criteria under Jordan's Principle is underinclusive and inconsistent with protected international human rights enshrined in the UNDRIP. More importantly, it fails to account for the inherent right to self-determination and to self-governance, both human rights of paramount importance that Canada publicly committed to uphold and also included in the Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, S.C. 2019, c. 24 which will be discussed below.

E. An Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families

[158] While the AFN indicated that they advocated for the inclusion of a reference to the Tribunal's decision in An Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, S.C. 2019, c. 24 which was rejected by Canada, the Panel recognizes similar language used in its 2016 CHRT 2 decision in An Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, especially with regard to substantive equality.

[159] The Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, only came into force on January 1, 2020 after the present motion was argued. However, it was raised by the AFN and other parties were given an opportunity to respond as part of this motion and, at that time, it had undergone second reading. While the Panel recognizes that the legislation was not in force at the time of the hearing and that there is no provision giving the legislation retroactive effect, the Panel believes that it is appropriate to consider Parliament's goal and intentions and its purpose for enacting the legislation. Additionally, the Panel considers the rule of law that is applicable at the time it makes its orders. At the time it renders this ruling, the Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families is now law in Canada. The same reasoning applies concerning Bill S-3 which will be discussed further below. It is appropriate for the Tribunal to consider the current state of the law at the time of its ruling especially, as in this case, where the parties were able to anticipate the change and had an opportunity to make appropriate submissions. The Tribunal will not, however, consider secondary sources on such as public reports that were not addressed by the parties and not available at the time of the hearing.

[160] The Preamble is particularly instructive of Parliament's goal in enacting this important legislation.

> Preamble
>
> Whereas the Government of Canada is committed to implementing the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples;
>
> Whereas Canada ratified the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child and the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination;
>
> Whereas Parliament recognizes the legacy of residential schools and the harm, including intergenerational trauma, caused to Indigenous peoples by colonial policies and practices;
>
> Whereas Parliament recognizes the disruption that Indigenous women and girls have experienced in their lives in relation to child and family services systems and the importance of supporting Indigenous women and girls in overcoming their historical disadvantage;

Whereas Parliament recognizes the importance of reuniting Indigenous children with their families and communities from whom they were separated in the context of the provision of child and family services;

Whereas the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada's Calls to Action calls for the federal, provincial and Indigenous governments to work together with respect to the welfare of Indigenous children and calls for the enactment of federal legislation that establishes national standards for the welfare of Indigenous children;

Whereas Parliament affirms the right to self-determination of Indigenous peoples, including the inherent right of self-government, which includes jurisdiction in relation to child and family services;

Whereas Parliament affirms the need > to respect the diversity of all Indigenous peoples, including the diversity of their laws, rights, treaties, histories, cultures, languages, customs and traditions, > to take into account the unique circumstances and needs of Indigenous elders, parents, youth, children, persons with disabilities, women, men and gender-diverse persons and two-spirit persons, > to address the needs of Indigenous children and to help ensure that there are no gaps in the services that are provided in relation to them, whether they reside on a reserve or not,

>
>

And whereas the Government of Canada acknowledges the ongoing call for funding for child and family services that is predictable, stable, sustainable, needs-based and consistent with the principle of substantive equality in order to secure long-term positive outcomes for Indigenous children, families and communities;

Moreover, according to the Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, an Indigenous governing body means a council, government or other entity that is authorized to act on behalf of an Indigenous group, community or people that holds rights recognized and affirmed by section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Indigenous peoples has the meaning assigned by the definition of aboriginal peoples of Canada in subsection 35(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[161] Similar to the language found in section 25 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms:

> 25. The guarantee in this Charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from any aboriginal, treaty or other rights or freedoms that pertain to the aboriginal peoples of Canada including
>
> > (a) any rights or freedoms that have been recognized by the Royal Proclamation of October 7, 1763; and
> >
> > (b) any rights or freedoms that now exist by way of land claims agreements or may be so acquired.
>
> The Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, at section 2 stipulates:
>
> This Act is to be construed as upholding the rights of Indigenous peoples recognized and affirmed by section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, and not as abrogating or derogating from them.

[162] Section 7 of the Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, affirms that this "Act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada or of a province".

[163] Section 8 mentions that

> [t]he purpose of this Act is to
>
> > (a) affirm the inherent right of self-government, which includes jurisdiction in relation to child and family services;
> >
> > (b) set out principles applicable, on a national level, to the provision of child and family services in relation to Indigenous children; and
> > (c) contribute to the implementation of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples.

[164] In light of the above, it is Parliament's clear intent to uphold the inherent rights of self-determination and of self-governance of First Nations, Inuit and Métis Nations in the areas of child welfare and to respect substantive equality, an area covered by Jordan's Principle and domestic and international human rights. This is consistent with the Panel's approach in this case and this clear intent from Parliament informs the eligibility criteria under Jordan's Principle and also further supports a departure from the Indian Act criteria as the sole means to determine who is eligible to receive Jordan's Principle services.

F. Indian Act

[165] The Panel will now turn to the subject of the Indian Act, followed by Section 35 of the Constitutional Act, 1982 and treaties.

[166] The Supreme Court of Canada recently discussed the Indian Act in Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 SCC 31 at paragraph 4:

> Since its enactment in 1876, the Indian Act has governed the recognition of an individual's status as an "Indian". In its current form, the Indian Act creates a registration system under which individuals qualify for status on the basis of an exhaustive list of eligibility criteria. The Indian Act's registration entitlements do not necessarily correspond to the customs of Indigenous communities for determining their own membership or reflect an individual's Aboriginal identity or heritage. However, it is incontrovertible that status confers both tangible and intangible benefits.

[167] As Masse J. recognized in Descheneaux v Canada (Attorney General), 2015 QCCS 3555 at paragraph 230:

> […] it should also be noted that, according to expert Stewart Clatworthy, the logic of section 6 and its "second generation cut off" dictates that, given the current state of affairs, in about 100 years, no new child will be entitled to have his or her name added to the Register in the plaintiffs' Bands. If there are more people registered under 6(1), this evolution will be slightly slower, but because of the nature of the mechanism in subsection 6(1), there will eventually be no more children born with an entitlement to be entered in the Register. There is no evidence on other Indian Bands specifically, but it should be noted that the same mechanism is at work.

[168] The recent amendments to section 6(1) of the Indian Act will be discussed below. However, the issue remains that Registered "Indians" under section 6(2) are unable to transmit status to their children which will inevitably result in the situation Masse J. identifies above.

[169] The AFN's Chiefs-in-Assembly passed significant resolutions pertaining to the Indian Act and its effects on First Nations. For instance, Resolutions 30/2017, 71/2016, and 53/2015 provide:

> Resolution Provisions 30/2017

WHEREAS:

[…]

B. There is a long history of hardship and discrimination imposed on Indigenous peoples by the Indian Act's Indian status provisions.

C. Federal legislation enacted in the past and implemented still today was designed to assimilate and erode First Nations citizenship.

E. Indian children lose Indian status after two generations of out-marriage, and with the current rate of out-marriage many First Nations communities will disappear within a few generations due to rapid decline in numbers of Status Indians with their citizenship.

F. First Nations have always asserted their jurisdiction to determine and define their citizenship, regardless of Canada's unilateral imposition of the Indian Act that determines that status.

THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED that the Chiefs-in-Assembly:

1. Affirm the authority of First Nations to determine their own citizenship and eligibility for registration.

71/2016

THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED THAT the Chiefs-in-Assembly:

[…]

3. Call on Canada to repeal the impugned provision in its entirety and to transfer the authority of citizenship and identity to the First Nations.

53/2015

[…]

B. First Nations peoples always governed themselves according to their customs, laws, and traditions, which included the determination of their individual and collective identities. The federal government has unilaterally interfered with Indigenous peoples and violated our inherent rights by > determining who is a registered Indian under the registration provisions of the Indian Act.

>
> F. The federal government must stop interfering with the right of First Nations to determine their individual and collective identities and recognize the people accepted by First Nations as belonging to them on the basis of their own customs, laws, and traditions.
>
> THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED that the Chiefs-in-Assembly:
>
> 3. Direct the federal government to immediately cease imposing Indian Act criteria for registration upon First Nations and recognize citizens as defined by First Nations.
>
>
> 6. Direct the federal government to provide resources to First Nations to support their exercise of jurisdiction over citizenship.
>
> (see Affidavit of Dr. Cindy Blackstock, affirmed December 5, 2018 at Exhibit "E", Tab 2 of the Jan 9 CSMR).

[170] In the case of Indian Act band councils (which are not institutions of Indigenous design), extensive authority to review and intervene in the decisions of their institutions remains vested in the Minister of Indian Affairs (see for example Indian Act, sections 66, 67, 79 and 83).

[171] As demonstrated above, the Indian Act was designed to assimilate First Nations Peoples and does not reflect First Nations' definitions of themselves as Nations.

[172] In light of the above, the AFN and the Caring Society argue it cannot be the case that a legislative regime that will eventually result in a generation of First Nations children born without any Indian Act status can be the only measure for determining the First Nations children who require the protection of Jordan's Principle. The Panel agrees with this assertion.

G. Treaties and Section 35 of the of the Constitution Act, 1982

[173] Section 35 of the of the Constitution Act, 1982 recognizes and affirms aboriginal and treaty rights of Aboriginal Peoples meaning, First Nations, Inuit and Métis peoples in Canada:

> 35. (1) The existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada are hereby recognized and affirmed.
>
> (2) In this Act, "aboriginal peoples of Canada" includes the Indian, Inuit and Métis peoples of Canada.
>
> (3) For greater certainty, in subsection (1) "treaty rights" includes rights that now exist by way of land claims agreements or may be so acquired.
> (4) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the aboriginal and treaty rights referred to in subsection (1) are guaranteed equally to male and female persons.

[174] The Panel agrees with the AFN that the issue of citizenship is an Aboriginal right and treaty right, constitutionally protected by virtue of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Moreover, as demonstrated above, an even greater protection of Indigenous rights exists under the UNDRIP and other international instruments that Canada has ratified (see Merit Decision at paras.431-455).

[175] Finally, treaties are also of significance in protecting First Nations rights. A treaty is an agreement made between the Government of Canada (or made by the British Crown and inherited by Canada), Indigenous groups and often provinces and territories that defines ongoing rights and obligations on all sides. These agreements set out continuing treaty rights and benefits for each group. Treaty rights and Aboriginal rights (commonly referred to as Indigenous rights) are recognized and affirmed in section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 and are also a key part of the UNDRIP which the Government of Canada has committed to adopt. Treaties with Indigenous Peoples include both historic treaties with First Nations and modern treaties (also called comprehensive land claim agreements) with Indigenous groups. The various treaties between First Nations and Canada, the Constitution, the UNDRIP and the CHRA all have primacy over the Indian Act.

[176] This important analysis above is employed by the Panel when it is asked by Canada to respect the fact that the Indian Act is law in Canada and that the Panel has to apply it. When asked to apply non-quasi-constitutional Federal legislation, the Panel must consider the legislation's effect on the quasi-constitutional human rights it is being asked to adjudicate. The Panel agrees with Canada that the Panel's role here is not to find sections of the Indian Act inoperative. While the Charter was referred to by some parties, a proper Charter challenge is not before the Tribunal as part of this motion.

[177] This being said, the Panel believes it is an interpretation exercise to determine if using the Indian Act to determine eligibility criteria for Jordan's Principle furthers or hinders the Panel's substantive equality goal in crafting Jordan's Principle orders and the Panel's goal to eliminate discrimination and prevent similar practices from reoccurring.

[178] This reasoning also supports the Panel's response to Canada's argument that the Panel cannot draft policy. The Panel's goal is to eliminate the discrimination found in this case which includes Jordan's Principle and did not focus on the Indian Act in the provision of services. The Panel's interpretation is through a human rights lens and a focus to ensure that its orders are effectively implemented in a non-discriminatory manner and not drafting policy. The Tribunal is not attempting to draft policy. It analyzes the responsiveness of the governmental approach taken to implement the Panel's orders to cease the discriminatory practice and, if warranted, provides guidance to eradicate residual discrimination.

[179] The Tribunal has jurisdiction to consider this motion and corresponding request for further orders given that the Tribunal remained seized of all its orders to monitor their implementation with a focus to ensure their effectiveness and to eliminate the discrimination found. This mechanism is broad enough to allow the Panel to consider this issue and make clarification orders if needed and supported by the evidence.

[180] The Panel rejects Canada's argument that this interpretation exercise is expanding the complaint. Firstly, the complaint is part of the claim but is not its entirety. Secondly, Jordan's Principle is a broader aspect of the claim as it encompasses all government services offered to First Nations children and has an interplay with the Provinces and Territories. The Complainants who were successful in this case and the evidence they presented does not support a finding that Jordan's Principle eligibility criteria was limited to the Indian Act.

[181] Finally, on this point, the evidence and legal framework discussed as part of this motion support the Tribunal's jurisdiction and clarification orders that will be discussed below.

[182] Returning to the subject of treaties, the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples identified citizenship as an Aboriginal Right protected by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 in its recommendations, when it stated that:

> In our view, the right of an Aboriginal nation to determine its own citizenship is an existing Aboriginal and treaty right within the meaning of section 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. At the same time, any rules and processes governing citizenship must satisfy certain basic constitutional standards flowing from the terms of section 35 itself. The purpose of these standards is to prevent an Aboriginal group from unfairly excluding anyone from participating in the enjoyment of collective Aboriginal and treaty rights guaranteed by section 35(1), including the right of self-government. In other words, the guarantee of Aboriginal and treaty rights in section 35 could be frustrated if a nation were free to deny citizenship to individuals on an arbitrary basis and thus prevent them from sharing in the benefit of the collective rights recognized in section 35.

[183] Furthermore, in R. v. Sioui, 1990 CanLII 103, [1990] 1 SCR 1025, Lamer J. noted that the Royal Proclamation recognized the authority of Indigenous nations to continue to exercise autonomy over their internal affairs (see p. 1052-3). Similarly, in Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 1010 [Delgamuukw] at paragraph 145, the Supreme Court of Canada affirmed that the assertion of British sovereignty over Indigenous lands did not displace the pre-existing Indigenous legal orders, but protected them.

[184] The AFN submits that attempts at limiting the scope of a "First Nations child" on the basis of colonially derived preconceptions of Indian Act status, instead of deferring to First Nations concepts of citizenship and membership, flies in the face of First Nations jurisdiction over this area. Section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867 did not only delineate that individuals with Indian Act status or those resident on reserves were under the jurisdiction of Canada, and therefore entitled to the benefit of federal services, but in fact more broadly confirmed "Indians, and Lands reserved for Indians" fell under federal jurisdiction.

[185] The AFN also submits the Supreme Court of Canada in Daniels explained that section 35's purpose is to protect First Nations communities' rights, while subsection 91(24)'s purpose is about the federal government's relationship with Aboriginal Peoples in Canada. (see Daniels at para. 49).

[186] Furthermore, the AFN adds that Dr. Gideon confirmed in her May 24, 2018 affidavit that for the 11 self-governing First Nations who are subject to a Self-Government Agreement, the eligibility for Jordan's Principle is determined based on whether the child is included in the self-governing First Nation's membership code. This practice is confirmed in a January 9, 2019 email from the Acting Regional Director, Operations of ISC's Northern Region. As such, Canada has agreed that membership in a self-governing First Nation has been confirmed as an eligibility criterion that can be implemented.

[187] In R. v. Van der Peet, [1996] 2 S.C.R. 507 [Van der Peet], one of the fundamental purposes of s. 35(1) is the reconciliation of the pre-existence of distinctive [A]boriginal societies with the assertion of Crown sovereignty (see para. 49; see also para. 50 on the importance of taking account of the Aboriginal perspective to achieve reconciliation).

[188] Treaties serve to reconcile pre-existing Aboriginal sovereignty with assumed Crown sovereignty (see Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73 [Haida Nation] at para. 20).

[189] The Supreme Court of Canada in decisions such as Van der Peet at paragraph 42 and Delgamuukw at paragraph 112 defined Aboriginal rights as "intersocietal" law, with their source in the interaction of pre-existing Indigenous legal systems with the common law system. The Court has also recognized Indigenous nations as holding pre-existing sovereignty, in particular in Haida Nation at paragraph 20. The Supreme Court of Canada has implied the existence of a right to self-government, for example by acknowledging in Delgamuukw that Aboriginal title is held communally, a state of affairs that would require some form of self-government to regulate the community's use of its lands. (see Delgamuukw at para. 115).

[190] Moreover, in Reference re. Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217 [Secession Reference] at paragraph 114, the Supreme Court of Canada analyzed the right to self-determination of peoples in international law:

> The existence of the right of a people to self-determination is now so widely recognized in conventions that the principle has acquired a status beyond "convention" and is considered a general principle of international law. (see A. Cassese, Self-determination of peoples: A legal reappraisal (1995), at pp. 171-72; K. Doehring," Self-Determination" in B. Simma, ed., The Charter of the United Nations: A Commentary (1994), at p. 70.)

[191] If one understands the reconciliation of the pre-existing sovereignty of Indigenous Peoples and the de facto sovereignty of the Crown to be a fundamental principle of our constitutional order, the Constitution, both written and unwritten, must be interpreted in the context of the principle of reconciliation. This is so because, as the Supreme Court said in its Secession Reference judgment at paragraph 50, "[t]he individual elements of the Constitution are linked to the others, and must be interpreted by reference to the structure of the Constitution as a whole."

[192] It is important, in undertaking this task, that one keeps in mind that the Constitution is not simply the texts of the constitutional statutes listed in the Schedule to the Constitution Act, 1982. As the Supreme Court of Canada said in the Secession Reference, > although these texts have a primary place in determining constitutional rules, they are not exhaustive. The Constitution also "embraces unwritten, as well as written rules", as we recently observed in the Provincial Judges Reference [[1997] 3 S.C.R. 3]. Finally, as was said in the Patriation Reference, [[1981] 1 S.C.R. 753], at p. 874, the Constitution of Canada includes > > the global system of rules and principles which govern the exercise of constitutional authority in the whole and in every part of the Canadian state.

>
> These supporting principles and rules…are a necessary part of our Constitution because problems or situations may arise which are not expressly dealt with by the text of the Constitution. In order to endure over time, a constitution must contain a comprehensive set of rules and principles which are capable of providing an exhaustive legal framework for our system of government. Such principles and rules emerge from an understanding of the constitutional text itself, the historical context, and previous judicial interpretations of constitutional meaning (see Secession Reference at para. 32).

[193] The British Columbia Supreme Court in Campbell v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2001 BCSC 1400 found that Indigenous self-government is an existing right and that Indigenous jurisdiction existed outside the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments in the Constitution Act, 1867. See, for example, R. v. Pamajewon, [1996] 2 S.C.R. 821. Likely the strongest case law on the existence of an aboriginal right to self-government is the decision of the British Columbia Supreme Court in Campbell, though this case was never appealed to a higher court. These cases suggest that the courts may be returning to an earlier understanding of the relationship between the Crown and Indigenous peoples as being between self-governing co-creators of the Canadian constitutional order, rather than as sovereign and subject. The treaties provide evidence of the Crown's view of Indigenous nations as sufficiently independent and self-governing to warrant a treaty process, which implies a longstanding recognition of Indigenous authority to exercise self-government; these principles have never been entirely abrogated and they therefore continue to underpin Canada's legal structure. (see Patrick Macklem, "Normative Dimensions of an Aboriginal Right to Self-Government" (1995) 21 Queen's L.J. 173, at 197).

[194] In Simon v. The Queen, [1985] 2 SCR 387, the Supreme Court addressed the interaction between the Treaty of 1752 between the Mi'kmaq and the Crown and s. 88 of the Indian Act, RSC 1985, c I-5 that provides that the general applicability of provincial law to Indians is "[s]ubject to the terms of any treaty". The decision confirms that Treaty Rights should be given "a fair, large and liberal construction" (para. 27).

[195] The Panel finds that the law on treaties is aptly summarized in Ian Peach's "More than a Section 35 Right: Indigenous Self-Government as Inherent in Canada's Constitutional Structure"[2]. The Panel entirely agrees with Ian Peach and authors John Borrows, Patrick Macklem and James Tully's characterisation of treaties in Canada's historical context and finds they concisely summarize the applicable law and context. The references below translate the Panel's views on this question. This also supports the AFN's position on treaties between First Nations and Canada.

Probably the strongest source for the authority of Indigenous peoples to exercise self-determination in the Canadian constitutional order, however, is in the confirmation and recognition by the Crown of the pre-existing and continuing sovereignty of the Indigenous peoples of Canada through the negotiation of treaties. As John Borrows comments, one of the best examples of the governance powers of Indigenous peoples is their power to make treaties with the Crown, over 350 of which were made prior to Confederation.[3] The legitimacy of Indigenous government in Canada is based not simply on the prior occupancy of the territory by Indigenous peoples, but on their prior sovereignty; as Patrick Macklem describes it, this sovereignty and Crown sovereignty were distributed, or shared, through a series of acts of mutual recognition, in the form of treaty-making.[4] The treaties manifestly considered Indigenous nations as distinct political communities with territorial boundaries within which their authority was exclusive, so that they and European settler nations were recognized one another as equal and co-existing nations, each with their own forms of government, traditions, and ways of living, and agreed to cooperate in various ways.[5] There are numerous examples of treaties between European nations and Indigenous peoples in North America that used Indigenous legal forms. These were part of a larger set of intersocietal encounters through with Indigenous and non-Indigenous participants generated norms of conduct and recognition that structured their ongoing relationships. Throughout, the Indigenous understandings of the treaties were relatively uniform, as a means by which Indigenous nations sought to retain their traditional authority over their territories and govern their communities in the face of colonial expansion.[6]

Once this form of mutual recognition was worked out, the only way the Crown could acquire land and establish sovereignty in North America was to gain the consent of the Indigenous nations, consistent with what Tully describes as the most fundamental constitutional convention, that of consent of the people.[7]

Unfortunately, as J.R. Miller notes, few non-Indigenous Canadians today appreciate that treaties, through which this mutual recognition and consent were worked out, are an important part of the foundation of the Canadian state.[8]

Crown-Indigenous treaties were regarded by both sides as constitutive of normative arrangements, a conclusion confirmed by the customary practice of renewing past commitments and redefining acceptable political conduct, for example through the annual practice of "brightening" the covenant chain in nation-to-nation councils.[9] As Mark Walters comments, the British officials involved knew perfectly well how Indigenous peoples interpreted British conduct in brightening the covenant chain, so there can be no question about whether or not there was a shared understanding or "meeting of minds".[10]

Indeed, The Treaty of Niagara of 1764, which confirmed and extended a nation-to-nation relationship between the Crown and Indigenous peoples and affirmed the covenant chain relationship, is a prime example of the British understanding of the meaning of Indigenous forms.[11] This, the first legal act that the Crown undertook after the Royal Proclamation, expressed their mutual aspiration to live together, but also to respect one another's autonomy.[12] At this event, presents were exchanged and covenant chains and wampum belts were presented to the British to establish a treaty of alliance and peace.[13] One of the belts exchanged here, the two-row wampum belt, was used by Indigenous nations to reflect their understanding of the Royal Proclamation and the Treaty as one of peace, friendship, respect, and non-interference in one another's internal affairs.[14] A second belt exchanged represented an offer of mutual support and assistance, but also respected the independence of each party.[15]

As Barsh and Henderson describe it, the treaty process produced a consensual distribution of constitutional power and established a compact between the treaty parties, thus securing to the treaties the status of constitutional documents.[16] The acceptance of a shared normative meaning > for the treaties from what both sides said and did results in the conclusion that Indigenous sovereignty and Crown sovereignty really were linked together in a genuine sense. Over time, the linkages were implicitly increased and strengthened with each present-giving ceremony until, on the eve of Confederation, it was understood that Indigenous nations enjoyed an inherent right of self-government, at least as a matter of internal sovereignty, under the protective umbrella of Crown sovereignty, in a manner consistent with Binnie J."s conception in Mitchell.[17]

> Tully refers to this as “treaty constitutionalism”, in which Indigenous peoples participate in the creation of constitutional norms to govern their relationship with the Crown, thereby taking an active role in the production of the basic legal norms governing the distribution of authority in North America.[18]

[196] While the Panel’s reasons and present ruling do not turn on the supporting doctrine referred to above, it does find it instructive and consistent with the Panel’s views on the law in regards to treaties and their important status in Canada’s constitutional framework. This supports the primacy of treaties over the Indian Act.

[197] Furthermore, in An Act to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act, SC 2008, c 30, Parliament recognized the importance of giving due regard to First Nations customary laws and legal traditions in applying the CHRA and when applying the Indian Act.:

> Aboriginal rights
>
> 1.1 For greater certainty, the repeal of section 67 of the Canadian Human Rights Act shall not be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from the protection provided for existing aboriginal or treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada by the recognition and affirmation of those rights in section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.
>
> Regard to legal traditions and customary laws
>
> 1.2 In relation to a complaint made under the Canadian Human Rights Act against a First Nation government, including a band council, tribal council or governing authority operating or administering programs and services under the Indian Act, this Act shall be interpreted and applied in a manner that gives due regard to First Nations legal traditions and customary laws, particularly the balancing of individual rights and interests against collective rights and > interests, to the extent that they are consistent with the principle of gender equality.

[198] All the above justify a broader interpretation of Jordan's Principle eligibility criteria that goes beyond the narrow parameters of the Indian Act.

H. Scope of Complaint

[199] As summarized earlier in this decision, Canada argued that the relief requested in this motion was beyond the scope of the complaint currently before the Tribunal. Again, the Panel disagrees with this assertion.

[200] The Panel already addressed the scope of the claim (complaint, Statement of Particulars, evidence, arguments, etc.) as opposed to the scope of the complaint in previous rulings and what forms part of the claim (see 2019 CHRT 39 at paras. 99-102):

> [99] When the Tribunal analyzes the claim, it reviews the complaint and also the elements contained in the Statement of Particulars in accordance with rule 6(1)d) of the Tribunal's rules of procedure (see Lindor c. Travaux publics et Services gouvernementaux Canada, 2012 TCDP 14 at para. 4, translation).
>
> [100] In fact, when the Tribunal examines the complaint, it does so in light of the principles above mentioned and in a flexible and non-formalistic manner:
>
> > "Complaint forms are not to be perused in the same manner as criminal indictments''. (Translation, see Canada (Procureur général) c. Robinson, 1994 CanLII 3490 (FCA), [1994] 3 CF 228 (CA) cited in Lindor 2012 TCDP 14 at para. 22).
> >
> > « Les formules de plainte ne doivent pas être scrutées de la même façon qu'un acte d'accusation en matière criminelle. »
>
> [101] Furthermore, this Tribunal has determined that the complaint is but one element of the claim, a first step therefore, the Tribunal must look beyond the complaint form to determine the nature of the claim:
>
> > Pursuant to Rule 6(1) of the Tribunal's Rules of Procedure (03-05-04) (the "Rules"), each party is to serve and file a Statement of Particulars ("SOP") setting out, among other things,
> >
> > (a) the material facts that the party seeks to prove in support of its case; (b) its position on the legal issues raised by the case

> (...) (see Kanagasabapathy v. Air Canada 2013 CHRT 7 at para. 3).

[102] It is important to remember that the original complaint does not serve the purposes of a pleading (Casler v. Canadian National Railway, 2017 CHRT 6 at para. 9 [Casler]; see also Gaucher v. Canadian Armed Forces, 2005 CHRT 1 at para. 10 [Gaucher]). Moreover, as explained in Casler:

> …[I]t must be kept in mind that filing a complaint is the first step in the complaint resolution process under the Act. As the Tribunal stated in Gaucher, at paragraph 11, "[i]t is inevitable that new facts and circumstances will often come to light in the course of the investigation. It follows that complaints are open to refinement". As explained in Gaucher and Casler, cited above, the complaint filed with the Commission only provides a synopsis; it will essentially become clearer during the course of the process. The conditions for the hearing are defined in the Statement of Particulars. (see also Polhill v. Keeseekoowenin, see also, First Nation 2017 CHRT 34 at paras. 34 and 36).

[201] This question was already asked and answered. The only other question to be answered on the Tribunal's jurisdiction here is if this motion goes beyond the claim or not. The Panel's response is that for issues I and II of this ruling it does not.

[202] Furthermore, the case in front of the Tribunal focused on First Nations, not Métis peoples, Inuit or Self-identified First Nations. In fact, the Panel in a ruling adding the NAN as an interested party wrote the following:

> The Assembly of First Nations and the Chiefs of Ontario represent the various First Nations communities across Canada and Ontario. The interests of First Nations children, youth and families, along with the agencies that serve them, are represented by the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada. Furthermore, the Canadian Human Rights Commission (the Commission) represents the public interest and has led the majority of the evidence in this matter, including the evidence relied upon by the Panel to make the findings in the Decision identified above about remote Ontario communities.
>
> With the assistance of these parties and interested parties, along with the NAN and INAC, the Panel believes it will have more than enough submissions to craft a meaningful and effective order in response to the [Merit] Decision,
> (see 2016 CHRT 11 at paras. 16-17).

[203] This demonstrates that the focus of the claim revolved around First Nations representatives who had standing in this case and who were part of this complaint. Any clarification exercise on the terms “all First Nations children” is not unfair or outside this claim. Additionally, the Panel referred to the term communities over a hundred times in the Merit Decision and always believed First Nations communities should define themselves. This transpired in the Panel’s rulings especially in 2018 CHRT 4.

[204] Moreover, the Complainants’ Statement of Particulars alleged that underfunding of the FNCFS Program infringed Jordan’s Principle, and sought very broad relief to redress discriminatory practices in “…the application of Jordan’s Principle to federal government programs affecting children…”. The prayer for relief thus was not limited to the FNCFS program, or tied to Indian Act status or reserve residency.

[205] The issues pleaded are thus broad enough to encompass the clarification now being sought regarding eligibility under Jordan’s Principle.

[206] Furthermore, the Tribunal has already made rulings dealing with the scope and meaning of Jordan’s Principle, clarifying that it is not restricted to the resolution of jurisdictional disputes and that it applies to a broad range of services both on and off reserve. The Tribunal has retained jurisdiction over the implementation of its rulings and orders and the current motion simply seeks clarification of a matter that was not specifically addressed in those previous rulings – namely, who is eligible to receive the benefits that the Tribunal has already identified and described.

[207] The current motion asks the Tribunal for clarification intended to assist with such implementation and is squarely within the scope of the Tribunal’s retained jurisdiction.

[208] In the interim ruling, new evidence filed as part of the interim motion for further relief was considered by the Panel to arrive at its findings and order. The Caring Society had recently intervened to pay for medical transportation for a young First Nations child living off-reserve and without Indian Act status who required a medical diagnostic service, an essential scan, to address a life-threatening condition because Canada would not pay due to the child’s off reserve residence and lack of Indian Act status.

[209] The Panel found that the lack of Indian Act status was the primary reason for the refusal to cover the medical transportation costs:

> The fact that the child is not covered under Jordan's Principle for lack of status is the focus of the refusal,
>
> (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 69).

[210] The Panel found Canada's denial to be unreasonable:

> […] the outcome of S.J.'s case is unreasonable. The coverage under Jordan's Principle was denied because S.J.'s mother registered under 6(2) of the Indian Act and could not transmit status to her in light of the second-generation cut-off rule. This is the main reason why S.J.'s travel costs were refused. The second reason is that it was not deemed urgent by Canada when in fact the situation was not assessed appropriately. Finally, no one seems to have turned their minds to the needs of the child and her best interests. There is no indication that a substantive equality analysis has been employed here. Rather a bureaucratic approach was applied for denying coverage for a child of just over 18 months (Canada's team described the child has being 1 year and a half old, see affidavit of Dr. Valerie Gideon, dated December 21st, 2018, email chain at Exhibit F), who has been waiting for this scan from birth. This type of bureaucratic approach in Programs was linked to discrimination in the [Merit] Decision (see at paras. 365-382 and 391).
> (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 73).

I. Conclusion

[211] The question is two-fold. The first part is the following:

> Should First Nations children without Indian Act status who are recognized as citizens or members of their respective First Nations be included under Jordan's Principle?

[212] The Panel, in light of the reasons outlined above, answers yes to this question. A mechanism ordered to eradicate discrimination must, in order to be effective in eradicating discrimination, be responsive to the entirety of the discrimination and apply a human rights framework. If services are offered, they must be offered in a manner respecting substantive equality and, in this case, inherent Indigenous human rights including self-determination. An eligibility criteria under Jordan's Principle ought to respect the protected rights discussed above such as First Nations Self-government agreements, treaties, customs, laws, traditions, the UNDRIP.

[213] The second part is the following:

> If the previously noted First Nations children are included in the eligibility criteria, does it automatically grant them services or does it only trigger the second part of the process, namely 1) a case-by-case approach and 2) respecting the inherent right to self-determination of First Nations to determine their citizens and/or members before the child is considered to be a Jordan's Principle case?

[214] The Panel believes that it is the latter. Moreover, ensuring that First Nations children without Indian Act status who are recognized as citizens and/or members of their respective First Nations are not excluded automatically from Jordan's Principle does not necessarily mean that they receive services under Jordan's Principle because there is a need to achieve a case-by-case analysis. Nothing prevents the analysis to assess what services are required, if the province provides them, whether the child needs services above the normative standard, etc.

[215] Instead of excluding children based on assumptions, an effective approach in line with human rights and substantive equality and consistent with the Panel's previous rulings which did not focus on the Indian Act or on-reserve residency would be to include them in Jordan's Principle, get them "through the door" and do the verification of the particular case to see if the child is a citizen and/or a member of a First Nation according to a process proposed by First Nations that is also reasonably workable for Canada.

[216] Consequently, in light of the above and the Panel's Jordan's Principle definition, Canada's history of discrimination, the current rule of law, evolving case law and the need to craft effective remedies that do not condone other forms of discrimination, "all First Nations children" also includes First Nations children without Indian Act status who are recognized as citizens and/or members of their respective First Nations regardless of where they live, whether on or off-reserve.

[217] The Panel clarifies that in the spirit of its past findings, reasons, analysis, Merit Decision and previous rulings and orders and human rights laws namely the CHRA and the UNDRIP, it is appropriate for Canada to consider First Nations children who do not have Indian Act status but are recognized as citizens and/or members of their respective Nations in accordance with their customs, laws, traditions, treaties and Self-government agreements to be considered eligible for services under Jordan's Principle.

[218] The Panel disagrees with Canada's position on this point and does not view this issue as outside its jurisdiction or outside the scope of the present claim given the historical and legal context forming part of this claim including Canada's acceptance of the Merit Decision and subsequent rulings especially 2018 CHRT 4 where Canada signed and confirmed its full acceptation of the Panel's reasons and orders. Again, this ruling also dealt with the importance of aligning human rights protected by the CHRA with the UNDRIP as explained above. Moreover, as already mentioned, the Panel did not narrow its view of Jordan's Principle services to First Nations children within the confinements of the Indian Act.

[219] Given the Panel's clarification above, the next step for this section is to address the meaning of "All First Nations children" for Jordan's Principle purposes. In considering the First Nations parties' requests in this case, the Panel opts to request the parties to discuss and generate potential eligibility criteria under Jordan's Principle only and in considering the Panel's clarification reasons outlined above.

[220] Additionally, contentious views arose from the interim order (2019 CHRT 7) and in discussions surrounding the process to allow First Nations to identify their citizens and/or members without placing a burden on First Nations who may not have capacity to address those requests in the short timeframe prescribed under Jordan's Principle. The Panel sought the parties' views to ensure that Canada has an effective way to verify if a First Nations child without Indian Act status is recognized by a First Nation. The COO brought many concerns and suggestions on the issue of potential liability for First Nations who, given they lack capacity, may not respond in time or may not respond at all to requests for identification of their citizens or members. The COO suggested that the Tribunal declare that this ruling does not impose any duty of care or responsibility on First Nations, and/or order Canada to indemnify First Nations for any liability they may incur.

[221] In sum, the Commission submits that with respect to negating future duties of care or liability, it must be remembered that the Tribunal is a creature of statute. Its mandate is to conduct hearings into alleged violations of the CHRA, and where infringements are found, to determine appropriate remedies under s. 53. The Tribunal does not have jurisdiction to make rulings that would purport to negate any private law duties of care that First Nations might owe as a matter of common or civil law. Further, even in the context of the CHRA, one panel of the Tribunal does not have the power to make a ruling that would compel the Commission (as gate-keeper) or future panels (as quasi-judicial decision-makers) to reach particular results, regardless of the facts and arguments that may be before them. This would unduly fetter future decision-making, and unfairly restrict the rights of any parties to those hypothetical future cases.

[222] The Commission also does not feel it would be appropriate at this point to order that Canada always indemnify First Nations for liabilities incurred in connection with requests for recognition. Such an order would likely be outside the Tribunal's jurisdiction, to the extent it sought to impose requirements to indemnify First Nations for liability incurred at common or civil law. Even within the CHRA scheme, one can imagine situations where discriminatory practices within a First Nation might make it more appropriate for the First Nation, rather than Canada, to bear responsibility for any infringements. Overall, the better approach would be to leave such matters to be determined in the context of future cases, using mechanisms and principles that already exist as a matter of human rights law.

[223] The Panel entirely agrees with the Commission's submissions above and believes it is the correct legal interpretation to apply in this case.

[224] The Panel finds the AFN's suggestion below to be helpful and a potential solution in identifying First Nations children under Jordan's Principle that addresses some of the concerns raised by the COO and Canada:

> With respect to verifying applicants under Jordan's Principle who are non-registered Indians without status, and residing or ordinarily resident off reserve, the AFN submits a solution exists in providing written notice and/or consulting the appropriate First Nations community. This is already an established practice regarding family and child matters under provincial child welfare legislation, such as Part X under Ontario's Child and Family Services

> Act.[19] It is also part of the Bill C-92, An Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, for example, under the current ss. 12, 13 and 20.[20]
>
> (see AFN submissions at para. 66).
>
> The AFN submits that by providing written notice and/or consultation, that could come in the form of a standardized letter which does not contain personal information, it offers the First Nations community the opportunity to confirm or deny, if it chooses, whether an applicant is indeed a member of the community. To be clear, the applicant ought to identify a connection with a particular First Nations community, and Canada ought to notify and/or consult that First Nations about the request to access services under Jordan's Principle.
>
> (see AFN submissions at para. 67).
> The application ought to proceed on the presumption that there is a connection to a First Nations community, so if the First Nations community does not respond, then the application is undisturbed. Under this presumption, Canada's logistical and operational concerns about "recognition as a member by their nation" are sufficiently addressed.[21] However, if the First Nations community responds, and denies there is a connection between the applicant and community, then Canada ought to make a determination whether the applicant is indeed eligible and whether the services ought to be offered.

[225] The Panel agrees with Canada that it cannot order First Nations who are not parties to do anything. The Panel does not impose the verification of the identity of the First Nations child on the First Nation but on Canada who is a party to these proceedings. The obligation is on Canada to provide all First Nations an opportunity to participate in identifying First Nations children for the purposes of Jordan's Principle eligibility. Additionally, the elaboration of the identification process as per the Panel's orders concerns First Nations who are parties to these proceedings and recognizes their expertise and valuable input in determining an identification process.

[226] Moreover, a process seeking the First Nations' viewpoints on the First Nations child's citizenship and/or membership is in line with their inherent right of self-determination and aims to recognize their right to determine who their citizens/members are. It also moves [19] Child and Family Services Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.11, Part X (Indian and Native Child and Family Services).

[20] Bill C-92, An Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, 1st Session, 42nd Parliament, Canada, December 3, 2015, ss. 12, 13, 20, House of Commons Second Reading.
[21] Affidavit of Leila Gillis, affirmed March 7, 2019, paras 5-9.

away from the issue of self-identification alone determining First Nations identity. The Panel finds that the AFN's suggestion for a recognition process potentially addresses Canada's concerns.

[227] Finally, on Canada's argument that the Tribunal must respect the division of powers between the Federal and Provincial governments and that off-reserve services are outside the purview of this claim preventing the Panel to make the orders requested, the Panel relies on the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Daniels:

> Moreover, this Court has been clear that federal authority under s. 91(24) does not bar valid provincial schemes that do not impair the core of the "Indian" power: NIL/TU,O Child and Family Services Society v. B.C. Government and Service Employees' Union, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 696, at para. 3.
> (see Daniels at para. 51).

[228] The Panel finds the issue discussed in this section falls squarely within the core of the Indian power and forms part of this claim.

J. Order

[229] Pursuant to section 53 (2) of the CHRA, the AFN, the Caring Society, the Commission, the COO, the NAN and Canada are ordered

1. to consult in order to generate potential eligibility criteria for First Nations children under Jordan's Principle and in considering the Panel's previous orders and clarification explained above and

2. to establish a mechanism to identify citizens and/or members of First Nations that is timely, effective and considers the implementation concerns raised by all parties. In considering the identification mechanism, discussions should also include the need for First Nations to receive additional funds to respond and, in some cases build capacity, to answer Canada's identification requests for First Nations children. The mechanism should also include provision for additional and sustainable funding to account for the children who will now be included under Jordan's Principle.

[230] The parties will return to the Tribunal with their potential eligibility criteria and mechanism by October 19, 2020.

V. Issue II

> First Nations children, residing on or off reserve, who do not have Indian Act status and who are not eligible for Indian Act status, but have a parent/guardian with, or who is eligible for, Indian Act status.

A. Legal framework

[231] As mentioned above, the Panel in the Merit Decision, applied the tests found in Moore and Bombardier., (see 2016 CHRT 2 at paras. 22-25). The Panel finds it is still applicable and will apply the same tests again for issues two and three of this ruling.

[232] Furthermore, the majority in Battlefords and District Co-operative Ltd. v. Gibbs, [1996] 3 SCR 566 [Gibbs] articulated a two-stage framework to determine claims for discrimination in an insurance benefits plan. The first step is to determine the true character of or underlying rationale of the benefits plan in this case, Jordan's Principle, which was already explained above. The second step is to consider whether benefits differ as a result of protected characteristics that are not relevant to the stated purpose. This analysis has subsequently been applied to other ameliorative programs (e.g. an employment policy in Lavoie v. Treasury Board of Canada, 2008 CHRT 27 at para. 136).

[233] Gibbs predates the establishment of the current three-part prima facie test for discrimination articulated in Moore at paragraph 33 and affirmed subsequently in Bombardier at paragraph. 35-54 and Stewart v. Elk Valley Coal Corp., 2017 SCC 30 at para. 24. The test requires that a complainant have a characteristic protected from discrimination under the CHRA; that they experienced a denial and/or an adverse impact with respect to the service; and that the protected characteristic was a factor in the denial and/or adverse impact.

[234] In Canadian Elevator Industry Welfare Trust Fund v. Skinner, 2018 NSCA 31 [Skinner], the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal persuasively articulated how the Gibbs test could be applied within the prima facie test for discrimination articulated in Moore. In particular, the Court used Gibbs to analyze whether the protected characteristic was a factor in the adverse impact (Skinner at paras. 52-70). This approach is consistent with the approach taken by Member Bélanger in Hicks v. Human Resources and Skills Development Canada, 2013 CHRT 20, aff'd Canada (Attorney General) v. Hicks, 2015 FC 599 where he first determined that the complainant had a protected characteristic and suffered an adverse treatment before applying Gibbs.

[235] In summary, in alleging an ameliorative program is under inclusive, the burden remains with the complainant to establish a prima facie case of discrimination. The complainant must establish that they have a characteristic protected from discrimination under the CHRA, that they were denied and/or experienced an adverse impact with respect to the service, and that the protected characteristic was a factor in the denial and/or adverse impact. In order to demonstrate that the protected characteristic was a factor in the denial and/or adverse impact, it is open to the complainant to use the Gibbs framework in which the first step is to identify the true character or underlying rationale of the ameliorative program. The second step is to consider whether program benefits differ as a result of protected characteristics that are not relevant to the stated purpose.

[236] The Panel described Jordan's Principle as a substantive equality mechanism to ensure that First Nations children access governmental services, they need without experiencing gaps, delays or denials. For clarity, Jordan's Principle is not a program, it is considered a legal rule by Canada. This was already established in the past (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 25). However, the Panel finds the Gibbs test applicable and useful in analyzing eligibility for services under Jordan's Principle.

[237] Canada's position appears to be that it considers Indigenous children, including those without Indian Act status, who are ordinarily resident on reserve to be within the scope of Jordan's Principle. This includes the First Nations children in this issue ordinarily resident on reserve. Therefore, the central dispute here is with respect to First Nations children residing off-reserve who are not eligible for Indian Act status but have a parent who is.

[238] The Panel believes that is does have jurisdiction to examine this category of children as part of this claim without unduly expanding the scope of the complaint in any way. The Jordan's Principle distinction based on the Indian Act was made by Canada and raised after the Merit Decision. As already explained above, the Panel did not focus its Merit Decision on considerations under the Indian Act. Additionally, Jordan's Principle applies on and off-reserve given its substantive equality nature and its goal to enable First Nations children to access services that are culturally appropriate and safe and account for intergenerational trauma and other relevant specific needs that may only be addressed in providing services that could be considered above normative standards. While Jordan's Principle can include FNCFS, it is broader than the part of the complaint addressing on-reserve FNCFS services. The Panel clearly made this distinction in its Merit Decision and subsequent rulings providing clarification based on the evidence in front of the Tribunal.

[239] In light of the Panel's past findings and rulings and its reasons on issue I, the Panel considered if any off-reserve First Nations children who do not have Indian Act status and who are not eligible for Indian Act status, but have a parent/guardian with, or who is eligible for, Indian Act status and have actual needs for services that (i) go beyond normative standards of care, and (ii) are rooted in the kinds of historical and contemporary disadvantages that breathes life into the substantive equality analysis – such as the legacies of stereotyping, prejudice, colonialism, displacement, and intergenerational trauma relating to Residential Schools or the Sixties Scoop – is eligible for Jordan's Principle services. For the reasons outlined below, the Panel finds there is an evidentiary and legal basis that off-reserve children who do not have Indian Act status and who are not eligible for Indian Act status, but have a parent/guardian with, or who is eligible for, Indian Act status share the same characteristics and have similar needs as the other First Nations children eligible for Jordan's Principle services but these children are denied the benefit of those services because of Indian Act status distinctions based in whole or in part on the prohibited ground of race and/or national or ethnic origin.

[240] The first element in the prima facie discrimination test is relatively simple in this case: race and national or ethnic origin are prohibited grounds of discrimination under section 3 of the CHRA. There was no dispute that First Nations possess these characteristics. The Supreme Court decision in Daniels determined that First Nations without Indian Act status, and regardless of their parents' Indian Act status, are "Indians" for the purposes of 91(24) of the Constitution Act of 1867. Therefore, a First Nations child who does not have Indian Act status and who is not eligible for Indian Act status, but has a parent/guardian with, or who is eligible for, Indian Act status possesses the same characteristics as registered or eligible to be registered First Nations children namely race and national or ethnic origin protected under the CHRA. Moreover, the Panel never made this distinction in the Merit Decision since it viewed First Nations and the protected ground of race and national or ethnic origin in a broader sense given the reasons explained above.

[241] The second element in the prima facie discrimination test is that the First Nations child who does not have Indian Act status and who is not eligible for Indian Act status, but has a parent/guardian with, or who is eligible for, Indian Act must experience a denial and/or adverse impact in the services provided by Canada under Jordan's Principle.

[242] Based on the findings made in the interim ruling, it is clear that a First Nations child living off-reserve who does not have Indian Act status and who is not eligible for Indian Act status, but has a parent/guardian with, or who is eligible for, Indian Act status is denied services by not being considered eligible to receive Jordan's Principle services, with some exceptions, since Canada considers those children to be receiving provincial services. Under the Panel's substantive equality mandatory definition in 2017 CHRT 14 at paragraph 135, Canada must also provide culturally appropriate and safe services that may be considered above normative standards to all First Nations children on and off-reserve.

[243] However, Canada's eligibility criteria exclude First Nations children without Indian Act status even if one of their parents has status or is eligible for status under 6(2) of the Indian Act. The reason behind this is because a parent that has 6(2) Indian Act status cannot transmit it to their children. This is what the AFN resolution above described as the erosion of First Nations. The issue here in the provision of services is that because Canada unilaterally imposes the Indian Act as the criteria for access to services under Jordan's Principle a situation may arise of two siblings sharing only one parent registered under 6(2) of the Indian Act being treated differently for Jordan's Principle eligibility. The child whose second parent is registered under 6(1) of the Indian Act may be considered eligible for Jordan's Principle services. On the other hand, the child whose second parent is not eligible for registration under the Indian Act may not be eligible for Jordan's Principle services. The Panel finds that benefits to First Nations children differ as a result of protected characteristics that are not relevant to Jordan's Principle's stated purpose of substantive equality for First Nations children. There is no doubt that this outcome is discriminatory and should not be the criteria used to remedy the discrimination found in this case.

[244] We are not discussing a self-identified First Nations person who had a First Nations ancestor twelve generations ago here. We are discussing First Nations children who, but for the discriminatory way in which the Indian Act categorizes them, are denied services under Jordan's Principle meant to address substantive equality. Jordan's Principle accounts for these children's specific needs as well as the legacies of stereotyping, prejudice, colonialism and displacement, and intergenerational trauma relating to Residential Schools or the Sixties Scoop. Moreover, the Panel already found that > AANDC's role in responding to Jordan's Principle is by virtue of the range of social programs it provides to First Nations people, including: special education; assisted living; income assistance; and, the FNCFS Program (see 2009 MOU on Jordan's Principle at pp. 1-2),

> (see 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 355).

[245] Additionally, Health Canada and Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada (AANDC), now ISC, has "a role to play in supporting improved integration and linkages between federal and provincial health and social services" (2013 MOU on Jordan's Principle at p. 1), (see 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 358).

[246] As already noted, the evidence before the Tribunal and findings indicated that a child who was living off reserve, was not recognized as being ordinarily resident on reserve, and was not eligible for Indian Act status registration was denied a service above normative standards. The child, who was an infant, was waiting for an essential scan prescribed by a physician in order to assist in determining the appropriate treatment and operation for a rare and serious medical condition (see 2019 CHRT 7 at paras. 64 and 72). The Panel found that the fact that the child was not covered under Jordan's Principle for lack of status was the focus of the refusal (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 69).

[247] Moreover, in the interim ruling the Panel found the outcome of the child's case unreasonable. The coverage under Jordan's Principle was denied because the child's mother is registered under 6(2) of the Indian Act and could not transmit status to her child in light of the second-generation cut-off rule. This is the main reason why the child's travel costs were refused (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 73).

[248] Thirdly, as demonstrated above, race and national or ethnic origin is a factor in the denial of services namely above normative standard and culturally appropriate and safe under Jordan's Principle. A child with a parent who is registered under 6(2) of the Indian Act and with a parent with no status or eligibility to status will be treated differently than a child who has a parent registered under 6(1) of the Indian Act. No other children in Canada will be categorized in this manner, only First Nations children. Therefore, "finding a mirror group may be impossible, as the essence of an individual's or group's equality claim may be that, in light of their distinct needs and circumstances, no one is like them for the purposes of comparison" (see Withler v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 12 at para. 59). Moreover, the same reasons and findings in the Merit Decision in terms of substantive equality and race and/or national or ethnic origin apply to this unilaterally created by Canada category of eligible First Nations children, (see for example 2016 CHRT 2 at paras. 395-467).

> In General Comment 18, thirty-seventh session, 10 November 1989 at paragraph 7, the UNHRC stated that the term "discrimination" as used in the ICCPR should be understood to imply:
>
> > any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference which is based on any ground such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status, and which has the purpose or effect of nullifying or impairing the recognition, enjoyment or exercise by all persons, on an equal footing, of all rights and freedoms.
>
> Moreover, the Panel relied on General Comment No. 18 of the UNHRC's stating "that the aim of the protection is substantive equality, and to achieve this aim States may be required to take specific measures" (see at paras. 5, 8, and 12-13).
>
> (see Merit Decision at para. 440, emphasis added).

[249] The Panel found in the Merit Decision the narrow definition and inadequate implementation of Jordan's Principle, resulting in service gaps, delays and denials for First Nations children again, while it did include on-reserve First Nations children in Jordan's Principle, it did not restrict it to only those on-reserve or on any reliance on the Indian Act criteria (see 2016 CHRT at paras. 351-355, 360-381 and 458).

[250] Furthermore, the Panel relied on General Comment No. 20 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 993 U.N.T.S. 3 (the ICESCR) that stated that

> [t]he ICESCR is considered to be of progressive application. However, in General Comment No. 20, 2 July 2009 (E/C.12/GC/20), the CESCR stated that, given their importance, the principles of equality and non-discrimination are of immediate application, notwithstanding the provisions of article 2 of the ICESR (see paras. 5 and 7). The CESCR also affirmed that the aim of the ICESCR is to achieve substantive equality by "…paying sufficient attention to groups of individuals which suffer historical or persistent prejudice instead of merely comparing the formal treatment of individuals in similar situations" (at paras. 8; see also paras. 9 and 10). It added that the exercise of covenant rights should not be conditional on a person's place of residence (see at para. 34),
> (see 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 442, emphasis added).

[251] Moreover, the Panel already found that

> [c]oordination amongst all federal departments and programs, especially AANDC and Health Canada programs, would help avoid these gaps in services to First Nations children in need
>
> (see 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 381, emphasis added).
>
> More importantly, Jordan's Principle is meant to apply to all First Nations children
> (see 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 382, emphasis added).

[252] Furthermore, Canada itself admitted that Federal Programs are more residency based than Indian Act based. Additionally, while Jordan's Principle is meant to address jurisdictional disputes amongst Federal Departments it also addresses jurisdictional disputes amongst the Federal government and Provincial and Territorial governments which clearly indicates that off-reserve considerations also form part of Jordan's Principle's process.

B. The discriminatory impact of section 6(2) of the Indian Act and its adverse effects on First Nations children [253] On this point the parties have argued that the unanimous Supreme Court of Canada decision Canadian Human Rights Commission v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 SCC 31 to support their respective positions. This decision was a combined appeal from the judicial review of two decisions before the Tribunal: Matson et al. v. Indian and Northern Affairs Canada, 2013 CHRT 13 [Matson] and Roger William Andrews and Roger William Andrews on behalf of Michelle Dominique Andrews v. Indian and Northern Affairs Canada, 2013 CHRT 21 [Andrews].

[254] The two Tribunal decisions were first affirmed by the Federal Court and the Federal Court of Appeal and finally affirmed by a unanimous Supreme Court of Canada decision. The Matson and Andrews decisions are well known by the Panel given that each Panel Member rendered one of the two decisions.

[255] Section 6 of the Indian Act defines the various persons who are entitled to be registered as “Indian”. In Matson, the complainants claimed that, due to their matrilineal Indian heritage, they are treated differently in their registration under subsection 6(2) of the Indian Act, when compared to those whose lineage is paternal and are registered under subsection 6(1). Namely, registration under subsection 6(2) does not allow the complainants to pass on their status to their children. In Andrews, the issue was the previous enfranchisement provisions of the Indian Act. According to the complainant, had his father not enfranchised, he would have been entitled to registration under section 6(1), as opposed to his current status under 6(2). With subsection 6(1) status, the complainant would then be able to pass 6(2) status along to his daughter.

[256] Both complaints were argued under section 5 of the CHRA as discriminatory practices in the provision of a “service”. That is, Indian registration was argued to be a “service” within the meaning of section 5 of the CHRA. The Tribunal disagreed. While the processing of registration applications by the then INAC could be viewed as a service, the Tribunal found that the resulting status or lack thereof could not. INAC did not, and ISC now does not, have any involvement in determining the criteria for entitlement to be registered, or not registered, as an Indian under section 6 of the Indian Act. Nor does it have any discretion in determining entitlement to be registered, or not registered, as an Indian pursuant to the criteria in section 6 of the Indian Act. Entitlement was determined by Parliament, not INAC, through section 6 of the Indian Act; and INAC was obliged to follow this section in processing applications for registration.

[257] Therefore, the Tribunal was of the view that the complaints were challenges to section 6 of the Indian Act and nothing else. Pursuant to the Federal Court of Appeal's decision in Public Service Alliance of Canada v. Canada Revenue Agency, 2012 FCA 7 [Murphy], the Tribunal determined that complaints aimed at legislation per se, and nothing else, fall outside the scope of the CHRA. An attempt to counter the application of legislation based solely on its alleged discriminatory impact would better be addressed by a constitutional challenge. The Tribunal also rejected additional arguments, i.e. (1) that Murphy was superseded by other Supreme Court of Canada authorities regarding the primacy of human rights legislation; (2) that provincial human rights bodies had accepted that human rights legislation could render legislation inoperable; and, (3) that current and former provisions of the CHRA (including the former s. 67) indicated Parliament's intent to allow challenges to legislation under the Act.

[258] With the repeal of section 67 of the CHRA, the Tribunal now has the jurisdiction to consider discrimination complaints emanating from the application of the Indian Act.

[259] In these two decisions, the Tribunal provides analysis and interpretation of the CHRA. Some examples of the Tribunal's analysis include the Tribunal's determination that the complaint could be dismissed as a challenge to legislation, interpretation of the term "service" as used in s. 5, and a determination regarding the primacy of human rights legislation.

[260] However, the case at hand can absolutely be distinguished from the Matson and Andrews cases given that the Panel found in the Merit Decision and subsequent rulings there are discriminatory practices that need to be eradicated. In Andrews, the Panel Chair Sophie Marchildon in this case chairing the Andrews case, wrote on the Indian Act's purpose. The following comments in particular are relevant for this ruling:

> Indian status is a legal construct created by the federal government. Through various provisions of the Indian Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-5 [the Indian Act] and its prior enactments, the federal government has defined the persons who are entitled to registration as "Indian". The statutory concept of "Indian" from early colonialism to the present day does not reflect the traditional or current customs of First Nations peoples for defining their social organization and its membership (see McIvor v. The Registrar, Indian and Northern Affairs Canada, 2007 BCSC 827 at paras. 8-12 [McIvor]),
> (see Andrews at para.1).

[261] Additionally, in Andrews, the issue of the need to establish the existence of a discriminatory practice was discussed and is particularly helpful in this case:

> I do not read these cases as foregoing the jurisdictional requirement for the Tribunal to find the existence of a "discriminatory practice" within the meaning of the Act
>
> (see Andrews at para. 78)
>
> This only further confirms the conclusion which I have already made, namely that while the Supreme Court has affirmed the primacy of human rights legislation, this principle applies to a "discriminatory practice" under the Act
>
> (see Andrews at para. 85, emphasis added).
>
> While my reasoning precludes challenges of decisions and/or actions which emanate directly from the Indian Act, decisions and/or actions which constitute a "discriminatory practice" pursuant to sections 5 to 25 of the Act and which would have previously been made "under the authority" of the Indian Act now fall within the Tribunal's jurisdiction. The fact that the Tribunal has already started to see cases of this kind is further evidence of this (See for example Louie and Beattie v. Indian and Northern Affairs Canada, 2011 CHRT 2),
> (see Andrews at para. 107, emphasis added).

[262] This case at hand is not a challenge to the Indian Act legislation. This case deals with discriminatory services and the use of a discretionary discriminatory criteria for eligibility purposes under Jordan's Principle. Furthermore, this ruling does not propose to strike down section 6(2) of the Indian Act as this was not properly brought before the Panel and this is not the appropriate way to do so. However, insofar as it conflicts with the CHRA and human rights protected under the CHRA in the presence of discrimination that the Tribunal is seeking to eliminate, the quasi-constitutional CHRA supersedes the Indian Act.

[263] Furthermore, the Panel finds that Canada uses its discretion to establish Indian Act registration or entitlement to registration eligibility criteria to restrict access and therefore deny Jordan's Principle services to First Nations children residing off reserve, who do not have Indian Act status and who are not eligible for Indian Act status, but have a parent/guardian with, or who is eligible for, Indian Act status. Relying on the discriminatory criteria of the Indian Act adversely differentiates between siblings or other family members because of a second-generation cut-off rule that is meant to assimilate and erode First Nations citizenship. This amounts to discrimination and runs counter to what the Panel is aiming to achieve in this case, namely to ensure Canada ceases the discriminatory practice and takes measures to redress the practice or to prevent the same or a similar practice from occurring in future (see section 53 (2) a of the CHRA). The Panel chair in her final remarks in a previous ruling wrote that "[g]iven the recognition that a Nation is also formed by its population, the systematic removal of children from a Nation affects the Nation's very existence", (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 452).

[264] To arrive to its conclusion, the Panel follows a similar analysis and approach to that taken by Member Lustig in Beattie v. Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada, 2014 CHRT 1. In that case, the Tribunal addressed whether AANDC discriminated against Joyce Beattie in relation to her entitlement for Indian Act registration. Shortly after birth, Ms. Beattie was adopted through a custom adoption by parents who had Indian Act status in a different Indian Act Band than her birth mother. Once the Gender Equity in Indian Registration Act, S.C. 2010 c. 18 amended the Indian Act, Ms. Beattie's grandchildren became eligible for Indian Act status if Ms. Beattie had s. 6(1)(c) Indian Act status through her adopted parents but not if she had s. 6(1)(f) through her birth parents. AANDC refused, for a period of about two and a half years, to recognize Ms. Beattie's custom adoption and registered her under s. 6(1)(f). AANDC similarly refused to allow Ms. Beattie to have her name removed from her birth mother's Band list.

[265] The Tribunal found that the complaint was substantiated. The Tribunal found that processing an application for Indian Act registration constituted a service under s. 5 of the CHRA. Indian Act registration is work done by government employees on behalf of an applicant so that benefits may flow to that individual. The Tribunal found that AANDC's decisions were discretionary decisions within the scope of the CHRA. The complaint was not a disguised attack on the Indian Act itself. AANDC's eventual recognition of Ms. Beattie's entitlement to registration through her adoptive parents and eventual removal from her birth mother's Band list confirmed that AANDC had discretion in how it interpreted the Indian Act. As such, AANDC had an obligation to choose a broad, liberal and purposive interpretation of the Indian Act that was consistent with human rights principles and did not discriminate on the basis of family status.

[266] Similarly, ISC has confirmed it uses its discretion in determining who is eligible to receive Jordan's Principle services:

> When a request is submitted on behalf of a non-status child, the Jordan's Principle Focal Point works with the requestor to understand if the child would be eligible for registration by learning about the parents' status, potential status under Bill S-3, as well as with the Office of the Indian Registrar. If there is uncertainty as to the eligibility of the child, the Focal Point can err on the side of caution and approve the request within the domain of "best interests of the child", particularly where there are concerns about meeting the ordered timeframes (see Dr. Valerie Gideon's affidavit, dated December 21st, 2018, at paras. 35-39)
>
> (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 42).

[267] Additionally, this Panel has already indicated its desire to ensure remedies do not condone another form of discrimination:

> The Panel also wants to ensure to craft effective remedies that eliminate discrimination and prevent it from reoccurring. Needless to say, it cannot condone a different form of discrimination while it makes its orders for remedies
>
> (2019 CHRT 7 at para. 22).

[268] The interim relief order informs the required analysis under Jordan's Principle:

> 1. First Nations children without Indian Act status who live off-reserve but are recognized as members by their Nation, and 2. who have urgent and/or life-threatening needs. In evaluating urgent and/or life-threatening needs due consideration must be given to the seriousness of the child's condition and the evaluation of the child made by a physician, a health professional or other professionals involved in the child's assessment. Canada should ensure that the need to address gaps in services, the need to eliminate all forms > of discrimination, the principle of substantive equality and human rights including Indigenous rights, the best interests of the child, the UNDRIP and the Convention on the Rights of the Child guide all decisions concerning First Nations children.

>
> (2019 CHRT 7 at paras. 89, original emphasis omitted and new emphasis added).

C. S-3 and Enfranchisement provisions

[269] The Panel sees no reason why First Nations children who will inevitably become eligible to receive services under Jordan's Principle because of their eligibility for registration and obtaining status under the Indian Act following S-3 amendments should wait for Canada's process to implement the changes before they can obtain services such as above normative standards and culturally appropriate and safe services. Otherwise, those soon-to-have Indian Act status children will experience unnecessary delays and may, where applicable, ask for retroactive services once they obtain Indian Act status. Following substantive equality principles and given the history and discriminatory impacts found in the Merit Decision and subsequent rulings and of the Indian Act, Canada is ordered pursuant to section 53 (2) of the CHRA to immediately consider eligible for Jordan's Principle services those First Nations children who will become eligible for Indian Act registration/status under S-3 implementation. The same reasoning applies to parents who will become eligible to obtain registration/status under S-3 implementation.

[270] Finally, on this point, the same reasoning should apply to those parents of First Nations children in need of Jordan's Principle services above normative standards and culturally appropriate and safe services who were enfranchised and are now eligible for registration under the Indian Act.

[271] It appears that Canada is raising a bona fide cost defence under section 15(1)(g) and 15(2) of the CHRA when Canada submits that an inclusive definition of a "First Nations child" would "risk leaving the needs of those children who are properly the subject of the complaint, unmet." While the argument that Canada's resources are not unlimited has merit, aside from this assertion no sufficient evidence was brought forward to support such a statement. Therefore, the Panel finds this argument unconvincing.

D. Order

[272] The Panel pursuant to section 53 (2) of the CHRA orders the AFN, the Caring Society, the Commission, the COO, the NAN and Canada to include as part of their consultations for the order in section I, First Nations children who do not have Indian Act status and who are not eligible for Indian Act status, but have a parent/guardian with, or who is eligible for, Indian Act status.

[273] Further, Canada is ordered to immediately consider eligible for Jordan's Principle services those First Nations children who will become eligible for Indian Act registration/status under S-3 implementation.

VI. Issue III

> First Nations children, residing off reserve, who have lost their connection to their First Nations communities due to the operation of the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop, or discrimination within the FNCFS Program.

A. Structure

[274] This last section will deal with two additional categories:

- First Nations children without Indian Act status, residing off reserve, who have lost their connection to their First Nations communities due to the operation of the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop, or discrimination within the FNCFS Program.
- First Nations children without Indian Act status, residing off reserve, who have lost their connection to their First Nations communities due to other reasons.

[275] As already discussed under the previous issue, the Panel understands Canada's position to be that it already considers Indigenous children living on reserve to be within the scope of Jordan's Principle and the Panel anticipates that would apply to the First Nations children under this heading who are living on reserve.

[276] The Panel made numerous findings, rulings and orders under Jordan's Principle all accepted by Canada. The Panel continues to retain jurisdiction concerning those orders to monitor the implementation and in ensuring that the discrimination found in this case is eliminated. Therefore, the Panel has jurisdiction to deal with these requests in determining the effectiveness of its orders in light of the evidence it has before it and the discrimination found in this case.

B. Analysis

[277] There is no doubt that the Tribunal has jurisdiction to analyze this request given that Jordan's Principle is within this claim and the Panel has retained jurisdiction over its orders. The Panel therefore has jurisdiction to clarify its orders and make further orders when necessary when supported by the evidence before it.

[278] The Panel will address the two categories referred to above interchangeably given the fact that the legal framework discussed below applies to both categories.

[279] Despite the lack of evidence referred to and relied upon by the parties in support of this issue three request, the Panel extensively reviewed the evidence before it. In reviewing the record, the Panel reviewed the Parties' Statements of Particulars, the Parties' final arguments, the evidence the Parties relied on in their arguments, and the evidence as part of the interim motion.

[280] This being said, the Panel finds that First Nations children residing off reserve who have lost connection to their First Nations communities for other reasons than the discrimination found in this case fall outside of the claim before it. The claim was not focused on this at all until the 2019 motion and sufficient evidence has not been presented to support such a finding. As the Panel previously said, the Supreme Court of Canada stated in Moore that the remedy must flow from the claim.

[281] What the Panel found in the Merit Decision was that First Nation children of Residential School and of Sixties Scoop survivors have suffered, may have higher needs often as a result of intergenerational trauma, colonialism, systemic racism and other historical wrongs done by Canada. As already explained above, this forms part of the substantive equality analysis under Jordan's Principle. The Panel in making those findings did so without any focus on Indian Act status or on-reserve residency.

[282] Additionally, the same can be said for all First Nations children who were discriminated against by Canada in the provision of federally funded services which are covered by Jordan's Principle. Since the 2017 CHRT 14 and 35 orders that provided clarification on Jordan's Principle, a federal service also includes a service above normative standard which aims to remedy the discrimination found in this case and rightfully accounts for substantive equality and the specific and distinct needs of First Nations children.

[283] However, the Panel did not make findings in regards to the services First Nations children of Residential School and of Sixties Scoop survivors receive off-reserve who are not recognized as part of a First Nation community given that it was not advanced by the parties in their claim or arguments before this motion and insufficient evidence was presented.

[284] The Panel did not prevent the parties from bringing evidence as part of this motion. Of note, evidence was brought by the Caring Society and Canada to support the interim motion and was relied upon by the Panel in section two of this ruling.

[285] Given the lack of evidence in this motion, the Panel is not in a position to make findings let alone remedial orders for the two above categories at this time.

[286] Furthermore, the Panel agrees with the Commission and Canada that there is insufficient evidence in the record to make fact findings concerning off-reserves First Nations children without Indian Act status who have lost connections with their First Nations or who have parents that self-identify as First Nations. Again, the claim and arguments were not brought, argued or proven before this Panel, (see for example the Caring Society's 2014 final arguments for the hearing on the Merits at paras. 368-369; 374; 394-396; 398; 400-401; 403; 407; 424-425; 439; and 453-456).

[287] Additionally, the legal tests developed in Moore and Gibbs are not meant to simply stand-alone absent evidence; rather they find their meaning when applied to the facts and evidence presented. If there is insufficient evidence the onus is not met and no remedy is ordered.

[288] Furthermore,

> [a]s the Federal Court of Appeal stated in Chopra v. Canada (Attorney General), 2007 FCA 268, at paragraph 42 ("Chopra"), "[t]he question of onus only arises when it is necessary to decide who should bear the consequence of a gap in the evidentiary record such that the trier of fact cannot make a particular finding." While discrete issues regarding the burden of proof may arise in the context of determining motions like the ones presently before the Panel, where the evidentiary record allows the Panel to draw conclusions of fact which are supported by the evidence, the question of who had the onus of proving a given fact is immaterial. (see 2017 CHRT 14 at para. 30),
> (see also interim order 2019 CHRT 7 at, para.47).

[289] In this specific section, the Panel cannot make this finding of fact other than find those First Nations children are denied access to Jordan's Principle services. This denial is clear from Canada's submissions and the evidence in the record:

> the Panel notes that Canada's Registration requirements as per the Indian Act have a direct correlation with whom receives services under Jordan's Principle and therefore support the importance of a full hearing on this issue:
>
> > The recognition of Indigenous identity is a complex question. In August 2015, Bill S-3 amended the Indian Act by creating seven new registration categories, in response to the decision in Descheneaux c. Canada rendered by the Superior Court of Quebec in August 2015. These provisions came into force in December 2017 and appropriately, Canada re-reviewed the requests submitted under Jordan's Principle for children who may have been impacted by the decision. (see affidavit of Dr. Valerie Gideon, dated December 21st, 2018, at para.15).
> >
> > Additional amendments to the definition under the Indian Act will be developed subsequent to a period of consultation with First Nations. When part B of Bill S-3 becomes law, Jordan's Principle requests will be processed in compliance with whatever definition affecting eligibility emerges from that process (see affidavit of Dr. Valerie Gideon, dated December 21st, 2018, at para.16).
> (see 2019 CHRT 7 at para. 86, emphasis omitted).

[290] Nevertheless, the tests must be applied to the proven facts and are intimately linked to the evidence in front of the Tribunal. This is what justifies a remedy. As opposed to the first two issues, the Panel was not provided much to work with to make findings that will have considerable impacts involving rights holders outside this case.

[291] The CAP's intervention is an example of this. The CAP was not allowed to bring evidence before the Tribunal as parties raised expeditiousness concerns. The Panel after considering the matter has a better understanding of the bigger picture here. Essentially the CAP desires to be part of the consultations surrounding off-reserve First Nations children without Indian Act status, including those who have lost connection with their First Nations and who self-identify as First Nations.

[292] Additionally, the AFN is very concerned that this could include false claims by self-declared First Nations and take away resources meant for vulnerable First Nations children who need services. The Panel finds this to be a serious issue that needs important considerations that are beyond the evidence before it at this time. The AFN argued that the above normative standards services under Jordan's Principle are enticing to many. The AFN further submits that recognizing them and others who have First Nations identity but have lost connection with a First Nation would result in depleting resources that are meant to address the discrimination in federal services and programs found in this case for First Nations children.

[293] While the Panel agrees with the Caring Society and the NAN that absent a proven section 15 of the CHRA defence when the complainants onus has been met, there is no reason to limit access to services to some children, the Panel also understands the social impacts the AFN is bringing to our attention and the broader context requiring supporting evidence, as Canada advances, discussions outside the Tribunal. For Canada, at this time this type of order would be unworkable given the need to have much broader consultations with First Nations, Inuit and Metis Nations, Provinces and organizations to name a few. The Panel agrees and believes those broader consultations would be more beneficial in order to consider all circumstances affecting those children if the consultations are organized, planned and actually occur in a reasonable timeframe.

[294] This being said, for those who have First Nations identity without Indian Act status or eligibility to receive Indian Act status and who have no connection with their First Nation and who have experienced cultural displacements as a result of Residential Schools, Sixties Scoop and the FNFCS program, the Panel believes they should be considered for Jordan's Principle services against the backdrop of Justice Phelan's findings and the Supreme Court of Canada's findings.

[295] The Supreme Court of Canada decision in Daniels determined that Métis and non-Status Indians fall under federal jurisdiction over "Indians and lands reserved for Indians" under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The Court effectively described a situation whereby the term "Indians" was broadly defined when it served Canada's needs, but construed narrowly when doing otherwise would require something of the federal government. At the same time, provincial governments typically refused entreaties for help from Métis and non-status Indians as well, claiming that these were federal responsibilities.

[296] Moreover, the Court ruled that delineating and assigning constitutional authority between the federal and provincial governments, "will have enormous practical utility for these two groups who have, until now, found themselves having to rely more on noblesse oblige than on what is obliged by the Constitution." (Daniels at para. 12).

[297] The Court described this as a "jurisdictional wasteland" that has left Métis and non-status Indians with "no one to hold accountable for an inadequate status quo." (Daniels at para. 15).

[298] Despite acknowledging that there is no consensus on who is considered Métis or non-status Indian, the Supreme Court wrote:

> These definitional ambiguities do not preclude a determination into whether the two groups, however they are defined, are within the scope of s. 91(24). I agree with the trial judge and Federal Court of Appeal that the historical, philosophical, and linguistic contexts establish that "Indians" in s. 91(24) includes all Aboriginal peoples, including non-status Indians and Métis.
>
> (Daniels at para. 19).

[299] The Supreme Court went on to say:

> Moreover, while it does not define the scope of s. 91(24), it is worth noting that s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 states that Indian, Inuit, and Métis peoples are Aboriginal peoples for the purposes of the Constitution. This Court recently explained that the "grand purpose" of s. 35 is "[t]he reconciliation of Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal Canadians in a mutually respectful long-term relationship": Beckman v. Little Salmon/Carmacks First Nation, [2010] 3

> S.C.R. 103, at para. 10. And in R. v. Sparrow, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075, this Court noted that ss. 35 and 91(24) should be read together: para. 62, cited in Manitoba Metis Federation Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [2013] 1 S.C.R. 623, at para. 69.
> (see Daniels at para. 34).
>
> The term "Indian" or "Indians" in the constitutional context, therefore, has two meanings: a broad meaning, as used in s. 91(24), that includes both Métis and Inuit and can be equated with the term "aboriginal peoples of Canada" used in s. 35, and a narrower meaning that distinguishes Indian bands from other Aboriginal peoples.
> (see Daniels at para. 35).

[300] The Supreme Court was explicit that the decision was meant to advance reconciliation in terms of the relationship between Canada and Indigenous Peoples. Justice Abella determined that reconciliation with all of Canada's Aboriginal peoples is Parliament's goal, drawing on > [t]he constitutional changes, the apologies for historic wrongs, a growing appreciation that Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal people are partners in Confederation, the Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, and the Final report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada.

> (Daniels at para. 37).

[301] The preponderance of the reasons for the SCC's findings deal with the Métis aspect of the question, as the Crown conceded in oral argument that non-status Indians were "Indians" under s. 91(24). Based on its analysis, the Court held that the declaration should be granted.

[302] The Court acknowledged that there is no consensus on who is considered Métis or non-status Indian, but did not believe this was a bar to issuing the declaration. The Court declined to establish definitional criteria for Métis and non-status Indians, stating broadly instead that "Determining whether particular individuals or communities are non-status Indians or Métis and therefore "Indians" under s. 91(24), is a fact-driven question to be decided on a case-by-case basis in the future..." (Daniels at para. 47).

[303] The Supreme Court distinguished the different purposes between Section 91(24): ""Indians" in s. 91(24) includes all Aboriginal peoples, including non-status Indians and Métis" (see Daniels at para.19) and section 35: "The criteria in Powley were developed specifically for purposes of applying s. 35, which is about protecting historic community-held rights: para. 13. … Section 91(24) serves a very different constitutional purpose," (see Daniels at para. 49).

> The third criterion — community acceptance — raises particular concerns in the context of this case. The criteria in Powley were developed specifically for purposes of applying s. 35, which is about protecting historic community-held rights: para. 13. That is why acceptance by the community was found to be, for purposes of who is included as Métis under s. 35, a prerequisite to holding those rights. Section 91(24) serves a very different constitutional purpose. It is about the federal government's relationship with Canada's Aboriginal peoples. This includes people who may no longer be accepted by their communities because they were separated from them as a result, for example, of government policies such as Indian Residential Schools. There is no principled reason for presumptively and arbitrarily excluding them from Parliament's protective authority on the basis of a "community acceptance" test.
>
> But federal jurisdiction over Métis and non-status Indians does not mean that all provincial legislation pertaining to Métis and non-status Indians is inherently ultra vires. This Court has recognized that courts "should favour, where possible, the ordinary operation of statutes enacted by both levels of government": Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, [2007] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 37 (emphasis in original). Moreover, this Court has been clear that federal authority under s. 91(24) does not bar valid provincial schemes that do not impair the core of the "Indian" power: NIL/TU,O Child and Family Services Society v. B.C. Government and Service Employees' Union, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 696, at para. 3.
>
>
> Both federal and provincial governments have, alternately, denied having legislative authority over non-status Indians and Métis. As the trial judge found, when Métis and non-status Indians have asked the federal government to assume legislative authority over them, it tended to respond that it was precluded from doing so by s. 91(24). And when Métis and non-status Indians turned to provincial governments, they were often refused on the basis that the issue was a federal one.
>
> (see Daniels at para. 13).

This results in these Indigenous communities being in a jurisdictional wasteland with significant and obvious disadvantaging consequences, as was recognized by Phelan J.:

> One of the results of the positions taken by the federal and provincial governments and the "political football — buck passing" practices is that financially [Métis and non-status Indians] have been deprived of significant funding for their affairs. . . .
>
> . . . the political/policy wrangling between the federal and provincial governments has produced a large population of collaterally damaged [Métis and non-status Indians]. They are deprived of programs, services and intangible benefits recognized by all governments as needed. [paras. 107-8]
>
> See also Lovelace v. Ontario, [2000] 1 S.C.R. 950, at para. 70.

(Daniels at para. 14).

With federal and provincial governments refusing to acknowledge jurisdiction over them, Métis and non-status Indians have no one to hold accountable for an inadequate status quo. The Crown's argument, however, was that since a finding of jurisdiction under s. 91(24) does not create a duty to legislate, it is inappropriate to answer a jurisdictional question in a legislative vacuum. It is true that finding Métis and non-status Indians to be "Indians" under s. 91(24) does not create a duty to legislate, but it has the undeniably salutary benefit of ending a jurisdictional tug-of-war in which these groups were left wondering about where to turn for policy redress. The existence of a legislative vacuum is self-evidently a reflection of the fact that neither level of government has acknowledged constitutional responsibility. A declaration would guarantee both certainty and accountability, thereby easily reaching the required jurisprudential threshold of offering the tangible practical utility of the resolution of a longstanding jurisdictional dispute.

(see Daniels at para.15).

Should a person possess "sufficient" racial and social characteristics to be considered a "native person", that individual will be regarded as an "Indian" . . . within the legislative jurisdiction of the federal government, regardless of the fact that he or she may be excluded from the coverage of the Indian Act. [p.43]

(see Daniels para. 33).

[304] The following words from Justice Phelan's Federal Court decision are instructive in this context:

> [84] The circumstances which the Plaintiffs claim to have given rise to this litigation is well described in a memorandum to Cabinet from the Secretary of State dated July 6, 1972:
>
> > The Métis and non-status Indian people, lacking even the protection of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, are far more exposed to discrimination and other social disabilities. It is true to say that in the absence of Federal initiative in this field they are the most disadvantaged of all Canadian citizens.
> (see Daniels v. Canada, 2013 FC 6 at para. 84).

[305] The Panel addressed section 91(24) of the Constitution, the double aspect rule, the living tree doctrine, federalism, fiduciary relationship and the Honor of the Crown in the Merit Decision and does not propose to repeat the findings here other than finding it is consistent with the Supreme Court Decision in Daniels and read together the reasoning is also applicable here. Additionally, Daniels confirms that Non-Status First Nations are in a similar situation of "jurisdictional tug-of-war" that can trigger a Jordan's Principle case and that the spirit of Jordan's Principle is meant to address.

[306] A case-by-case approach based on needs and the specific situation of the child still needs to occur. This is consistent with the approach taken by this Tribunal and the direction from the Supreme Court in Daniels.

[307] Furthermore, the Supreme Court in Daniels confirmed the Federal government's power to legislate on issues related to Métis and Non-Status Indians. Of note, section 2 of the CHRA stipulates:

> The purpose of this Act is to extend the laws in Canada to give effect, within the purview of matters coming within the legislative authority of Parliament, to the principle that all individuals should have an opportunity equal with other individuals to make for themselves the lives that they are able and wish to have and to have their needs accommodated, consistent with their duties and obligations as members of society, without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, marital status, family status, genetic characteristics, disability or conviction for an offence for which a pardon has been granted or in respect of which a record suspension has been ordered. (emphasis added).

[308] The Supreme Court of Canada decisions are binding and provide valuable information relevant to the case at hand. Additionally, section 50 (3) (c) of the CHRA allows the Tribunal to consider and accept any evidence and other information. However, the Panel finds this is insufficient to make such requested orders without supporting evidence. Additionally, as explained above, the case in front of the Tribunal focused on First Nations, not Métis peoples, Inuit or Self-identified First Nations persons. While the Panel believes that all children in Canada should receive the services they need, the case in front of the Panel is focused on First Nations. Consequently, the Panel does not make orders for this section, rather it provides some guidance relying on the case law and on Jordan's Principle's mechanism and purpose.

[309] This being said, in light of the above and international instruments that Canada has accepted, signed, signed and ratified, Canada has positive obligations towards all First Nations children whether they have Indian Act status or not and therefore, Canada must implement specific measures to protect children regardless of status. The Panel believes that the use of the term Indigenous Peoples is more reflective of the Principles protected by international law. Canada's domestic and international obligations are to ensure that all First Nations children have access to culturally appropriate and safe services and that the principle of substantive equality is upheld for all First Nations children regardless of status. Canada also has a domestic and international duty to its children wherever they live in Canada. The fact that other actors, including provincial actors, may be involved in the provision of the service is not a shield that Canada can use to avoid its own responsibilities to First Nations children under section 91(24) (see 2016 CHRT 2 at para.39). The Supreme Court of Canada also considered this historic disadvantage in the context of First Nations adults without Indian Act status in the criminal justice system in R. v. Gladue and R. v. Ipeelee. The Supreme Court of Canada supported the inference that, as compared to Canada's settler population, First Nations persons without Indian Act status also have greater needs.

[310] For the categories of children who lost Indian Act status or never received it due to Canada's discrimination, the Panel understands Canada's argument that they are presumably served by the provinces and territories and may not experience the same gaps, delays and denials as those children on reserve if they are not considered to have Indian Act status.

[311] The difficulty here is that many First Nations have been deprived of eligibility for Indian Act status as a result of the discrimination found in this case. Some of them are parents who have lost connection with their First Nation, and have no Indian Act status. Their children are not eligible for Indian Act status. Those First Nations children possibly have the same higher needs, often above provincial normative standards, as on-reserve First Nations in terms of mental health, special needs education, Fetal Alcohol Syndrome, loss of connection, loss of culture, language etc. The intergenerational trauma was recognized by this Panel and forms part of the findings in this case. The Panel did find that intergenerational trauma experienced by First Nations children often causes those children to have higher needs.

[312] It is helpful to consider a hypothetical but plausible example given the evidence heard in this case and referred to above. This example involves a child without Indian Act status and who is not eligible for Indian Act status. However, this child is a First Nations child (for example, removed as a result of discrimination, third or fourth generation, etc.) who lost any connection to a First Nation. This child suffers mental health issues as a result of intergenerational trauma and racial discrimination. The province's normative standard is to offer children who suffer similar health issues 10 and exceptionally 12-15 sessions with a child psychologist. If the child requires 50 sessions instead of 15 because the trauma is linked to intergenerational trauma and being a First Nations child, an appropriate substantive equality analysis would result in the child receiving all 50 mental health sessions as recommended by professionals. Because the normative standard is 15 sessions, the province may require the parents of that child to seek the extra mental health through alternate means. The province may refer the child to the Federal Government for those extra services. The Federal Government under its current eligibility criteria may respond that the child does not have Indian Act status, there is no emergency and no life-threatening issue and, therefore, the child should obtain the services via the provincial system. This type of bouncing back and forth is precisely what Jordan's Principle aims to rectify. A lot of the service needs required by First Nations children regardless of Indian Act status are connected to them being First Nations and requiring an Indigenous lens, culturally safe and appropriate services under a substantive equality analysis. If the service required is above normative standard because of intergenerational trauma for example, this service need cannot be disassociated from the nationality of the child regardless of how the government defines it.

[313] Moreover, Canada accepted the TRC report and committed to implement the 94 calls to action. The TRC report was filed in evidence as part of this claim and relied upon by the Panel on multiple occasions. Call to action number 20 is particularly instructive:

> In order to address the jurisdictional disputes concerning Aboriginal people who do not reside on reserves, we call upon the federal government to recognize, respect, and address the distinct health needs of the Métis, Inuit, and off-reserve Aboriginal peoples.

[314] Further, the Panel find the Reclaiming Power and Place: The Final Report of the National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls to be relevant. Given that it was not released, and therefore not argued by the parties, at the time of the hearing, the Panel did not rely on it to make its findings. This being said, Canada publicly accepted the report therefore, the Panel simply highlights the report's call to justice 12.10:

> Adopt the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal 2017 CHRT 14 standards regarding the implementation of Jordan's Principle in relation to all First Nations (status and non-status), Métis, and Inuit children.

[315] Those standards include the definition and the substantive equality analysis that may require Canada to provide services above the normative standard when necessary to respond to the child's needs.

[316] The Panel agrees with the Caring Society that an exclusive focus on whether a First Nations child without Indian Act status lives off-reserve, as opposed to why that child lives off-reserve fails to recognize that the off-reserve residence of a First Nations child without Indian Act status may well be related to Canada's past discriminatory provision of services on-reserve. The Panel also agrees with the Caring Society that chronic and perpetual discrimination within the FNCFS Program also raises the spectre of cultural displacement and the Caring Society's appropriate characterization of the Panel Chair's observation at the conclusion of the Panel's February 1, 2018 decision, that "[g]iven the recognition that a Nation is also formed by its population, the systematic removal of children from a Nation affects the Nation's very existence," (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 452).

[317] Accordingly, First Nations children who have lost their connection to their communities, or who may not even know to which community they belong, due to the operation of colonial or discriminatory policies such as Indian Residential Schools, the Sixties Scoop, or the discrimination within the FNCFS Program should not be excluded from Jordan's Principle's reach. Indeed, given the inter-generational trauma of such experiences, these individuals risk facing disadvantage on the basis of their "race and/or national or ethnic origin" that non-Indigenous Canadians do not face.

[318] The Panel finds that based on the above, Canada has a positive obligation towards "all First Nations children" regardless of Indian Act status or eligibility to Indian Act status.

[319] This may require additional funding and other resources to ensure the First Nations children protected by the Panel's orders, including those in this ruling which were based on the evidence in the record, continue to receive Jordan's Principle services in a sustainable manner for years to come.

[320] The Panel encourages Canada to implement specific measures and to be proactive and have those discussions in a timely manner to ensure all First Nations children in Canada have access to substantive equality.

VII. Orders

[321] Pursuant to section 53 (2) of the CHRA, the AFN, the Caring Society, the Commission, the COO, the NAN and Canada are ordered

1. to consult in order to generate potential eligibility criteria for First Nations children under Jordan's Principle and in considering the Panel's previous orders and clarification explained above in sections I and II and

2. to establish a mechanism to identify citizens and/or members of First Nations that is timely, effective and considers the implementation concerns raised by all parties. In considering the identification mechanism, discussions should also include the need for First Nations to receive additional funds to respond and, in some cases build capacity, to answer Canada's identification requests for First Nations children. The mechanism should also include provision for additional and sustainable funding to account for the children who will now be included under Jordan's Principle.

[322] The parties will return to the Tribunal with their potential Jordan's Principle eligibility criteria and mechanism as ordered above by October 19, 2020. Until such time and until a final order (on consent or otherwise) is made by this Panel on this issue, the 2019 CHRT 7 interim ruling remains in effect.

[323] The Panel pursuant to section 53 (2) of the CHRA Canada is ordered

3. to immediately consider eligible for Jordan's Principle services those First Nations children who will become eligible for Indian Act registration/status under S-3 implementation.

VIII. Retention of jurisdiction

[324] The Panel retains jurisdiction on all its Jordan's Principle orders including the orders above. Once the parties have drafted a potential Jordan's Principle eligibility criteria and mechanism as ordered above and returned to the Tribunal, the Panel will then revisit the need for further retention of jurisdiction on the issue of Jordan's Principle. This does not affect the Panel's retention of jurisdiction on other issues in this case.

Ruling Relating to Proposed Jordan's Principle Eligibility

I. Context

[1] This ruling arises in the context of a complaint by the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada (the Caring Society) and the Assembly of First Nations (the AFN) that Canada provides inequitable and discriminatory funding for First Nations children living on reserve and in the Yukon. In particular, this systemic racial discrimination manifests in many different forms including inadequate funding of child welfare services and gaps, delays and denials of services under Jordan's Principle. The Tribunal agreed with the Caring Society and the AFN that Canada's conduct was discriminatory and set out its reasons for that finding in First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada), 2016 CHRT 2 (the Merit Decision).

[2] In this ruling, the parties request approval of the process they have established to determine which children are eligible for consideration to receive services under Jordan's Principle. The scope of this ruling is solely in relation to Jordan's Principle: this ruling, and all the rulings in this case, explicitly avoids defining who is a First Nations child. The Tribunal respects First Nations right to determine their own citizens/members.

[3] In the Merit Decision, the Tribunal found that Canada's definition and implementation of Jordan's Principle was inadequate and excessively narrow which resulted in discriminatory service gaps, delays and denials of services for First Nations children (paras. 381, 391 and 458). Throughout the Merit Decision and subsequent rulings, the Tribunal documented a number of instances of the tragic consequences of Canada's discriminatory policy: the experiences of Jordan River Anderson (Merit Decision, para. 352); a child requiring medical equipment due to anoxic brain damage during a regular medical procedure (Merit Decision, para. 366); the failure to provide emergency mental health counselling and treatment aimed at preserving life (2017 CHRT 7, paras. 8-10); the refusal to provide services for a teenager with disabilities (2017 CHRT 14, para. 48, citing Pictou Landing Band Council v. Canada (Attorney General), 2013 FC 342); and an infant who required an essential medical diagnostic test for which Canada would not provide travel funding because the infant lacked Indian Act status even though the mother had it (2019 CHRT 7, paras. 58-60).

[4] In the course of this proceeding, the Tribunal has issued a number of remedial decisions addressing Jordan's Principle. Their key points in relation to this motion are summarized below.

A. Initial Jordan's Principle Rulings

[5] In 2016 CHRT 10, the Tribunal emphasized the importance of taking immediate action to implement Jordan's Principle and recognized the efforts Canada had taken since the Merit Decision (paras. 2 and 9). The Tribunal noted that there was a workable definition of Jordan's Principle adopted by the House of Commons in Motion 296 (Canada, Parliament, House of Commons Debates, 43rd Parl, 1st Sess, Vol 149, No 5 (December 11, 2019) at 279) that could serve as a basis for immediate action (para. 32). The ruling emphasized the importance of applying Jordan's Principle to all jurisdictional disputes rather than only those of children with multiple disabilities (para. 30). The ruling did not address how it could be determined whether a child was a First Nations child for the purpose of Jordan's Principle eligibility.

[6] The 2016 CHRT 16 decision reviewed updates on Canada's response to implementing Jordan's Principle and identified a number of steps for Canada to take to demonstrate it was complying with the Tribunal's orders (paras. 107-120). In its analysis, the Tribunal noted that Canada was inappropriately limiting Jordan's Principle to First Nations children living on reserve. The Panel confirmed and ordered Canada to apply Jordan's Principle to all First Nations children and not just those living on reserve (para. 118).

[7] In 2017 CHRT 14, the Tribunal addressed important issues related to Jordan's Principle. The main issue in the ruling was the scope of services and conditions Canada considered to fall under Jordan's Principle. However, the motion also considered whether Canada was appropriately complying with the order in 2016 CHRT 16 that Jordan's Principle apply to all First Nations children rather than being limited to those First Nations children living on reserve (para. 12). The Tribunal found that the option Canada selected for implementation was overly narrow in only including children on reserve or ordinarily resident on reserve (paras. 50, 52-54, 67). The Panel again confirmed in its order that Jordan's Principle "applies equally to all First Nations children, whether resident on or off reserve." (para. 135, 1.B.i.). This point was confirmed in the amendment to the order issued in 2017 CHRT 35.

[8] The parties sought explicit clarification on who constituted a First Nations child in 2019 CHRT 7 (para. 20). The parties had been unable to resolve the question without the Tribunal's assistance (para. 21). The Tribunal directed the issue to be determined at a full hearing and, in the meantime, provided an interim decision (paras. 22 and 80). The Tribunal determined that a final order on this issue would consider "international law including the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (UNDRIP), the recent UN Human Rights Committee's ("UNHRC") McIvor Decision" (para. 22). The Tribunal anticipated discrepancies between UNDRIP and the Indian Act, RSC 1985, c I-5 (para. 22). The Tribunal also anticipated issues relating to discriminatory definitions within the Indian Act, in particular in relation to sex (para. 22). The Tribunal stated its commitment to providing a remedy that would respect First Nations rights to self-determination and self-government, in particular as they relate to determining membership (para. 23).

[9] In 2019 CHRT 7, the Tribunal found that there was a disagreement over what constituted an urgent medical need, that First Nations children without status were not receiving necessary services, and that Jordan's Principle decisions were not adequately considering the best interests of the child (paras. 79, 84 and 85). Accordingly, the Tribunal ordered that "Canada shall provide First Nations children living off-reserve who have urgent and/or life-threatening needs, but do not have (and are not eligible for) Indian Act status, with the services required to meet those urgent and/or life-threatening service needs, pursuant to Jordan's Principle." (para. 87). The order also identified the following principles that guide its interpretation (emphasis in original):

> [89] This interim relief order applies to: 1. First Nations children without Indian Act status who live off-reserve but are recognized as members by their Nation, and 2. who have urgent and/or life-threatening needs. In evaluating urgent and/or life-threatening needs due consideration must be given to the > seriousness of the child's condition and the evaluation of the child made by a physician, a health professional or other professionals involved in the child's assessment. Canada should ensure that the need to address gaps in services, the need to eliminate all forms of discrimination, the principle of substantive equality and human rights including Indigenous rights, the best interests of the child, the UNDRIP and the Convention on the Rights of the Child guide all decisions concerning First Nations children.

>
> [91] The Panel stresses the importance of the First Nations' self-determination and citizenship issues, and this interim relief order or any other orders is not intended to override or prejudice First Nations' rights.

B. Ruling on Jordan's Principle Eligibility Criteria: 2020 CHRT 20

[10] In 2020 CHRT 20, the Tribunal considered eligibility of First Nations children for Jordan's Principle on the merits. The Tribunal aimed to rely on its previous orders in 2017 CHRT 14 and 2017 CHRT 35, as well as the findings in its previous decisions, and provide additional clarity around the scope of Jordan's Principle (para. 88).

[11] The Tribunal emphasized its commitment to respecting First Nations self-government and that its consideration of a First Nations child was only in the context of Jordan's Principle eligibility. Furthermore, the Tribunal concluded that recognizing this right to self-determination was recognized and consistent with the UNDRIP; section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (UK), 1982 c 11; and the Canadian Human Rights Act, RSC 1985, c H-6 (CHRA or the Act). It recognized that some of the First Nations participants in the hearing were concerned that the question of who was a First Nations child for the purposes of Jordan's Principle could not be entirely separated from the question of First Nation membership and citizenship. The Tribunal committed to crafting a ruling that would address these concerns (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 84-87, 130-135).

[12] The Tribunal reiterated its finding that Jordan's Principle is a human rights principle grounded in substantive equality. Jordan's Principle focuses on the specific needs of First Nations children which include experiences of intergenerational trauma and other disadvantages resulting from the discrimination found in the Merit Decision. It is part of the solution for remedying the discrimination found in this case (2020 CHRT 20, para. 89).

Jordan's Principle is not limited to the child welfare program and instead addresses all inequalities and gaps in federal programs for First Nations children (2020 CHRT 20, para. 92).

[13] Jordan's Principle is not a program but a legal rule and a mechanism to provide First Nations children culturally appropriate and safe services. It aims to overcome barriers First Nations children face in accessing services because of jurisdictional disputes either between programs for First Nations within the federal government or arising from Canada's constitutional division of powers in relation to First Nations (2020 CHRT 20, para. 94). Jordan's Principle accordingly seeks to prevent service gaps, delays and denials to First Nations children that occur because of their race, national or ethnic origin (2020 CHRT 20, para. 100).

[14] The Tribunal recognized that the failure to provide appropriate services on-reserve drove families and children to move off-reserve to seek the services but that jurisdictional disputes often remained. The Tribunal also emphasized that, as a remedial provision aimed at providing substantive equality, Jordan's Principle required that Canada provide services that are above the normative provincial or territorial standard of care (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 97-100).

[15] In determining that Jordan's Principle applied to all First Nations children, the Tribunal relied on the House of Commons Motion 296 in reference to First Nations children. The Tribunal did not rely on the Indian Act or residency on reserve to determine eligibility and reiterated that it had previously confirmed that fact. Further, the Tribunal reiterated its commitment to recognizing First Nations right to self-determination and current attempts by Parliament to refashion the historically colonial relationship Canada established with First Nations (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 105-109).

[16] The Tribunal noted that its earlier findings including the effects on First Nations children of intergenerational trauma from residential schools and disruptions to identity from moving off reserve required more than pecuniary redress (2020 CHRT 20, para. 111).

[17] The Tribunal confirmed that the following categories, in use at the time by Canada, are appropriately considered to be First Nations children for the purposes of Jordan's Principle (2020 CHRT 20, para. 112):

> a) First Nations children registered under the Indian Act, living on or off reserve;
>
> b) First Nations children eligible to be registered under the Indian Act, living on or off reserve; and
>
> c) non-status First Nations children without Indian Act status who are ordinarily resident on reserve (the AFN appears to dispute this however, this forms part of the Tribunal's findings in 2016 CHRT 16 at para. 117, quoted above).
> d) First Nations children without Indian Act status who live off-reserve but are recognized as members by their Nation, and who have urgent and/or life-threatening needs as per the Tribunal's interim order in 2019 CHRT 7 at paras. 88-89.

[18] The Tribunal subsequently considered whether three contested categories of children constituted First Nations children for the purpose of Jordan's Principle eligibility. The first issue was eligibility of children residing on or off reserve who were recognized by a First Nations group, community or people as belonging to that group, community or people in accordance with the customs or traditions of that First Nations group, community or people. The second was eligibility of children residing on or off reserve who do not have, and are not eligible for, Indian Act status but who have a parent or guardian with, or eligible for, Indian Act status. The third was children, residing off reserve, who have lost their connection to their First Nations communities due to the operation of the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop, or discrimination within the First Nation Child and Family Services (FNCFS) Program (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 120-122).

[19] On the first issue of children recognized as citizens or members by a First Nation, the Tribunal found that these children were within the scope of Jordan's Principle (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 128, 211-212).

[20] The Tribunal relied on its analysis from the Merit Decision and subsequent rulings to conclude that these children suffered from the discriminatory conduct that was the subject of the complaint (paras. 123-128).

[21] In analysing the first issue, the Tribunal relied on its reasons in 2018 CHRT 4 and the Merit Decision to conclude that it could appropriately rely on UNDRIP and the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's (TRC) calls for action to inform its analysis. Articles 3–5, 9, 18, 19, 23, 34 and 37 emphasize rights of self-determination while article 33 in particular confirms that "Indigenous peoples have the right to determine their own identity or membership in accordance with their customs and traditions" (cited in 2020 CHRT 20, para. 144). The Tribunal recognized that removing First Nations children from their community destroyed the community's identity and was contrary to international legal norms. In order to prevent this, it was necessary to give First Nations an opportunity to govern their own child welfare services. The Tribunal relied on international legal norms to inform its interpretation of the CHRA (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 136-157).

[22] The Tribunal considered the support An Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, S.C. 2019, c. 24 that reflects Parliament's intent to uphold First Nations inherent rights of self-determination and self-governance and First Nations right to substantial equality in relation to child welfare, which is the very issue that Jordan's Principle addresses (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 158-164).

[23] The Tribunal determined that it was inappropriate to rely on the Indian Act to determine who is considered a First Nations child for the purpose of Jordan's Principle. The Tribunal reviewed evidence that the Indian Act was designed to assimilate First Nations such that they would lose Indian Act status over a few generations. The Indian Act accordingly cannot be the only means of determining First Nations identity (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 165-172).

[24] The Tribunal considered First Nation treaty rights, including as recognized by Canada's written and unwritten constitution. The Tribunal found that First Nations right to determine citizenship was constitutionally recognized as an Aboriginal right and treaty right and reflected in prior jurisprudence affirming a general principle that a people have a right to self-determination. The Tribunal reviewed various treaties such as the Treaty of 1752 between the Mi'kmaq and the Crown and the Treaty of Niagara of 1764 to conclude treaties recognized First Nations right to self-government (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 173-196).

[25] The Tribunal identified sections 1.1 and 1.2 of An Act to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act, SC 2008, c 30 that confirmed that the CHRA was not intended to derogate any Aboriginal or treaty rights. Further, provisions were made to recognize First Nation laws (para. 197).

[26] The Tribunal relied on its earlier analysis to conclude that Jordan's Principle eligibility for First Nations children recognized by their community and children who are not eligible for Indian Act status despite having a parent who is eligible are within the scope of the complaint (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 199-210). Further, the Tribunal relied on Daniels v. Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development), 2016 SCC 12 to dispose of the argument that First Nations children living off reserve were subject to provincial jurisdiction to the exclusion of federal jurisdiction (2020 HRT 20, paras. 227-228).

[27] The Tribunal recognized the concerns First Nations raised that requiring First Nations to confirm that a child is recognized by a First Nation places an additional administrative burden on such nations. The Tribunal directed the parties to negotiate appropriate supports, including funding, for First Nations in order for them to confirm whether individuals are a member of the First Nation (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 220-226).

[28] The second issue was whether First Nations children who are not eligible for Indian Act status but who have a parent that is eligible are within the scope of Jordan's Principle. The Tribunal confirmed that they are.

[29] The Tribunal concluded that it had not previously considered whether this category of First Nations children was included within Jordan's Principle and applied the test for discrimination to the evidence in the case to determine that these First Nations children suffered from the discrimination Jordan's Principle aimed to remedy. In particular, these First Nations children had actual needs that went beyond the normative standard of care and are rooted in the historical and contemporary disadvantage that informs a substantive equality analysis. These First Nations children share the same legacy of stereotyping, prejudice, colonialism, displacement and intergenerational trauma relating to the Indian Residential Schools System and the Sixties Scoop as those First Nations children with Indian Act status. Accordingly, they are denied equivalent services based on the prohibited ground of race or national or ethnic origin (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 231-252).

[30] The Tribunal distinguished this case from Matson et al. v. Indian and Northern Affairs Canada, 2013 CHRT 13 and Roger William Andrews and Roger William Andrews on behalf of Michelle Dominique Andrews v. Indian and Northern Affairs Canada, 2013 CHRT 21, confirmed in Canadian Human Rights Commission v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 SCC 31, on the basis that this case is not a challenge to the Indian Act legislation. Instead, this case considers whether the Indian Act is the appropriate method to determine which First Nations children experience discrimination in the receipt of services. The Tribunal found that, as in Beattie v. Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada, 2014 CHRT 1, this was a case where the government used discretion in determining eligibility for services it offered (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 253-268).

[31] The Tribunal recognized that there were upcoming changes to the Indian Act that would result in more individuals being eligible for registration. The Tribunal concluded that those individuals who would become eligible for Indian Act status be treated as though they had it for the purposes of Jordan's Principle (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 269-270).

[32] While the Tribunal recognized that Canada may raise a defense that broad eligibility criteria for Jordan's Principle would cause undue hardship due to the resulting costs, the Tribunal found Canada did not lead sufficient evidence to support its assertion (2020 CHRT 20, para. 271).

[33] On the third issue, the Tribunal considered First Nations children who had lost their connection to their First Nations community due to the operation of the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop, discrimination within the FNCFS Program, or other reasons. The Tribunal found that First Nations children who had lost their connection to their community for reasons other than the identified ones fell outside the scope of the claim. While the Tribunal considered the tragedies experienced by Residential School survivors and victims of the Sixties Scoop and the intergenerational trauma they may have passed on to their children, the Tribunal was not presented with sufficient evidence of the provincial and territorial services that may or may not be available to these children and the needs they may have. Accordingly, the Tribunal was not in a position to find that they fell within the scope of Jordan's Principle. There was a similar lack of evidence on the experiences of individuals who self-identified as First Nations. In the absence of adequate evidence, the Tribunal is unable to make a finding that discrimination occurred and that remediation is required (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 274-290).

[34] Despite not making orders on this issue, the Tribunal issued guidance based on the evidence it had and the case law to which it was referred. The Tribunal recognized the "jurisdictional wasteland" considered in Daniels v. Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development), 2016 SCC 12 and the Supreme Court's conclusion that Canada had a responsibility to First Nations without Indian Act status. In this case, the Tribunal identified the particular obligation Canada had for First Nations who lost their Indian Act status and connection to their community as a result of the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop or the FNCFS Program (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 291-307).

[35] In its guidance, the Tribunal noted that Canada had an obligation to all First Nations children, regardless of whether they were eligible for Indian Act status or where they lived in Canada. While these children will presumptively receive provincial and territorial services, the Tribunal highlighted that discrimination such as in the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop, or the FNCFS Program may have created higher needs above provincial and territorial normative standards. Further, the TRC and the Reclaiming Power and Place: The Final Report of the National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls both support that Jordan's Principle should be interpreted broadly to include the needs of First Nations who do not have Indian Act status. Accordingly, it is appropriate for Canada to recognize that First Nations children who lost their connection to their communities as a result of policies such as the Indian Residential Schools System, the Sixties Scoop, or the FNCFS Program should not be excluded from Jordan's Principle (2020 CHRT 20, paras. 308-320).

[36] The Tribunal issues its orders in light of its analysis and findings. In recognition of First Nations right to self-determination, the Tribunal directed the AFN, the Caring Society, the Nishnawbe Aski Nation (NAN), the Chiefs of Ontario (COO), the Commission and Canada to consult to generate potential eligibility criteria for Jordan's Principle in light of the Tribunal's analysis. The specific orders were as follows:

> 1. to consult in order to generate potential eligibility criteria for First Nations children under Jordan's Principle and in considering the Panel's previous orders and clarification explained above in sections I and II and
>
> 2. to establish a mechanism to identify citizens and/or members of First Nations that is timely, effective and considers the implementation concerns raised by all parties. In considering the identification mechanism, discussions should also include the need for First Nations to receive additional funds to respond and, in some cases build capacity, to answer Canada's identification requests for First Nations children. The mechanism should also include provision for additional and sustainable funding to account for the children who will now be included under Jordan's Principle.
> (2020 CHRT 20, para. 321)

[37] Separately, Canada was ordered "to immediately consider eligible for Jordan's Principle services those First Nations children who will become eligible for Indian Act registration/status under S-3 implementation" (2020 CHRT 20, para. 323).

[38] The parties were directed to present their proposed eligibility criteria and mechanism for Jordan's Principle (2020 CHRT 20, para. 322). This current ruling reviews the proposal the parties have now presented to the Tribunal.

II. Joint Position of the Parties

[39] The parties provided a joint submission on a proposed eligibility process for Jordan's Principle. The parties request that the Tribunal approves the proposed eligibility criteria on the basis that they appropriately reflect the Tribunal's direction in 2020 CHRT 20. They submit that the document is timely, effective and considers the implementation concerns raised by all parties.

A. Proposed Jordan's Principle Eligibility Criteria

[40] The entirety of the proposed eligibility criteria is attached as Annex A. The key components are summarized here.

[41] Cases meeting any one of four criteria are eligible for consideration under Jordan's Principle. Those criteria are the following:

1. The child is registered or eligible to be registered under the Indian Act, as amended from time to time;
2. The child has one parent/guardian who is registered or eligible to be registered under the Indian Act;
3. The child is recognized by their Nation for the purposes of Jordan's Principle; or
4. The child is ordinarily resident on reserve.

[42] The provisions establish a default process to confirm eligibility that is intended to facilitate substantive equality for First Nations children and not create a barrier. Individual First Nations and Provincial-Territorial Organizations are able to agree to a different process.

[43] Applicants relying on the criteria of recognition by their First Nation may obtain confirmation from the First Nation, through an appropriate individual, or provide Indigenous Services Canada (ISC) consent to seek the confirmation. While the process provides for a Confirmation of Recognition form to facilitate confirmation, it contemplates alternative processes such that failure to complete the form does not act as a barrier in accessing services. Similarly, there is a Consent to Communicate form designed to facilitate ISC seeking confirmation but there are processes to ensure that failure to complete that form is not a barrier to accessing services.

[44] For urgent cases relying on recognition by a First Nation, provisions are made for verbal confirmation of eligibility and for cases where a designated official is not able to be contacted. The determination of eligibility will not delay a substantive review of the request and an inability to confirm recognition will not delay measures to provide the child with urgent assistance or to address the reasonably foreseeable risk of irremediable harm. Requests related to children in end-of-life and palliative care are urgent.

[45] Once a First Nation confirms a child is eligible for Jordan's Principle, this recognition will be retained and used for subsequent Jordan's Principle requests.

[46] Cases will be examined and approved by Jordan's Principle Focal Points. If the Focal Point recommends denying a request based on eligibility, the case will be immediately escalated for review and determined by an official with the ADM delegated authority to deny requests. For urgent requests, this will occur as soon as the child's needs require it and no later than a 12-hour timeframe.

B. Proposal Regarding Funding

[47] The proposal regarding funding is attached to this ruling in Annex B.

[48] Canada will provide funding for First Nations communities for expenses incurred to recognize Jordan's Principle claimants as members of that community. These expenses include Jordan's Principle service coordination and navigation to carry out recognition functions. The list contemplates a non-exhaustive list of expenses and that an additional 10% administration fee can be added to the expenses:

- additional human resources costs (e.g. salary and benefits) specifically in association with confirming recognition of First Nations children for the purpose of Jordan's Principle;
- First Nation policy development and updating;
- internal First Nation governance/determination meetings
- communications - internal and external (social media; community newsletters; website development and maintenance; marketing)
- coordination processes – bringing multiple community sectors together;
- professional fees, including seeking advice and development of the recognition approach.

[49] The process contemplates working with a requester to address any outstanding issues before a request would be denied. In the event that a request is denied in full or in part, there would remain an opportunity to present new information and to have the decision reviewed. The criteria used to make a determination to deny a funding request are:

- whether the funding requested is aligned with the objective of the confirmation of recognition process;
- whether the request is a clear duplication of previously provided funding for the same purpose, such as an existing salary budget;
- whether the funding request is significantly disproportionate to the level of activity proposed;
- whether the funding was requested by organizations that do not have a mandate from any First Nation to work on confirmation of recognition.

[50] First Nations or First Nations organizations that engage in confirmation of recognition work may be eligible for funding regardless of whether they currently receive funding for Jordan's Principle service coordination or navigation.

III. Analysis

[51] The first step for this consent order is to do the analysis under section 53 of the CHRA in order to determine if the consent order sought is within the Tribunal's authority under the Act. If the answer is negative, the analysis stops there and the Tribunal cannot make such an order. If the answer is affirmative, the Tribunal then determines if the consent order sought is appropriate and just in light of the specific facts of the case, the evidence presented, its previous orders and the specifics of the consent order sought.

[52] The Panel already considered the first step of the analysis and found it had the authority under section 53 (2) of the CHRA to make such an order in 2020 CHRT 20. Moreover, after careful consideration of the specifics of this consent order request, which is summarized above, the Panel finds it has the authority under section 53 of the CHRA and its previous rulings to make the consent order as detailed and attached as Annex A and Annex B.

[53] The Panel finds the consent order sought is thoughtful and in line with the spirit of the Tribunal's rulings and within the parameters established in 2020 CHRT 20. The consent order sought is a result of diligent work made by expert First Nations, who are parties in this case, in collaboration with Canada and also appears to account for many different situations that may be encountered by First Nations people under Jordan's Principle. The Panel is mindful that the best eligibility criteria and mechanism must be designed by First Nations. This exercise was particularly positive given that all parties in this case came to an agreement. This carries hope. The Panel also agrees and makes a consent order as indicated below.

IV. Order

[54] Pursuant to section 53(2) of the CHRA, the Tribunal orders eligibility for Jordan's Principle to be determined in accordance with the "Jordan's Principle eligibility criteria following 2020 CHRT 20" as included in Annex A. Further, the Tribunal orders Canada to fund First Nations and First Nations organizations for confirmation of First Nations identity as outlined in "Jordan's Principle Eligibility – First Nations Citizenship Determination" as included in Annex B.

[55] For ease of reference, a few provisions of the order are summarized in the following paragraphs.

[56] Cases meeting any one of four criteria are eligible for consideration under Jordan's Principle. Those criteria are the following:

1. The child is registered or eligible to be registered under the Indian Act, as amended from time to time;
2. The child has one parent/guardian who is registered or eligible to be registered under the Indian Act;
3. The child is recognized by their Nation for the purposes of Jordan's Principle; or
4. The child is ordinarily resident on reserve.

[57] The order contains default provisions to confirm that a child is recognized by a Nation for the purpose of Jordan's Principle. These provisions are designed to facilitate substantive equality, and not act as a barrier. The provisions contemplate a First Nation appointing appropriate individuals to confirm eligibility and officials who can be contacted should somebody else not be appointed or not be available. The provisions contemplate an expedited procedure in the case of urgency. The provisions contemplate forms that can assist in collecting information; however, failure to complete a form is not intended to be a reason to delay or deny a request. ISC will maintain a record of confirmation to avoid the requirement to once again confirm eligibility should there be a subsequent request for that same child. The provisions stipulate a review process in the event a denial of eligibility is contemplated. The default provisions provide that a First Nation or Provincial-Territorial Organization may agree to a different process.

[58] Further, the funding provision sets out that eligible expenses for confirming Jordan's Principle eligibility will include human resources, policy development and updating, internal governance, communication, coordination, professional fees, and administrative fees. The funding provisions also stipulate the criteria that can be used to deny a request for funds and a review process for any denial.

V. Retention of Jurisdiction

[59] The Panel retains jurisdiction on all its Jordan's Principle orders including the order in this ruling and will revisit its retention of jurisdiction as the Panel sees fit in light of the upcoming evolution of this case or once the parties confirm the eligibility criteria and mechanism is implemented and effective. This does not affect the Panel's retention of jurisdiction on other issues in this case.

"Annex A"

Jordan's Principle eligibility criteria following 2020 CHRT 20

Cases meeting any one of the following criteria are eligible to be considered under Jordan's Principle:

1. The child is registered or eligible to be registered under the Indian Act, as amended from time to time1;

2. The child has one parent/guardian who is registered or eligible to be registered under the Indian Act;

3. The child is recognized by their Nation for the purposes of Jordan's Principle; or

4. The child is ordinarily resident on reserve.

The default process[2] through which families and organizations can submit a request under the eligibility criterion of "a child recognized by their Nation for the purposes of Jordan's Principle" is set out below. The process is intended to facilitate, not act as a barrier to, substantive equality for First Nations children.

1. Requirement for confirmation of recognition by a First Nation: Families and organizations who are preparing to submit a Jordan's Principle request under this eligibility criterion will be required to obtain confirmation of recognition from the First Nation (see point 3) – or the family may provide consent for Indigenous Services Canada ("ISC") to obtain confirmation of recognition (see point 4) – to ensure validation of recognition as an integral component of their request.

2. Identification of appropriate First Nation official: Confirmation of recognition must be obtained from an appropriate First Nation official.

Preferably, a First Nation will designate a person, or persons, as officials who can provide confirmation of recognition for the purposes of Jordan's Principle ("Designated Official") by passing a Band Council Resolution, or providing a letter on First Nation letterhead, or through another identified community governance mechanism.

The First Nation can designate a person or persons from the Chief and Council and/or from within the administration, or from another community entity, as its Designated Official.

[1] This includes An Act to amend the Indian Act in response to the Superior Court of Quebec decision in Descheneaux c. Canada, S.C. 2017, c. 25, and any future amendments.

[2] This process does not preclude a First Nation or Provincial-Territorial Organization ("PTO") subsequently agreeing in writing to a different process with Indigenous Services Canada specific to that First Nation or PTO.

Alternately, the First Nation may also designate a person or persons from another organization, such as a First Nation Health Authority or a First Nations Child and Family Well Being Agency as the Designated Official.

Alternatively, for First Nations that have not named a Designated Official, the First Nation may confirm recognition by communication in writing from the First Nation's Chief (or designate), Council member with the child welfare or health portfolio, or the First Nation's most senior administrative official (or that official's designate) ("Deemed Official(s)"). Where recognition is confirmed by a Deemed Official who is not the Chief, the Chief will be copied on the communication providing that confirmation of recognition to ISC.

Where ISC is confirming recognition, it may be done in writing, including by fax or email. It does not need to be provided on the Confirmation of Recognition form.

3. Confirmation of Recognition (non-urgent cases) – Where a child, family or organization or Jordan's Principle navigator /service coordinator makes a request and has not submitted a Confirmation of Recognition form but can easily obtain confirmation of recognition by their First Nation, the family, child or organization or Jordan's Principle navigator /service coordinator will work with a Designated or Deemed Official, the Jordan's Principle navigator /service coordinator, and ISC if required to complete the Confirmation of Recognition form.

When families, children, organizations or a Jordan's Principle navigator /service coordinator make an application and do not submit a completed Confirmation of Recognition form, they may provide consent from the family for ISC to communicate with the First Nation to determine if a First Nation recognizes the child as being eligible for Jordan's Principle Services. This is done by submitting a completed Consent to Communicate form signed by the family or child. Where applicable, the family or child may also consent to ISC contacting the relevant Jordan's Principle Navigator or service coordinator to assist ISC in obtaining confirmation of recognition from the First Nation. ISC must explicitly communicate to the family/organization that the proposed Jordan's Principle request is incomplete until confirmation of recognition is determined.

If the First Nation provides confirmation of recognition to ISC and the other essential information to reasonably determine the request has been provided, the CHRT-mandated timelines apply.

4. Communication – Where ISC receives a Consent to Communicate form instead of a Confirmation of Recognition form, the Focal Point will immediately contact the community's Designated or Deemed Official. If the initial request is made by a Jordan's Principle service coordinator or navigator to ISC, or if the family has provided consent to communicate with the Jordan's Principle service coordinator or navigator, ISC may contact the Jordan's Principle service coordinator or navigator to assist in obtaining either a Consent to Communicate form or confirmation of recognition.

5. Application – Family, child, organization or Jordan's Principle navigator and service coordinator will send in a request for services, supports and products to the Jordan's Principle Focal Point. Confirmation of Recognition or Consent to Communicate must accompany the request. Where the First Nation Designated or Deemed Official/Organization has confirmed recognition, the case can be adjudicated and approved by the applicable Jordan's Principle Focal Points.

6. Urgent cases – Where the child requires urgent assistance or the risk of irremediable harm is reasonably foreseeable, ISC will take positive measures to verbally confirm recognition with the First Nation's Designated Official/Organization. Where applicable, ISC may work with the Jordan's Principle navigator or service coordinator that submitted the request. Where no designation has been made, or where the designated official or organization is unavailable, the First Nation's Deemed Official(s) may provide verbal confirmation to be followed with written confirmation.

In an urgent case, ISC will consider the substantive request for services and products related to the urgency while it confirms recognition. Where recognition is not confirmed before ISC is prepared to make a determination, ISC will confirm recognition subsequent to a determination being made on interim measures to provide the child with the urgent assistance required or to address the reasonably foreseeable risk of irremediable harm. Services and products not related to the need for urgent assistance or the reasonably foreseeable risk of irremediable harm will be considered subject to the usual recognition process.

For greater certainty, requests related to children in end-of-life or palliative care are considered urgent.

7. Retention – Where a First Nation confirms recognition of a child for purposes of Jordan's Principle, ISC will keep confirmation of recognition on file for the child for use in considering future requests.

Operational Guidelines

8. Escalated to Authorized ISC Official –If the Focal Point recommends a denial on the basis of eligibility, the case will be immediately escalated to authorized ISC official for review and a determination rendered within the CHRT timelines.

Review – If the Focal Point recommends a denial, a case reviewer will review all the information and create a Case Summary for the designated official with the ADM delegated authority to deny requests (see Annex D). For urgent cases, this work is done within the 12-hour time frame, or sooner if the child's needs require.

9. Delegated Authority for Denials – The senior official delegated with authority by the ADM to deny requests will determine the request.

10. Notification – The requestor is notified of the decision.

"Annex B"

Jordan's Principle Eligibility – First Nations Recognition
List of Applicable Expenses for First Nations

Canada already has authority to fund First Nations for Jordan's Principle service coordination and navigation. Canada will leverage this authority to fund communities who incur expenses to recognize children under a CHRT order (2020 CHRT 20). This can be done by advancing funding where requests are submitted for activities under eligible expenses and these expenses can be reasonably estimated, or by reimbursement of expenses. Under reimbursement, it is recommended that First Nations recipients consult with ISC beforehand on eligible expenses noted below.

Canada will amend eligible expenses under Jordan's Principle service coordination and navigation to carry out recognition activities, including:

- additional human resources costs (e.g. salary and benefits) specifically in association with confirming recognition of First Nations children for the purpose of Jordan's Principle;
- First Nation policy development and updating;
- internal First Nation governance/determination meetings
- communications - internal and external (social media; community newsletters; website development and maintenance; marketing)
- coordination processes – bringing multiple community sectors together;
- professional fees, including seeking advice and development of the recognition approach.

An administrative fee of 10% will be added to account for related overhead expenses.

ISC will work with the requester to clarify any questions that arise before making a decision on approval. If despite these efforts, a denial or partial denial is recommended, the criteria we would use to make such a decision would be the following:

- whether the funding requested is aligned with the objective of the confirmation of recognition process;

- whether the request is a clear duplication of previously provided funding for the same purpose, such as an existing salary budget11;

- whether the funding request is significantly disproportionate to the level of activity proposed;

- whether the funding was requested by organizations that do not have a mandate from any First Nation to work on confirmation of recognition.[2]

In all cases involving a denial or partial denial of reimbursement of funding related to confirmation of recognition, the request would be brought for a decision to the Regional Executive. If new information was provided, it could be considered by the Regional Executive. If the denial is sustained, a second level review would be available with the ADM of Regional Operations.

Those who perform Jordan's Principle service coordination and navigation functions will be eligible for this funding. More specifically, this can include First Nations or First Nations organizations mandated by First Nations leaders to undertake support services under service coordination and/or navigation which would include confirmation of recognition. First Nations or First Nations organizations can receive funding for confirmation of recognition activities even if they are not currently funded for Jordan's Principle service coordination or navigation.

[1] To be clear, where the person's workload increases as a result of having to deal with these requests, additional funding may be provided.
[2] It is understood that the assistance of other organizations may be necessary in some circumstances.

Compensation Process Ruling on Four Outstanding Issues in Order to Finalize the Draft Compensation Framework

I. Context

[1] This ruling arises in the context of a complaint filed by the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada (the Caring Society) and the Assembly of First Nations (the AFN) that Canada provided inequitable and discriminatory funding for First Nations children living on reserve and in the Yukon. In particular, this discrimination is found in inadequate funding for child welfare services and inappropriate application of Jordan's Principle. The Tribunal agreed with the Caring Society and the AFN that Canada's conduct was discriminatory for reasons provided in First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada), 2016 CHRT 2 (the Merit Decision). The Tribunal retained jurisdiction to address the complex remedial matters in this case (see especially Merit Decision, paras. 493-94 and 2016 CHRT 10, paras. 1-5).

[2] The Tribunal found the complaint was substantiated. More specifically, the Tribunal found that Canada's conduct was systemic and discriminatory because its design, management and control of the First Nations Child and Family Services Program (FNCFS Program), along with its corresponding funding formulas and the other related provincial/territorial agreements have resulted in denials of services and created various adverse impacts for many First Nations children and families living on reserves across Canada. The Tribunal identified a number of discriminatory harms from Canada's funding approach, management and control of the Program. Furthermore, the Tribunal found that Canada provided inadequate funding for a variety of child and family services provided to First Nations children. For example, Canada provided inadequate and fixed funding for operational costs and prevention services. Accordingly, First Nations Child and Family Services Agencies (FNCFS Agencies) were unable to provide provincially and territorially mandated levels of service. The funding formula further contained an incentive to remove children from their home rather than provide supports to promote their wellbeing in the care of their parents or existing caregivers. The failure to coordinate the FNCFS Program with other programs, whether federal, provincial or territorial, created gaps, delays and denials of services for First Nations children. Moreover, the narrow definition and inadequate implementation of Jordan's Principle resulted in service gaps, delays and denials for First Nations children and families.

[3] The Tribunal agreed with the Caring Society and the AFN that Canada's conduct was discriminatory for reasons provided in First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada), 2016 CHRT 2 [the Merit Decision]. The Tribunal retained jurisdiction to address the complex remedial matters in this case (see especially Merit Decision, paras. 493-94 and 2016 CHRT 10, paras. 1-5).

[4] The Tribunal ordered Canada to pay compensation to the First Nations children who have experienced the pain and suffering of being separated from their homes, families and communities or have experienced gaps, delays and denials in services as a result of the discrimination found in the Merit Decision and their parents or grandparents caregivers who have experienced the pain and suffering of having their children unnecessarily removed from their homes, families and communities or have experienced gaps, delays and denials in services as a result of the discrimination found in the Merit Decision (see First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada), 2019 CHRT 39 [the Compensation Decision]) In the Compensation Decision, the Tribunal directed the parties to negotiate a culturally sensitive and trauma informed process to compensate the victims of the discriminatory practice (para. 269). The Tribunal remained available to resolve any disagreements that arose in the process of drafting the compensation framework. The parties have engaged in a collaborative process to create the Framework for the Payment of Compensation under 2019 CHRT 39 (the Draft Compensation Framework). The parties have requested direction from the Tribunal when they were unable to agree (e.g. 2020 CHRT 7, 2020 CHRT 15, and 2020 CHRT 20). The parties indicate they are close to finalizing the Draft Compensation Framework in order to submit it to the Tribunal for approval.

[5] This ruling addresses four issues that arise from the Draft Compensation Framework submitted by the parties on October 2, 2020. The parties specifically requested the Tribunal to provide direction concerning a contested issue between the parties regarding the creation of a trust fund for some categories of beneficiaries. The AFN, the Caring Society and the NAN argue the Canadian Human Rights Act, RSC 1985 c H-6 [CHRA or the Act] provides jurisdiction to implement a trust fund for victims who were legally unable to manage their own finances. Second, Nishnawbe Aski Nation (NAN) requested an amendment to the Draft Compensation Framework to reflect its participatory rights as an intervening interested party in this case. Third, NAN requested an amendment to the Draft Compensation Framework to change the time period for which First Nations children would be eligible for Jordan's Principle compensation. Finally, the Tribunal requested submissions to ensure that the Tribunal's role in the Draft Compensation Framework was within the Tribunal's jurisdiction.

[6] The Tribunal issued a letter ruling dated December 14, 2020 to the parties with reasons to follow. This is analogous to an oral decision with reasons to follow, which the Panel used to expedite the process of finalizing the compensation framework. This ruling provides the reasons contemplated in the Panel's December 14, 2020 letter. Following this letter ruling, the parties were able to finalize the Draft Compensation Framework and, on December 23, 2020 they submitted the final version to obtain a final consent order on the issue of the compensation process.

II. Trust Provisions

(i) Context

[7] The Compensation Decision determined that compensation would be payable directly to the victims of the discriminatory practice instead of into a fund that would provide services for their benefit. However, the Tribunal recognized "that it is not appropriate to pay $40,000 to a 3-year-old" and that a process for paying funds to minor beneficiaries was required (para. 261). The Tribunal determined in 2020 CHRT 7 that the provincial or territorial age of majority would determine when First Nations children would receive direct control of their compensation funds (paras. 8-36).

[8] The Draft Compensation Framework contains provisions for payments for individuals who lack the legal capacity to manage their own finances. These provisions apply only to individuals who lack the legal capacity to manage their own finances:

> 10.1. Where the beneficiary has the legal capacity to manage their own financial affairs, the compensation shall be paid directly to the beneficiary.
> 10.3. Where the beneficiary does not have the legal capacity to manage their own financial affairs, the compensation shall be held in trust for the beneficiary.

[9] Section 10.3 also stipulates that for these beneficiaries, their compensation shall be held in trust.

[10] Sections 10.4 and 10.5 provide for the appointment of up to three Appointed Trustees to manage the trust funds in accordance with a Trust Agreement:

> 10.4. The Parties will select up to three (3) business entities that specialize in holding, administering and distributing funds held in trust for the benefit of the beneficiaries who do not have the legal capacity to manage their own financial affairs (the "Appointed Trustees"). The administration fees charged by the Appointed Trustees shall be paid for by Canada and shall not encroach on the beneficiaries' entitlement.
>
> (emphasis added).
>
> 10.5. The Appointed Trustees shall hold the funds in trust pursuant to a trust agreement agreed to by the Parties (the "Trust Agreement"). The Trust Agreement shall outline the following requirements:
>
> a) The powers, responsibilities and requirements of the trustee to hold and manage the funds for the benefit of the beneficiaries;
> b) The distribution provisions for income and capital;
> c) The criteria for encroachment on capital;
> d) The removal and replacement of trustees;
> e) The accounting and report requirements; and > f) Any other appropriate related provisions.

[11] Canada does not agree with the proposed appointment of Appointed Trustees pursuant to a Trust Agreement and accordingly the parties request the Tribunal's adjudication of these provisions in the Draft Compensation Framework.

A. Position of the Parties

(ii) Canada

[12] Canada objects to the provisions in the Draft Compensation Framework relating to paying funds into trust for children who do not have legal capacity to manage their own affairs. Canada acknowledges the advantages of the proposed measures but disputes that the Tribunal has the jurisdiction to implement them. Canada contends that the measures in the Draft Compensation Framework would inevitably cover ground fully covered by express provisions in the Indian Act, RSC 1985, c I-5 or provincial law relating to children's property.

[13] Canada argues that under the Indian Act, the Minister has exclusive authority to deal with the property of any beneficiary who lacks the legal capacity to manage their own property. For adults who lack legal capacity, that authority is found under section 51. For children, the authority is under section 52, with the additional stipulations in sections 52.1 and 52.2 that contemplate a role for Band Councils and parents.

[14] Canada cites Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Ontario legislation to identify who should have control of a child's property under provincial jurisdiction. It does not address any other provincial legislation. Section 45 of the Children's Law Act 2020, S.S. 2020, c. 2, gives authority over a child's property in Saskatchewan to the parents, unless otherwise ordered by a court. Sections 47 to 51 of the Ontario Children's Law Reform Act, RSO 1990, c. C-12 give preference to parents as the guardians of a child's property. The British Columbia Family Law Act, SBC 2011, c. 25 provides, at sections 175-181, that a trustee of a child's property must be appointed by a court.

[15] Canada argues that there are many specific laws dealing with the property of minors. Subsections 53(2) and (3) of the CHRA do not demonstrate an intention by Parliament to allow the Tribunal to impose the trust provisions in the Draft Compensation Framework. Furthermore, the provincial and Indian Act provisions demonstrate that it is not necessary for the Tribunal to impose a trust framework. Canada further adds that the Tribunal must respect the existing property laws applicable to beneficiaries.

(iii) The Caring Society

[16] The Caring Society supports the trust provisions in the Draft Compensation Framework. The Caring Society submits that these provisions provide a clear, uniform, and culturally and trauma informed approach that would be lacking if Canada's position is adopted.

[17] The Caring Society views beneficiaries who lack legal capacity as among the most vulnerable victims in this case. The proposed Appointed Trustee would protect compensation for this group. The centralized approach will create a predictable, clear and universal approach for all beneficiaries across Canada who lack legal capacity that is capable of clear oversight and protections.

[18] The Caring Society relies on the findings of the Youth in Care Canada report previously accepted by the Panel, that it is vital that persons who cannot manage their own financial affairs, receive culturally appropriate and trauma informed services to avoid further harm.

[19] The Caring Society outlines the burdens that would fall on families in the absence of the Appointed Trustee. The Caring Society agrees that compensation cannot be paid directly to those who lack legal capacity. The provincial, territorial and Indian Act regimes contemplate the appointment of a guardian of property as a default regime of last resort. The proposed Appointed Trustee provides an alternative to the default "last resort" statutory regimes in a manner that will more effectively implement the Tribunal's orders.

[20] The Appointed Trustee avoids four obstacles for beneficiaries who lack legal capacity. First, it avoids the challenge of determining the legislative provisions that apply to the individual under the provincial, territorial, or Indian Act legislative regimes, depending on which legislative framework applies to the individual. The complexity of engaging with the legislation may require beneficiaries to hire legal counsel that would in effect reduce their compensation. Second, the legislative regime within a jurisdiction is often different for adults and children who lack legal capacity. Third, the administrative steps imposed on families under the provincial, territorial and Indian Act regimes may result in some families not completing the necessary steps and beneficiaries therefore not receiving compensation.

Fourth, the default regimes do not contain provisions to ensure beneficiaries receive culturally appropriate and trauma informed services.

[21] The Caring Society further elaborates on some barriers potentially facing guardians of property for minors under the default regimes. These barriers undermine the principles of safeguarding the best interests of the child beneficiaries and making the payment process as simple as possible for beneficiaries. First, the application process is often burdensome. In most cases, the parent or guardian will be required to make an application to be appointed the guardian of property. This process may involve a court application, with associated court fees and the possible need to hire counsel. The process will vary between provinces and even in some cases within a province based on the amount of compensation a beneficiary will receive. Quebec in particular has different processes depending on whether the value of the property is above or below $25,000. Second, accounting processes are a significant administrative burden on a guardian of property. The specific accounting requirements vary between provinces and territories and, at least in Quebec, within the province based on the amount of compensation received. Third, guardians of property for a minor are often required to post a bond. The requirements again vary across Canada. The requirement to post a bond adds another burden to seeking compensation.

[22] The Caring Society identifies that there are also burdens for individuals seeking to be appointed a guardian of property for an adult who lacks legal capacity. First, there is an application process. While it involves many of the same challenges as processes involving minors, there is the further requirement of proving a lack of capacity. The requirement to demonstrate an absence of capacity increases the potential for contested litigation. There are similar provisions for financial security to be required by the guardian. In some cases, there is a requirement to present a plan for managing the property. The Caring Society notes that some legislation, such as the Adult Capacity and Decision-making Act, SNS 2017, c. 4, s. 7(1)(c), requires the court to be satisfied that appointing a guardian of property is the least restrictive measure. Secondly, the standards to which guardians of property are held are high. It requires appropriate judgement and record keeping. Guardians of property take on a legal risk that they would be held responsible if funds are mismanaged.

[23] Overall, the Caring Society submits that the proposed trust provisions are consistent with a broad interpretation of the CHRA that is aimed at effectively remedying the discrimination at issue. The proposed provisions best protect the specific interests of the particularly vulnerable group of beneficiaries who lack legal capacity to manage their own finances.

(iv) Assembly of First Nations

[24] The AFN supports the trust provisions in the Draft Compensation Framework. The provisions provide a national approach with clear rules and norms on how funds are to be distributed to beneficiaries.

[25] The AFN is aware of the risk that parents or guardians deplete the funds they hold in trust for a child. The proposed provisions protect vulnerable beneficiaries from this risk. The trust provisions contemplate that all of the funds will be preserved until a child beneficiary reaches the age of majority. These provisions contrast with provincial, territorial and the Indian Act regimes that contemplate that trust funds can be encroached upon so long as it is in the best interest of the beneficiary. In particular, there is a possibility under at least some provincial regimes to encroach on the trust funds to pay for some maintenance and support expenses. Similar encroachments are possible for activities that directly benefit the child such as healthcare, education and sports. These encroachments are particularly problematic when the guardian is the state. The AFN is concerned about a process that would likely see some beneficiaries not having any funds left when they reach the age of majority.

[26] The trust provisions provide a consistent national regime. This permits uniform direction on how the trust funds will be managed. It also alleviates the burden on individual guardians of property to navigate the process for managing funds themselves. The AFN notes, much as the Caring Society does, the different regimes that apply across Canada and even in some instances within a jurisdiction based on the amount of compensation at issue. The AFN raises concerns that the reporting requirements under existing legislation are inadequate to safeguard the compensation funds because, if there is an abuse of funds, it is difficult to seek to have it remedied until a minor beneficiary reaches the age of majority.

At that point, any remedy is likely to require expensive litigation. In relation to the Indian Act in particular, the funds are not invested in a manner that permits reasonable returns.

[27] The AFN submits that the Tribunal has jurisdiction to approve the trust provisions in the Draft Compensation Framework. The Tribunal's remedial jurisdiction stems from the quasi-constitutional nature of the CHRA and the broad remedial discretion provided under section 53 of the CHRA. The AFN relies on Merrill Petroleums Ltd. v. Seaboard Oil Co., 1957 CanLII 631 (AB QB), 22 W.W.R. 529 at p 557 for the proposition that a trust instrument can supersede provincial law. The various provincial and territorial Trustee Acts reinforce the supremacy of trust deeds over general legislative provisions. For example, Manitoba's The Trustee Act, C.C.S.M. c. T160 provides at section 4 that > Nothing in this Act authorizes a trustee to do anything that he is in express terms forbidden to do, or to omit to do anything that he is in express terms directed to do, by the instrument creating the trust.

Similarly, the Ontario Trustee Act, R.S.O. 1990, c T.23 provides, at section 68, that > Nothing in this Act authorizes a trustee to do anything that the trustee is in express terms forbidden to do, or to omit to do anything that the trustee is in express terms directed to do by the instrument creating the trust.

[28] The AFN believes that the trust provisions in the Draft Compensation Framework are within the scope of the remedies available to the Tribunal. Furthermore, these provisions will give effect to the Tribunal's direction that the parties establish a process that will ensure that minors have their compensation "secured in a fund that would be accessible upon reaching majority" (Compensation Decision, para. 261).

(v) Other Parties

[29] The NAN indicated it supports the Caring Society and the AFN's position on the trust provisions. The Commission and the Chiefs of Ontario (COO) take no position.

B. Analysis

[30] The Tribunal has the jurisdiction under section 53 of the CHRA to approve the trust provisions in the Draft Compensation Framework. This will be explained below.

(i) Scope of Trust Law and Guardianship Law

(a) General Principles

[31] The AFN correctly articulates the general principle that legislative regimes regarding trusts contemplate specific provisions in a trust deed that can take precedence over most aspects of the legislation. In particular, Merrill Petroleums Limited v. Seaboard Oil Company, 1957 CanLII 631 (AB QB), at page 557, aff'd 1958 CanLII 499 (AB CA) supports the proposition that while the common law and statutes might impose some duties on trustees, the specific provisions of the trust are governed by the trust agreement:

> While it is also true that there are certain general obligations imposed by law on any trustee (e.g., the duty not to profit from the trust at the expense of the beneficiaries) the more specific obligations and duties of a trustee are set forth in the instrument creating the trust—in other words, except for those general duties imposed by law on all trustees, the terms of a trust are to be found within the four corners of the trust instrument.

[32] Provincial and territorial legislation relating to trusts contemplates the existence of a separate trust instrument managed by another trustee that is different from the regimes contemplated in provincial or territorial guardianship legislation. Similarly, there is no provision in the Indian Act that ousts the ability of an individual lacking legal capacity from benefiting from a trust deed and having their property managed by a trustee in accordance with the trust deed.

[33] The Caring Society provided the Tribunal with Whaley Estate Litigation on Guardianship in which with Lionel J. Tupman states at page 85 that establishing a trust is an alternative to relying on the default provisions in Ontario legislation that contemplates the appointment of a guardian of property:

> Trust Terms
>
> Further alternatives may exist having some bearing on the appointment of a guardian under [Ontario's Children's Law Reform Act], including various trust arrangements which may provide authority for the property to be held in trust by a parent or other individual/trustee, a will that contains trust terms, the designation of a trustee or a trust or trust settlement (inter vivos trust).

> (Lionel J. Tupman, "Guardianship of Property" in Whaley Estate Litigation on Guardianship, Kimberley A. Whaley and WEL, edited by Laura Cardiff (2015), Available online at https://welpartners.com/resources/WEL-on-guardianship.pdf)

[34] The proposition that a specific trust agreement is an alternative to relying on the guardianship provisions of legislation is a general proposition not limited to the specifics of the Ontario legislation. It applies across provincial, territorial and Indian Act legislation and provisions on guardianship.

[35] A review of provincial legislation supports the proposition that trust law generally contemplates that a trust agreement can take precedence over provisions in trust legislation. For example, the Ontario Trustee Act, RSO 1990, c T.23 at s. 67 and 68 provides that the powers in the Act are in addition to those established in the trust agreement and that nothing in the Act authorizes a trustee to do anything they are prohibited from doing by the trust agreement. The Alberta Trustee Act, RSA 2000, c T-8 does not have a general provision explaining the relationship of the Act to trust agreements but has provisions such as s. 35(6) that confirm that specific provisions of the Act are limited by the terms of the trust agreement. Similarly, the British Columbia Trustee Act, RSBC 1996, c 464 has various provisions such as s. 27(5) that stipulates that the section only applies if a contrary intention is not expressed in the trust agreement. It is clear that, in general, provincial legislation contemplates operating harmoniously with a trust agreement. In fact, it appears that much of the legislation is written to provide a default set of rules in the event that a trust agreement does not address an issue. A reading of this legislation does not support Canada's assertion that provincial legislation ousts the Tribunal's ability to structure a remedy in the form of a trust. Rather, it provides a framework that would give full effect to any trust created.

(b) Indian Act Regime

[36] Canada raises concerns that the Indian Act provides a complete scheme to address the property of individuals within the scope of the Act who lack the legal capacity to manage their own property. Canada identifies sections 51, 52 and 52.1-52.5 as setting out the applicable Indian Act regime. Canada's submissions on this matter provide little analysis beyond identifying these statutory provisions.

[37] On an initial reading, the provisions of the Indian Act appear to support the proposition that only the Minister may manage the property of an individual with Indian Act status who lacks legal capacity. For example, section 51(1) provides that "[s]ubject to this section, all jurisdiction and authority in relation to the property of mentally incompetent Indians is vested exclusively in the Minister." Similarly, for children, section 52 provides that "[t]he Minister may administer or provide for the administration of any property to which infant children of Indians are entitled, and may appoint guardians for that purpose." While there are provisions for appointing another individual to manage the property, the appointed guardian of property's powers flow from the Minister's approval (s. 51(2)(a) and s. 52.2).

[38] The Indian Act provisions are far sparser than the trust provisions in provincial and territorial legislation. They do not provide any explicit guidance on how the provisions interact with a trust agreement. However, some of the case law and general trust principles provide relevant insight and support a conclusion that the Indian Act does not preclude the Tribunal ordering the proposed trust provisions.

[39] First, a number of cases show how the Minister has broadly applied the provisions to enable others to manage property covered by the applicable Indian Act sections. In Desmoulin (Committee of) v. Blair, 1991 CanLII 8345 (ON SC) the Minister made an order under section 51(3) of the Indian Act that the individual's property would be managed in accordance with the laws of Ontario, and consequentially, by a guardian of property. In Dickson (Estate of), 2012 YKSC 71, the facts highlight the Minister's efforts to find another appropriate individual to manage the property. In Polchies v. Canada, 2007 FC 493 monies payable to children were paid to parents. Some parents set up trust funds for their children. Furthermore, paragraph 62 confirms that the Minister does not have exclusive responsibility for the property of all children with Indian Act status living on reserve:

> since the discretion conferred on the Minister by section 52 can be triggered by the simple existence of two conditions (the existence of property to which infant children of Indians are entitled and the fact that they reside on a reserve), it would create an absurd result to say that the Minister must administer or provide for the administration of all property of all Indian children residing on reserves.

Similarly, 1985 Sawridge Trust v. Alberta (Public Trustee), 2012 ABQB 365 involves litigation about a trust that has child beneficiaries with Indian Act status. Collectively, these cases support an inference that the Indian Act regime is applied as a last resort, in a manner analogous to the default regimes under provincial legislation. The Indian Act does not preclude a trust agreement with a trustee acting on the authority of the trust agreement rather than the Indian Act.

[40] Second, the nature of a common law trust is to split title, or ownership, of property. The trustee has legal control of the property but not the right to benefit from the property. The beneficiary does not have legal control of the property but has the right to the benefits that flow from the property. There is a general principle in property law that one cannot give what one does not have. Under the proposed trust provisions, Canada would pay the compensation funds to the trustee. The trustee would receive legal control of the funds while the beneficiary would receive the right to benefit from the compensation funds. The property interest the trustee assumes over the property - the legal control of the compensation funds – has not yet passed to the beneficiary. Accordingly, the property does not come under the scope of the Indian Act because the legal control of the property has not yet passed to the beneficiary. The beneficiary who lacks legal capacity cannot give control of their compensation funds to the Minister under the Indian Act because they do not have the right to legally control their compensation funds until the funds are paid out in accordance with the terms of the trust agreement.

[41] Similarly, patrimony in a civil law trust would not come under the scope of the Indian Act because legal control of the property has not yet passed to the beneficiary. As explained by the SCC, “the trust in Quebec civil law does not result from the division of ownership but rather from the transfer of property in a patrimony created for a particular purpose and not held by anyone” (Yared v Karam, 2019 SCC 62 at para. 17).

[42] In conclusion, past practice and the nature of trust law both support that the Indian Act does not preclude the creation of the proposed trust provisions in the Draft Compensation Framework.

(c) Provincial Legislative Regimes

[43] Canada also argues that the provincial law provides a complete legislative regime that precludes the Tribunal imposing the proposed trust provisions. Canada specifically cites Saskatchewan's Children's Law Act 2020, S.S. 2020, c.2; Ontario's Children's Law Reform Act, RSO 1990, c. C-12; and British Columbia's Family Law Act, SBC 2011, c. 25. While the following analysis does not comprehensively review every provincial and territorial regime, it considers all the statutes referred to by Canada in its argument that the Tribunal lacks jurisdiction. Further, the generally similar structure of these common law statutes supports analogous reasoning that the role of trusts is largely similar in the provinces and territories not canvassed.

[44] The current legislation in force in Saskatchewan is The Children's Law Act, 1997, SS 1997, c C-8.2. The Children's Law Act, 2020, SS 2020, c 2 received royal assent on March 16, 2020 but, per s. 93, comes into force by order of the Lieutenant Governor in Council. That has not occurred as of the date of this ruling. Regardless, the relevant provisions of the legislation are the same as in the 1997 Act, subject only to being renumbered. References to the 2020 legislation are provided in brackets after the reference to the 1997 legislation that is currently in force.

[45] The key provision in Saskatchewan's 1997 legislation is section 32 [section 47]. The provision provides that "any moneys due and payable to the child" would be payable to the guardian of property under the Act. However, the establishment of the trust agreement would have the effect of not making money due and payable to the child until it is paid out from the trust fund in accordance with the provisions of the trust agreement. Accordingly, the provisions of the statute are not engaged. The analysis with respect to the Indian Act that the nature of the trust makes it so that the child cannot grant a property right they do not have applies equally under this legislation. While Canada is correct that section 30 [section 45] provides that the default provision is that the parents are the default guardians of property for a child, that does not displace the child's ability to benefit from a trust administered by a trustee other than the child's parents or other court appointed guardian.

[46] In Ontario, the pertinent legislation is the Children's Law Reform Act, RSO 1990, c C.12 and the Trustee Act, RSO 1990, c T.23. The Children's Law Reform Act does not specifically contemplate the child being the beneficiary of a separate trust agreement. The only provisions that specifically relate to the payment of compensation of over $10,000 to children are found in the Trustee Act which provides, at section 36(6), that compensation may be paid into the court. However, the Public Guardian and Trustee, whose office includes the Accountant of the Superior Court of Justice that is responsible for administering funds paid into court, indicates that a trust agreement is capable of directing that the appointed trustee manages the child's funds instead of having the money paid into court or paid to a court appointed guardian:

> 1. Why is children's money held in court?
>
> Ontario law requires children's assets to be held in court, unless:
>
> - a law or court order provides otherwise
> - a document such as a Will or trust instrument provides otherwise
> - a court has appointed a guardian of the child's property

[47] While Canada is again correct that sections 47-51 of the Ontario Children's Law Reform Act give priority to parents as the guardians of a child's property, it does not displace the possibility that the child is the beneficiary of a trust fund. Further, in the recent case of Santella v. Bruneau (Litigation Guardian of), 2020 ONSC 2937 the court refused to appoint a parent as the guardian of property not because of any evidence the parent would abuse the trust but because payment of the inheritance into the court would better protect the funds in the unlikely event the parent lost capacity or became bankrupt. It is not clear that the current case law supports a preference for parents to manage large sums of money in trust for their children.

[48] In British Columbia, the governing legislation is the Family Law Act, SBC 2011, c. 25. Section 177 stipulates that "[a] person having a duty to deliver property to a child may discharge the duty by delivering the relevant property to a trustee who is authorized to receive that property". The definitions in section 175 define a trustee to include a person authorized under a trust agreement. Accordingly, the legislation contemplates that Canada's compensation obligations arising from the Tribunal's orders can be discharged by making a payment to an authorized trustee. Furthermore, this analysis indicates that Canada is incorrect in its assertion that these provisions require that a trustee be appointed by a court order.

[49] The specific statutes referred to by Canada do not support the proposition that there is a preference, let alone a requirement, that compensation to minor beneficiaries must be in accordance with the provisions in the various common law Acts instead of through the proposed trust provisions in the Draft Compensation Framework.

(d) Conclusion

[50] The trusts and guardianship laws referred to by Canada do not preclude the Tribunal approving the trust provisions contained in the Draft Compensation Framework. First, the general structure of trust law contemplates that the statutory framework can exist harmoniously with a trust agreement. The statutory framework is not intended to preclude or limit the creation of trusts. Second, the Indian Act regime is capable of supporting separate trusts that exist with a structure outside the Indian Act. The Indian Act is best understood as providing provisions in the event that other structures are not in place to manage the property of an individual who lacks legal capacity. And finally, the provincial regimes contemplate, often explicitly, payments into trusts instead of the last resort appointment of guardians of property.

(ii) Scope of CHRA Remedial Provisions

[51] Section 53 of the CHRA reads as follows:

> 53 (1) At the conclusion of an inquiry, the member or panel conducting the inquiry shall dismiss the complaint if the member or panel finds that the complaint is not substantiated.
> (2) If at the conclusion of the inquiry the member or panel finds that the complaint is substantiated, the member or panel may, subject to section 54,

make an order against the person found to be engaging or to have engaged in the discriminatory practice and include in the order any of the following terms that the member or panel considers appropriate:

> (a) that the person cease the discriminatory practice and take measures, in consultation with the Commission on the general purposes of the measures, to redress the practice or to prevent the same or a similar practice from occurring in future, including
>
> > (i) the adoption of a special program, plan or arrangement referred to in subsection 16(1), or
> >
> > (ii) making an application for approval and implementing a plan under section 17;
>
> (b) that the person make available to the victim of the discriminatory practice, on the first reasonable occasion, the rights, opportunities or privileges that are being or were denied the victim as a result of the practice;
>
> (c) that the person compensate the victim for any or all of the wages that the victim was deprived of and for any expenses incurred by the victim as a result of the discriminatory practice;
>
> (d) that the person compensate the victim for any or all additional costs of obtaining alternative goods, services, facilities or accommodation and for any expenses incurred by the victim as a result of the discriminatory practice; and
> (e) that the person compensate the victim, by an amount not exceeding twenty thousand dollars, for any pain and suffering that the victim experienced as a result of the discriminatory practice.

(3) In addition to any order under subsection (2), the member or panel may order the person to pay such compensation not exceeding twenty thousand dollars to the victim as the member or panel may determine if the member or panel finds that the person is engaging or has engaged in the discriminatory practice wilfully or recklessly.

(4) Subject to the rules made under section 48.9, an order to pay compensation under this section may include an award of interest at a rate and for a period that the member or panel considers appropriate.

[52] At section 54, the legislator imposes limitations to the application of section 53 of the CHRA:

> 54 No order that is made under subsection 53(2) may contain a term
>
> > (a) requiring the removal of an individual from a position if that individual accepted employment in that position in good faith; or
> >
> > (b) requiring the expulsion of an occupant from any premises or accommodation, if that occupant obtained those premises or accommodation in good faith.

[53] No other limitation to remedies is expressed in the CHRA.

[54] Therefore, the Panel uses the Driedger approach and a broad and purposive interpretation of the Act, as espoused by the Supreme Court of Canada, is warranted in any human rights analysis:

> According to the modern principle of statutory interpretation, the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense, harmoniously with the scheme and object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament: Elmer A. Driedger, The Construction of Statutes, (Toronto: Butterworths, 1974) at p. 67.
>
> (Andrews et al. v. Indian and Northern Affairs Canada, 2013 CHRT 21, at para. 58)

[55] The Tribunal elaborated on this approach in First Nations Child & Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada), 2015 CHRT 14, at paras.12-13:

> [12] The basic rule of statutory interpretation is that "the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context, in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament" (Elmer Driedger, Construction of Statutes, 2nd ed. (Toronto: Butterworths, 1983), at p. 87; see also Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), [1998] 1 SCR 27, at para. 21).
>
> [13] The special nature of human rights legislation is also taken into account in its interpretation:
>
> > Human rights legislation is intended to give rise, amongst other things, to individual rights of vital importance, rights capable of enforcement, in the final analysis, in a court of law. I recognize that in the construction of such legislation the words of the Act must be given their plain meaning, but it is equally important that the rights enunciated be given their full recognition and > effect. We should not search for ways and means to minimize those rights and to enfeeble their proper impact. Although it may seem commonplace, it may be wise to remind ourselves of the statutory guidance given by the Federal Interpretation Act which asserts that statutes are deemed to be remedial and are thus to be given such fair, large and liberal interpretation as will best ensure that their objects are attained.

> (CN v. Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission), [1987] 1 SCR 1114, at p. 1134)

Similarly, in B. v. Ontario (Human Rights Commission), 2002 SCC 66, at para. 44, the Supreme Court reiterated:

> More generally, this Court has repeatedly reiterated the view that human rights legislation has a unique quasi-constitutional nature and ought to be interpreted in a liberal and purposive manner in order to advance the broad policy considerations underlying it: see, for example, Gould v. Yukon Order of Pioneers, [1996] 1 S.C.R. 571, at para. 120; University of British Columbia v. Berg, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 353, at p. 370; Robichaud v. Canada (Treasury Board), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 84, at pp. 89-90; Insurance Corp. of British Columbia v. Heerspink, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 145, at pp. 157-58.
>
> (B. v. Ontario (Human Rights Commission), 2002 SCC 66, at para. 44)

[56] Section 2 of the CHRA enunciates the purpose of the Act:

> 2 The purpose of this Act is to extend the laws in Canada to give effect, within the purview of matters coming within the legislative authority of Parliament, to the principle that all individuals should have an opportunity equal with other individuals to make for themselves the lives that they are able and wish to have and to have their needs accommodated, consistent with their duties and obligations as members of society, without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, marital status, family status, genetic characteristics, disability or conviction for an offence for which a pardon has been granted or in respect of which a record suspension has been ordered.

[57] Section 3 of the CHRA prohibits discrimination and sections 5 to 14.1 enunciate prohibited discriminatory practices.

[58] The Supreme Court of Canada described human rights legislation as “the final refuge of the disadvantaged and the disenfranchised” (see Zurich Insurance v. O.H.R.C., 1992 CanLII 67 (SCC), [1992] 2 S.C.R. 321; see also 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 44).

[59] The wording of section 53(2) of the CHRA mentions that the Panel or member may “make an order against the person found to be engaging or to have engaged in the discriminatory practice and include in the order any of the following terms that the member or panel considers appropriate” (emphasis added). This suggests that Parliament awarded considerable discretion to presiding members in order to remedy discrimination and prevent its reoccurrence. This is consistent with a case-by-case approach and special programs found at section 16 of the CHRA and discussed by the Supreme Court in CN v. Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission), 1987 CanLII 109 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 1114 (Action Travail des femmes), where the Appellant, Action Travail des femmes, alleged that CN was guilty of discriminatory hiring and promotion practices contrary to s. 10 of the CHRA by denying employment opportunities to women in certain unskilled blue-collar positions. A Human Rights Tribunal constituted under the Act adjudicated the complaint, found that the evidence indicated clearly that the recruitment, hiring and promotion policies at CN prevented and discouraged women from working on blue-collar jobs, and concluded that it was essential to impose upon CN a special employment program. The SCC was asked to determine whether the Tribunal has the power under s. 41(2)(a) (now 53(2)(a)) CHRA to impose upon an employer an "employment equity program" to address the problem of "systemic discrimination" in the hiring and promotion of a disadvantaged group, in this case women.

[60] The SCC first ruled out the strict application of the grammatical method of interpretation in the case under examination:

> I do not think the answer to the question posed in this appeal will be found by applying strict grammatical construction to the last twelve words of s. 41(2)(a). (…) First, such an approach renders meaningless the specific reference back to s. 15(1) contained in s. 41(2)(a). Section 15(1) of the Act is designed to save employment equity programs from attack on the ground of "reverse discrimination". If s. 41(2)(a) is read to limit the scope of such programs, no effective mandatory employment equity program could be undertaken in any circumstances, and the legislative protection offered to the principle of > employment equity would be nullified. Second, in focussing solely upon the limited purposive aspect of s. 41(2)(a) itself, the dominant purpose of the Canadian Human Rights Act is ignored"

> (Action Travail des femmes, at p 1133).

[61] To the contrary, in the interpretation of the CHRA, it is important to take into account the purpose of the CHRA, that is to extend the present laws in Canada as set forth in section 2 in order to give effect to the principle that every human being should be given equal opportunity to live his or her life without discrimination (Action Travail des femmes, at p 1133). It should be recalled that human rights legislations are intended to give effect to rights of vital importance, ultimately enforceable by a court of law (Action Travail des femmes, at p 1134). As a result, while the meaning of the words of the CHRA is important, rights must be given full recognition and effect (Action Travail des femmes, at p 1134). This is also in line with the federal Interpretation Act, RSC 1985, c I-21, according to which statutes are deemed remedial and thus, must receive a fair, large and liberal interpretation with a view to give effect to their objects and purpose (Action Travail des femmes, at p 1134).

[62] This comprehensive method of interpretation of human rights legislation was first stated in Insurance Corporation of British Columbia v. Heerspink, 1982 CanLII 27 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 145, where Justice Lamer acknowledged the fundamental nature of human rights legislation: they are "not to be treated as another ordinary law of general application. It should be recognized for what it is, a fundamental law" (Action Travail des femmes, at pp 1135-36, citing Heerspink, at p. 158). This principle of interpretation was later confirmed and further articulated in Winnipeg School Division No. I v. Craton, 1985 CanLII 48 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 150, at p. 156, where Justice McIntyre, writing for a unanimous Court, stated that:

> Human rights legislation is of a special nature and declares public policy regarding matters of general concern. It is not constitutional in nature in the sense that it may not be altered, amended, or repealed by the Legislature. It is, however, of such nature that it may not be altered, amended, or repealed, nor may exceptions be created to its provisions, save by clear legislative pronouncement
> (cited in Action Travail des femmes, at 1136).

[63] The same year, in Ontario Human Rights Commission v. Simpsons-Sears Ltd., 1985 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 536 [O'Malley], Justice McIntyre, again writing for a unanimous Court, established the governing principles for the interpretation of human rights legislations:

> It is not, in my view, a sound approach to say that according to established rules of construction no broader meaning can be given to the Code than the narrowest interpretation of the words employed. The accepted rules of construction are flexible enough to enable the Court to recognize in the construction of a human rights code the special nature and purpose of the enactment …, and give it an interpretation which will advance its broad purposes. Legislation of this type is of a special nature, not quite constitutional but certainly more than the ordinary—and it is for the courts to seek out its purpose and give it effect. The Code aims at the removal of discrimination
> (O'Malley, at pp 546-57, cited in Action Travail des femmes, at p 1136).

[64] The CHRA's emphasis is placed on discriminatory practices and its effects (Action Travail des femmes, at p 1138, referring to Bhinder v. Canadian National Railway Co., 1985 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 561and O'Malley).

[65] These principles must equally be applied when interpreting the remedial powers granted to the Tribunal under the CHRA. In Action Travail des femmes, the SCC was presented with evidence of systemic discrimination, the definition of which was established as follows:

> Systemic discrimination in an employment context is discrimination that results from the simple operation of established procedures of recruitment, hiring and promotion, none of which is necessarily designed to promote discrimination. The discrimination is then reinforced by the very exclusion of the disadvantaged group because the exclusion fosters the belief, both within and outside the group, that the exclusion is the result of "natural" forces.
> (Action Travail des femmes, at p 1139 referring to Abella, Rosalie S. Report of the Commission on Equality in Employment. Ottawa: Minister of Supply and Services Canada, 1984).

[66] For the SCC, paragraph 2 of the Special Temporary Measures Order, ordering the CN to implement a special employment program, was specifically designed to address and remedy the type of systemic discrimination against women in the case under examination. Therefore, the SCC addressed the specific issue of the scope of the remedial powers established under section 41(2)(a) (now 53(2)(a)) of the CHRA, taking into account the power granted to the Tribunal to order measures regarding the "adoption of a special program, plan or arrangement referred to in subsection 15(1) (now 16(1)), to prevent the same or a similar practice occurring in the future" (Action Travail des femmes, at p. 1139).

[67] Concurring with the dissenting opinion of Justice MacGuigan of the Federal Court of Appeal in the case under appeal, the SCC held that section 41(2)(a) (now 53(2)(a)) is "designed to allow human rights tribunals to prevent future discrimination against identifiable protected groups" (Action Travail des femmes, at p 1141). In cases of systemic discrimination, the prevention of reoccurrence of discriminatory practices often requires referring to historical patterns of discrimination in order to design appropriate strategies for the future (Action Travail des femmes, at p. 1141). Furthermore, the SCC held that the type of measure ordered by the Tribunal in the case under examination may be the only means to achieve the purpose of the CHRA, that is to combat and prevent future discrimination (Action Travail des femmes, at p. 1141, 1145).

[68] In these cases, remedy and prevention cannot be dissociated, since "there is no prevention without some form of remedy" (Action Travail des femmes, at p. 1142). Thus, the remedies available under section 53(2)(a) CHRA are directed toward a specific protected group and are not only compensatory in nature, but also prospective. As a result, with a view to achieve the prevention objective of the CHRA, a "special program, plan or arrangement" as referred to in subsection 16 (1) CHRA serves three main purposes: (1) countering the effect of systemic discrimination; (2) addressing the attitudinal problem of stereotyping, and; (3) Creating a critical mass, which may have an impact on the "continuing self-correction of the system" (Action Travail des femmes, at pp 1143-44).

[69] In sum, while ruling that the Tribunal had the power to order such a special measure, the SCC summarized its findings as follows:

> For the sake of convenience, I will summarize my conclusions as to the validity of the employment equity program ordered by the Tribunal. To render future discrimination pointless, to destroy discriminatory stereotyping and to create the required "critical mass" of target group participation in the work force, it is essential to combat the effects of past systemic discrimination. In so doing, possibilities are created for the continuing amelioration of employment opportunities for the previously excluded group. The dominant purpose of employment equity programs is always to improve the situation of the target group in the future. MacGuigan J. stressed in his dissent that "the prevention > of systemic discrimination will reasonably be thought to require systemic remedies" (p. 120). Systemic remedies must be built upon the experience of the past so as to prevent discrimination in the future. Specific hiring goals, as Hugessen J. recognized, are a rational attempt to impose a systemic remedy on a systemic problem. The Special Temporary Measures Order of the Tribunal thus meets the requirements of s. 41(2)(a) of the Canadian Human Rights Act. It is a "special program, plan or arrangement" within the meaning of s. 15(1) and therefore can be ordered under s. 41(2)(a). The employment equity order is rationally designed to combat systemic discrimination in the Canadian National St. Lawrence Region by preventing "the same or a similar practice occurring in the future".

> (Action Travail des femmes, at pp 1145-46).

[70] The Panel has relied on several occasions on the principles established by the Supreme Court of Canada in Action Travail des femmes, see for example: 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 468; 2016 CHRT 10, at para. 12-18; 2018 CHRT 4, at para. 21-39; 2019 CHRT 39, at para. 97.

[71] In Robichaud v. Canada (Treasury Board), 1987 CanLII 73 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 84 [Robichaud], the SCC was asked to determine whether an employer was responsible for the unauthorized discriminatory acts of its employees in the course of their employment under the CHRA. For the SCC, in order to determine the legal regime of liability applicable under the CHRA, it was necessary to start by examining the Act itself, “the words of which, like those of other statutes, must be read in light of its nature and purpose” (Robichaud, at para. 7).

[72] As per Robichaud, at para. 8, the purpose of the CHRA, provided for under section 2, is to extend to the laws in Canada with a view to give effect to the principle that every human being should be given equal opportunity to live his or her life without discrimination. As a result, the CHRA must be interpreted so as to advance the broad policy it underlies (Robichaud, at para. 8, referring to O’Malley). As the CHRA incorporates certain basic goals of the society, its interpretation must therefore follow a fair, large and liberal method with the aim of achieving its purpose (Robichaud, at para. 8 referring to Action Travail des femmes).

[73] The Tribunal also discussed section 16 of the CHRA relating to the adoption of a special program, plan or arrangement and prevention of future discrimination by relying on National Capital Alliance on Race Relations v. Canada (Department of Health & Welfare), 1997 CanLII 1433 (CHRT) in 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 34:

> Section 53(2)(a) of the CHRA gives this Tribunal the jurisdiction to make a cease-and-desist order. In addition, if the Tribunal considers it appropriate to prevent the same or a similar practice from occurring in the future, it may order certain measures including the adoption of a special program, plan or arrangement referred to in subsection 16(1) of the CHRA (see National Capital Alliance on Race Relations (NCARR) v. Canada (Department of Health & Welfare) T.D.3/97, pp. 30-31). The scope of this jurisdiction was considered by the Supreme Court of Canada in CN v. Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission), 1987 CanLII 109 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 1114, [Action Travail des Femmes]). In adopting the dissenting opinion of MacGuigan, J. in the Federal Court of Appeal, the Court stated that:
> > ...s. 41(2)(a), [now 53(2)(a)], was designed to allow human rights tribunals to prevent future discrimination against identifiable protected groups, but he held that "prevention" is a broad term and that it is often necessary to refer to historical patterns of discrimination, in order to design appropriate strategies for the future...... (at page 1141).

[74] Following these interpretative principles, remedies available under the CHRA must be effective and “consistent with the "almost constitutional" nature of the rights protected” (Robichaud, at para. 13). As a consequence, in the case under examination, the SCC concluded that the broad remedial powers under the CHRA must be available against the employer. A narrower interpretation of the Act would have the effect of nullifying its remedial powers:

> Who but the employer could order reinstatement? This is true as well of para. (c) which provides for compensation for lost wages and expenses. Indeed, if the Act is concerned with the effects of discrimination rather than its causes (or motivations), it must be admitted that only an employer can remedy undesirable effects; only an employer can provide the most important remedy a healthy work environment. The legislative emphasis on prevention and elimination of undesirable conditions, rather than on fault, moral responsibility and punishment, argues for making the Act's carefully crafted remedies effective. It indicates that the intention of the employer is irrelevant, at least for purposes of s. 41(2). Indeed, it is significant that s. 41(3) provides for additional remedies in circumstances where the discrimination was reckless or wilful (i.e., intentional). In short, I have no doubt that if the Act is to achieve > its purpose, the Commission must be empowered to strike at the heart of the problem, to prevent its recurrence and to require that steps be taken to enhance the work environment.

> (Robichaud, at para. 15, emphasis added).

[75] The Panel has relied on several occasions on the principles established by the Supreme Court of Canada in Robichaud, see for example: 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 43, 468; 2016 CHRT 10, at para. 11-18; 2018 CHRT 4, at para. 26, 28; 2019 CHRT 39, at para. 94.

[76] Additionally, the wording in section 53(2)(e) and 53(3) of the CHRA is broad enough to include the compensation order to be paid in a trust fund. The idea here is that the Act allows a maximum of $20,000 under each heading 53 (2)(e) and 53(3) and the Panel has determined that the discrimination found in this case is of the worst kind justifying the maximum amount permissible in the Act (see 2019 CHRT 39 at paras. 242, 247, 249, 250 and 258).

[77] Ordering compensation to be paid into trust is not unprecedented and is within the scope of the broad remedial powers of the CHRA.

[78] There is precedent for a court ordering that a remedy be paid into trust instead of directly to a beneficiary where that arrangement is more advantageous to the beneficiary:

> I would also accede to S.A.'s request that MVHC pay the costs award into a trust on the same terms, for the same beneficiaries and with the same trustees as the Trust.
> (S.A. v. Metro Vancouver Housing Corp., 2019 SCC 4, para. 73)

[79] It is not a distinguishing feature that in that case the order was made by the Supreme Court of Canada on appeal from a Superior Court. The reasons do not indicate that the Court is relying on the inherent jurisdiction of Superior Courts to order that the costs be paid into the trust. Similar orders appear to have been made by Tribunals in Otis Canada Inc. v International Union of Elevator Constructors, 1991 CanLII 12578 (NS LA) and earlier in the proceeding prior to Vermilion Resources Ltd. (Re), 2011 CanLII 95455 (AB SRB). More generally, compensation or damages are often paid to the successful party's lawyer in trust rather than directly to the successful party. This occurs even when the order does not expressly permit a payment into trust. Further, the Tribunal has jurisdiction to implement the broad remedial power of the quasi-constitutional CHRA (Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse) v. Communauté urbaine de Montréal, [2004] 1 SCR 789 at para. 26 and Hughes v. Elections Canada, 2010 CHRT 4 at para. 50). Section 53 also speaks more broadly of ordering that a person “compensate the victim” of a discriminatory practice. It does not limit compensation to a direct monetary payment to the victim. Benefiting from funds paid into trust and administered by a trustee is indisputably a form of compensation. Accordingly, a proper interpretation of the broad remedial powers under section 53 of the CHRA supports the Tribunal exercising similar remedial power and ordering that compensation be paid into a trust where that is in the beneficiary’s interests.

(iii) Application

[80] The Panel views the trust fund as a hybrid remedy. On one hand, compensation is paid. On the other hand, the preferred process to pay this compensation considers other relevant factors such as creating a culturally safe process in light of the specific circumstances of this case, the vulnerability of victims/survivors who are minors or adults who lack legal capacity, access to justice, a clear and equitable process across Canada, protection of funds from administrative fees, etc. Therefore, this part of the remedy can be viewed as a “special program, plan or arrangement” provided for in the CHRA and explained by the Supreme Court and Tribunal in the decisions discussed above. In sum, the trust fund is also a remedy that accounts for the specific needs of the victims/survivors in a case where the legacy of colonialism, residential schools, the sixties' scoop and historical prejudices form part of the Tribunal's findings. For those reasons, the CHRA analysis and reasoning found in paras. 51-75 in the scope of CHRA remedial provisions section applies to the trust fund aspect of the compensation.

[81] The Panel agrees it is vital that persons who cannot manage their own financial affairs receive culturally appropriate and trauma informed services to avoid further harm. This is consistent with what the Supreme Court described, mentioned above, as referring to historical patterns of discrimination in order to design appropriate strategies for the future (Action Travail des femmes at p.1141). This is also consistent with the approach taken in the Panel’s rulings.

[82] The Panel agrees with the Caring Society that burdens would fall on families in the absence of the Appointed Trustee. The Panel also agrees that the provincial and Indian Act regimes referred to by the parties contemplate the appointment of a guardian of property as a default regime of last resort. The proposed Appointed Trustee provides an alternative to the default "last resort" statutory regimes in a manner that will more effectively implement the Tribunal's orders. Accordingly, there is no conflict between the proposed Appointed Trustee and trust provisions in the Draft Compensation Framework approved under the CHRA and the trustee and guardianship law referred to by Canada.

[83] Finally, the Panel agrees with the Caring Society that the Appointed Trustee avoids the four obstacles for beneficiaries who lack legal capacity listed above. First, it avoids the challenge of determining the legislative provisions that apply to the individual under the provincial, territorial, or legislative regimes, depending on which legislative framework applies to the individual. The complexity of engaging with the legislation may require beneficiaries to hire legal counsel that would in effect reduce their compensation. Second, the legislative regime within a jurisdiction is often different for adults and children who lack legal capacity. Third, the administrative steps imposed on families under the provincial, territorial and Indian Act regimes may result in some families not completing the necessary steps and beneficiaries therefore not receiving compensation. Fourth, the default regimes do not contain provisions to ensure beneficiaries receive culturally appropriate and trauma informed services.

[84] The Panel's approach to resolving the alleged conflict between the quasi-constitutional CHRA and provincial legislation is informed in part by the analysis in Thibodeau v. Air Canada, 2014 SCC 67. The decision emphasizes that legislation is presumed to act as a coherent whole where legislators do not intend to enact conflicting statutory provisions:

> First, courts take a restrictive approach to what constitutes a conflict in this context. Second, courts find that there is a conflict only when the existence of the conflict, in the restrictive sense of the word, cannot be avoided by interpretation. Overlap, on its own, does not constitute conflict in this context, so that even where the ambit of two provisions overlaps, there is a presumption that they both are meant to apply, provided that they can do so without producing absurd results. This presumption may be rebutted if one of > the provisions was intended to cover the subject matter exhaustively. Third, only where a conflict is unavoidable should the court resort to statutory provisions and principles of interpretation concerned with which law takes precedence over the other.

> (Thibodeau at para. 92).

[85] The court goes on to highlight that a conflict only occurs if the concurrent application of both pieces of legislation would create an absurd result or if there is a direct contradiction such as one enactment only permitting an extension of time before the time limit expired while another allowed extensions after it expired (Thibodeau at paras. 94-96).

[86] As indicated earlier, it is possible to read the provincial trustee and guardianship law harmoniously with the CHRA. The same is true for the Indian Act by drawing on the analogies to provincial common law statutes that highlight that the guardianship provisions in the legislation are intended to be a default regime capable of being supplemented through trusts. Following the analysis in Thibodeau, this is the correct approach.

[87] It is true that Thibodeau contemplates alleged conflicts between legislative provisions enacted by the same government. In this case, Canada alleges that some of the conflicts are between the federal CHRA and provincial laws relating to trusts and guardianship. The result is still the same.

[88] First, the analogous principle when considering whether laws enacted by provincial governments and the federal government conflict is cooperative federalism. The doctrine aims “to facilitate interlocking federal and provincial legislative schemes” (Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 14 at para. 17). There is amble support for concluding that the provincial and federal legislation are capable of acting harmoniously.

[89] Second, even if there were merit to Canada’s claim that provincial legislation limited the remedial scope of the CHRA, the Tribunal would be constrained by section 57(1) of the Federal Court Act, RSC 1985, c F-7:

> Constitutional questions
> 57 (1) If the constitutional validity, applicability or operability of an Act of Parliament or of the legislature of a province, or of regulations made under such an Act, is in question before the Federal Court of Appeal or the Federal > Court or a federal board, commission or other tribunal, other than a service tribunal within the meaning of the National Defence Act, the Act or regulation shall not be judged to be invalid, inapplicable or inoperable unless notice has been served on the Attorney General of Canada and the attorney general of each province in accordance with subsection (2).

[90] As Canada has not served a Notice of Constitutional Question, the Tribunal would be unable to find that the CHRA is inapplicable or inoperable in the face of the provincial legislation relied on by Canada. The Panel's analysis has clearly demonstrated that, on a proper interpretation of the CHRA, the proposed trust terms are within the scope of the CHRA's remedial provisions.

[91] Agreeing with Canada to use provincial legislation to pay compensation to minors and adults who lack legal capacity is actually allowing other statutes to limit an order made by this Panel who has determined this amount owed to victims of the discriminatory practice is justified. As explained above, many provincial statutes allow for administrative and other expenses to be deducted from the beneficiary's funds. This could deplete the amount owed to the victims and would reduce the compensation determined to be appropriate by this Panel for the victims' pain and suffering as a result of racial discrimination. Such a result cannot be Parliament's intent. In fact, allowing provincial statutes to authorize a reduction of the amount ordered by this Panel to be paid to the victims/survivors would in fact allow the Provinces to exercise their jurisdiction in a manner that would hinder the Tribunal's orders. This is not permissible. The Supreme Court of Canada in Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 SCC 31, [2018] 2 SCR 230 [Matson and Andrews] did not remove the primacy of the CHRA over other general statutes in the presence of a finding of discrimination (see 2020 CHRT 20 at paras. 253-265).

[92] While Canada only directed the Panel to three provincial legislative schemes, it is appropriate to conclude that these legislative schemes are representative of trust law and guardianship law across Canada. In particular, no other provincial or territorial regimes are more favourable to Canada's position. If they were, Canada would have advanced them in its submissions. For the Panel to seek to comprehensively review the other provincial and territorial trustee and guardianship statutory regimes would deny the parties an opportunity to present their case in relation to those regimes and deny the Panel the benefit of any assistance the parties' submissions would provide in considering any nuances that might arise under these regimes. Furthermore, the common law generally operates similarly across provinces and territories. If there were any material differences in other common law provincial and territorial legislation, it was incumbent on Canada to draw that to the Tribunal and other parties' attention. The trust provisions under the Civil Code of Quebec, CQLR c CCQ 1991 may not be directly analogous to the common law because Quebec uses civil law. However, if those provisions supported Canada's position that provincial law precluded the creation of a trust under the CHRA, Canada ought to have put forward an argument based on Quebec law. Again, absent that argument, the Panel can conclude that the outcome under Quebec law would be the same as in the common law provinces although the reasoning may differ under civil law.

[93] The Panel's jurisdiction to award remedies in the presence of a proven discriminatory practice is exercised under a quasi-constitutional statute that, in the event of a conflict, has primacy over other federal statutes. However, as demonstrated, a proper approach to statutory interpretation demonstrates that there is no conflict either between the CHRA and the guardianship provisions in the Indian Act or between the CHRA and provincial guardianship and trustee legislation referred to by Canada.

(iv) Perverse effect in using the Indian Act to award compensation

[94] In addition, the Panel believes there is a perverse effect in using the Indian Act in order to distribute compensation. The Indian Act for many First Nations peoples is an instrument of oppression and of racism that is aimed at eliminating First Nations over time (see 2020 CHRT 20 at paras. 167-169, 171). This is not the best course of action to foster reconciliation and to eliminate discrimination when there is a safer road that can be followed. The Panel is compensating children and families for pain and suffering of significant adverse effects such as being removed from their homes, communities and Nations as a result of Canada's systemic and racial discrimination. The Panel also found in the Merit Decision that this was a continuation of the residential schools' system, for which in 2008 the Prime Minister issued an apology. The Panel believes it is important to avoid additional pain and suffering to victims in forcing them to use the Indian Act to receive compensation. As mentioned above, the regime under the Indian Act confers powers to the Minister to manage the property of an individual with Indian Act status who lacks legal capacity. In the Panel's view, it would be inappropriate to force victims/survivors that have suffered racial and systemic discrimination at the hands of Canada to require them to have their compensation funds managed by Canada and to seek Canada's approval in order to access funds. This is not culturally safe in light of this specific case.

[95] Nothing in the CHRA suggests that ordering compensation to be paid into a trust fund exceeds the Tribunal's jurisdiction under the CHRA. In fact, given the specific facts in this case, it may be the most permissible way to uphold a culturally appropriate and safe process for First Nations victim-survivors.

[96] Canada's proposed approach does not consider the importance of culturally appropriate processes in dealing with victims of discrimination, the complexity of communicating non-conflicting information to access compensation and the fact that most provincial legislations allow for the administrator to charge administration fees payable from the compensation funds. In the process elaborated by the First Nations parties, Canada would pay for those fees and this would ensure the funds would not be depleted by administration fees. This would be in line with the Tribunal's intentions when it ruled Canada's actions were of the worst form of racial and systemic discrimination and that this warranted for the maximum compensation under the CHRA. Allowing administration fees to be payable to administrators of the funds under provincial legislation would in fact lower the Tribunal's compensation awards. Moreover, it would also create inequalities amongst the minor and incapacitated adult beneficiaries as administration fees vary from one province to the other.

III. NAN's Role in the Compensation Process

A. Context

[97] NAN was granted interested party status in 2016 CHRT 11 that allowed NAN to participate in the proceedings as an intervenor. NAN's participation was limited to "the specific considerations of delivering child and family services to remote and Northern Ontario communities and the factors required to successfully provide those services in those communities" (2016 CHRT 11, para. 5).

[98] In the Compensation Decision, the Tribunal directed the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada to consult with the interested parties:

> The Commission and the interested parties should be consulted in this process however, they are not ordered to participate if they decide not to.
>
> (Compensation Decision, para. 269).

[99] The Draft Compensation Framework contains a provision contemplating further development of tools to guide the implementation of the compensation framework. Section 13.2 contemplates consulting with NAN as part of that process:

> 13.2. The parties will discuss the development of these tools with the Commission and with the Interested Parties, as appropriate, in keeping with the scope of their status as Interested Parties in this proceeding.

[100] NAN proposes to remove section 13.2 and instead amend section 1.4 to add the underlined section 1.4.1:

> 1.4 Throughout this document, the word "Parties" is used to refer collectively to the complainants, the AFN and the Caring Society, and the respondent Canada.
>
> 1.4.1 When reference is made to the "Parties" further developing or changing any process, tools, or document relating to the Compensation Process, including but not limited to amending this Framework, the term refers collectively to the AFN, the Caring Society, and Canada, in consultation with the CHRC, COO, and NAN; however, the CHRC, COO, and NAN do not have to participate in such further development/change should they decide not to.

And the following footnote:

> In keeping with the Tribunal's order regarding development of the compensation process, at para 269 of 2019 CHRT 39.

B. Position of the Parties

[101] NAN is concerned that the current provisions in section 13.2 of the Draft Compensation Framework do not adequately protect its participatory rights as indicated in the Compensation Decision. NAN expresses the need to repeatedly and forcefully articulate its desire to be involved in developing the Draft Compensation Framework. NAN believes its advocacy has strengthened the provisions relating to remote First Nations. Furthermore, remoteness issues cannot be compartmentalized so NAN's involvement is important throughout all aspects of developing the compensation process.

[102] The AFN, the Caring Society and Canada provided joint submissions in response. While acknowledging the important contributions of NAN, the COO and the Commission, they oppose the amendment. They argue section 1.2 ensures NAN's participatory rights are fully respected because it stipulates that the Draft Compensation Framework is consistent with the Tribunal's orders and is unable to derogate from them. The parties note that section 13.2 provides that NAN will be consulted as appropriate "in keeping with the scope of their status ... in this proceeding" whereas NAN's amendment would grant it participatory rights that exceed what it was granted by the Tribunal.

C. Analysis

[103] The Panel agrees with the NAN that remoteness issues cannot be compartmentalized and acknowledges that NAN's contribution to these proceedings has been meaningful. The Panel is also convinced that the NAN's participation in this compensation process has strengthened the provisions relating to remote First Nations. Remoteness issues have always been present in this case and have a considerable impact on service delivery. The Panel understands this and appreciates the NAN's expertise on these issues. However, the Panel does not view section 13.2 of the Draft Compensation Framework as infringing on the NAN's participatory rights or at odds with the compensation ruling. The provision provides for the NAN to be consulted "as appropriate" which is a reasonable approach in order to move forward efficiently. The Panel understands the NAN's concern as section 13.2 provides a discretion to the AFN, the Caring Society and Canada to decide what is appropriate in order to reach out for consultation as opposed to reiterating that the NAN ”should” be consulted, as provided for in the ruling. The Panel reiterates that the AFN, the Caring Society and Canada should consult with the NAN, the COO and the Commission on all important issues that concern them. Moreover, the Framework is intended to be consistent with the Tribunal’s Compensation Entitlement Order. Where there are discrepancies between this Framework and the Compensation Entitlement Order, or such further orders from the Tribunal as may be applicable, those orders will prevail and remain binding (see section 1.2 of the Draft Compensation Framework). The Panel believes this section is clear and protects the NAN’s participatory rights in this process.

[104] Furthermore, as mentioned in the December 14, 2020 decision letter, nothing in any of the Tribunal’s orders is intended to infringe on the inherent rights of self-determination and self-governance of First Nations in Canada. Canada has obligations to meaningfully consult with First Nations on all matters concerning them regardless of whether or not they are part of these proceedings.

IV. Jordan’s Principle Discrimination Eligibility Timeframe

A. Context

[105] The Tribunal addressed the period of discriminatory application of Jordan’s Principle for which compensation would be ordered in the Compensation Decision. Subsequently, in 2020 CHRT 7, the Tribunal realized that there were additional issues relating to the timeframe for which compensation was ordered. While the Tribunal addressed the issue of First Nations in care as of January 1, 2006 who were apprehended earlier, the Tribunal realized there were similar issues with respect to First Nations children awaiting Jordan’s Principle services as of December 12, 2007 or who were otherwise affected by discriminatory treatment as of that date. The Tribunal accordingly requested additional submissions on this issue (2020 CHRT 7, paras. 152-155). After receiving the parties’ submissions, the Tribunal confirmed the order from the Compensation Decision in 2020 CHRT 15 at paras. 7-11.

[106] Paragraphs 250 to 257 of the Compensation Decision set out entitlement to compensation for discrimination related to Jordan’s Principle:

Compensation for First Nations children and their parents or grandparents in cases of unnecessary removal of a child to obtain essential services and/or experienced gaps, delays and denials of services that would have been available under Jordan's Principle

[250] The Panel finds there is sufficient evidence and other information in this case to establish, on a balance of probabilities, that Canada's systemic racial discrimination found in the Tribunal's [Merit] Decision 2016 CHRT 2 and subsequent rulings (2017 CHRT 7, 2017 CHRT 14, 2017 CHRT 35 and 2018 CHRT 4) resulted in harming First Nations children living on reserve or off-reserve who, as a result of a gap, delay and/or denial of services were deprived of essential services and placed in care outside of their homes, families and communities in order to receive those services or without being placed in out-of-home care were denied services and therefore did not benefit from services covered under Jordan's Principle as defined in 2017 CHRT 14 and 35 (for example, mental health and suicide preventions services, special education, dental etc.). Finally, children who received services upon reconsideration ordered by this Tribunal and children who received services with unreasonable delays have also suffered during the time of the delays and denials. All those children above mentioned experienced pain and suffering of the worst kind warranting the maximum award of remedy of $20,000 under section 53 (2)(e) of the CHRA. Canada is ordered to pay $20,000 to each First Nations child removed from their home and placed in care in order to access services and for each First Nations child who was not removed from the home and was denied services or received services after an unreasonable delay or upon reconsideration ordered by this Tribunal, between December 12, 2007 (date of the adoption in the House of Commons of Jordan's Principle) and November 2, 2017 (date of the Tribunal's 2017 CHRT 35 ruling on Jordan's Principle), following the process discussed below.

[251] The Panel finds there is sufficient evidence and other information in this case to establish, on a balance of probabilities, that Canada's systemic racial discrimination found in the Tribunal's [Merit] Decision 2016 CHRT 2 and subsequent rulings (2017 CHRT 7, 2017 CHRT 14, 2017 CHRT 35 and 2018 CHRT 4) resulted in harming First Nations parents or grandparents living on reserve or off reserve who, as a result of a gap, delay and/or denial of services were deprived of essential services for their child and had their child placed in care outside of their homes, families and communities in order to receive those services and therefore, did not benefit from services covered under Jordan's Principle as defined in 2017 CHRT 14 and 35. Those parents or grandparents experienced pain and suffering of the worst kind warranting the maximum award of remedy of $20,000 under section 53 (2)(e) of the CHRA. Canada is ordered to pay $20,000 to each First Nations parent or grandparent who had their child removed and placed in out-of-home care in order to access services and for each First Nations parent or grandparent who's child was not removed from the home and was denied services or received services after an unreasonable delay or upon reconsideration ordered by this Tribunal, between December 12, 2007 (date of the adoption in the House of Commons of Jordan's Principle) and November 2, 2017 (date of the Tribunal's 2017 CHRT 35 ruling on Jordan's Principle), following the process discussed below.

[252] It should be understood that the pain and suffering compensation for a First Nations child, parent or grandparent covered under the Jordan's Principle orders cannot be combined with the other orders for compensation for removal of a child from a home, a family and a community rather, the removal of a child from a home is included in the Jordan's Principle orders.

[253] The Panel finds as explained above there is sufficient evidence and other information in this case to establish on a balance of probabilities that Canada was aware of the discriminatory practices of its child welfare program offered to First Nations children and families and also of the lack of access to services under Jordan's Principle for First Nations children and families. Canada's conduct was devoid of caution and without regard for the consequences experienced by First Nations children and their families warranting the maximum award for remedy under section 53(3) of the CHRA for each First Nations child and parent or grandparent identified in the orders above.

[254] Canada is ordered to pay $20,000 to each First Nations child and parent or grandparent identified in the orders above for the period between January 1, 2006 and until the earliest of the following options occurs: the Panel informed by the parties and the evidence makes a determination that the unnecessary removal of First Nations children from their homes, families and communities as a result of the discrimination found in this case has ceased and effective and meaningful long-term relief is implemented; the parties agreed on a settlement agreement for effective and meaningful long-term relief; the Panel ceases to retain jurisdiction and beforehand amends this order for all orders above except Jordan's Principle orders given that the Jordan's Principle orders are for the period between December 12, 2007 and November 2, 2017 as explained above and, following the process discussed below.

[255] The term parent or grandparent recognizes that some children may not have parents and were in the care of their grandparents when they were removed from the home or experienced delays, gaps and denials in services. The Panel orders compensation for each parent or grandparent caring for the child in the home. If the child is cared for by two parents, each parent is entitled to compensation as described above. If two grandparents are caring for the child, both grandparents are entitled to compensation as described above.

[256] For clarity, parents or grandparents who sexually, physically or psychologically abused their children are entitled to no compensation under this process. The reasons were provided earlier in this ruling.

> [257] A parent or grandparent entitled to compensation under section 53 (2) (e) of the CHRA above and, who had more than one child unnecessarily apprehended is to be compensated $20,000 under section 53 (3) of the CHRA per child who was unnecessarily apprehended or denied essential services.

[107] The Tribunal directed that the parties consult to determine how to identify First Nations children for the purpose of the compensation process (Compensation Decision Order, para. 269). The parties were unable to agree and requested further guidance from the Tribunal. The Tribunal provided the requested guidance on how to construct eligibility criteria in 2020 CHRT 20 and finally in 2020 CHRT 36, a consent order to which all parties participated and agreed to including the NAN. As noted earlier, this decision only addresses Jordan's Principle eligibility and does not define First Nations identity.

[108] Canada, the Caring Society and the AFN added Section 4.2.5 and its subsections to the Draft Compensation Framework in response to the Tribunal's guidance in 2020 CHRT 20. Those provisions are the following:

> 4.2.5. "First Nations child" means a child who:
>
> a) was registered or eligible to be registered under the Indian Act;
> b) had one parent/guardian who is registered or eligible to be registered under the Indian Act;
> c) was recognized by their Nation for the purposes of Jordan's Principle; or > d) was ordinarily resident on reserve, or in a community with a self-government agreement.
>
> 4.2.5.1 Children referred to in section 4.2.5(d) (ordinarily resident on reserve or in a community with a self-government agreement ("First Nations community")) who do not meet any of the eligibility criteria in section 4.2.5(a) to (c) will only qualify for compensation if they had a meaningful connection to the First Nations community. The factors to be considered and carefully balanced include (without any single factor being determinative):
>
> a) Whether the child was born in a First Nations community or whose parents were residing in a First Nations community at the time of birth;
> b) How long the child has lived in a First Nations community;
> c) Whether the child's residence in a First Nations community was continuous;
> d) Whether the child was eligible to receive services and supports from the First Nation community while residing there

> (e.g. school, health services, social housing, bearing in mind that there may have been inadequate or non-existent services in the First Nations community at the time); and > e) The extent of the connection of the child's parents and/or other caregivers to the First Nation community, excluding those non-status individuals working on a reserve (i.e., RCMP, teachers, medical professionals, and social workers)
>
> 4.2.5.2 The timeframe for children referred to in section 4.2.5(b) to (d) above are eligible for compensation in relation to denials, gaps and unreasonable delays with respect to essential services is January 26, 2016 to November 2, 2017.
>
> 4.2.5.3 Children referred to in section 4.2.5(b) to (d) as well as their parents (or caregiving grandparents) are eligible for compensation in the amount of $20,000 for pain and suffering pursuant to s. 53(2)(e) of the Canadian Human Rights Act for pain and suffering in relation to denials, gaps and unreasonable delays with respect to essential services, but are not eligible for compensation under s. 53(3) of the Canadian Human Rights Act for wilful and reckless discrimination.

B. Position of the Parties

[109] Canada, the AFN and the Caring Society provided joint initial submissions in support of the proposed provisions. They explain that section 4.2.5.1 ensures that any child without Indian Act status living in a First Nations community who is not recognized by their community for the purposes of Jordan's Principle but has a meaningful connection to the community is eligible for compensation. Section 4.2.5.2 defines the timeframe for compensation. The process follows the same end-date of November 2, 2017 established in the Compensation Decision while January 26, 2016 was selected as the start date based on the Tribunal's finding that "Jordan's Principle is meant to apply to all First Nations children" (Merit Decision at para. 382) and order that Canada "cease applying its narrow definition of Jordan's Principle and to take measures to immediately implement the full meaning and scope of Jordan's Principle" (Merit Decision at para. 481). The submission contends that the date of the Merit Decision constitutes a clear break from the past in accordance with Canada (Attorney General) v Hislop, 2007 SCC 10 at paras. 81-108 for the purpose of the children identified in sections 4.2.5(b) to (d). Section 4.2.5.3 reflects the Tribunal's finding in 2020 CHRT 20 at paragraph 115 that > it would be unfair to make a finding of non-compliance of the Tribunal's orders against Canada given that while the Tribunal did not use the Indian Act registration provisions as an eligibility criteria and did not limit Jordan's Principle to children on reserve, it did not provide a definition of who is a First Nations child eligible under its Jordan's Principle orders.

[110] NAN opposes section 4.2.5.2 of the Draft Compensation Framework's restriction of the timeframe of discrimination for which First Nations children who are not eligible for Indian Act status are entitled to compensation and section 4.2.5.3's restriction of these children's eligibility for compensation for wilful and reckless discrimination under section 53(3) of the CHRA. NAN opposes relying on the colonial Indian Act to differentiate categories of beneficiaries. NAN relies on its earlier submissions from March 20, 2019 on identifying First Nations children for the purpose of Jordan's Principle. NAN argues that it was always of the view that Jordan's Principle applied to all First Nations children and that Canada should have been of this view as well. NAN relies on evidence cited in Daniels v. Canada, 2013 FC 6 to demonstrate Canada's knowledge. Further, the treaty relationships, which Canada recognizes, do not allow Canada to unilaterally determine First Nations identity. Further, NAN does not find it persuasive for Canada to argue that Canada believed a provision designed to prevent jurisdictional gaps in services for First Nations children only applied to First Nations children eligible for Indian Act status. Accordingly, the Merit Decision cannot represent a clear break from the past as contemplated in Hislop. NAN argues that Canada's exclusion of First Nations children without Indian Act status was unreasonable according to the criteria established in Hislop, para. 107. In addition, NAN argues the different timeframes for which beneficiaries are entitled to compensation will complicate the process.

[111] Canada, the AFN and the Caring Society submitted a joint response opposing NAN's request to remove sections 4.2.5.2 and 4.2.5.3 from the Draft Compensation Framework. They note that the provisions were not drafted with the intent to deny compensation to any eligible beneficiaries and that, to the extent of any inconsistency with the Tribunal's orders, section 1.2 ensures the Tribunal's orders take precedence. They argue that while NAN would prefer an earlier start date for compensation than that provided in section 4.2.5.2, the issue has already been litigated and should not be reconsidered. Canada, the AFN and the Caring Society considered it unreasonable to award damages for wilful and reckless conduct while the eligibility criteria for Jordan's Principle were unclear. They submit that while sections 4.2.5.2 and 4.2.5.3 do not precisely mirror specific language in the Tribunal's orders, any potential beneficiary who disagrees with the provisions will have an opportunity to contest them.

C. Analysis

[112] The Panel generally agrees with the merit of the NAN's additional submissions. Moreover, the Panel notes the NAN opposes relying on the colonial Indian Act to differentiate categories of beneficiaries.

[113] However, as mentioned above, the eligibility for compensation under Jordan's Principle orders have already been argued and answered by this Tribunal. Furthermore, the Panel finds the joint response from the AFN, the Caring Society and Canada referred to in para. 111 above to be acceptable especially in light of sections 1.2 and 9.6 of the Draft Compensation Framework.

V. Retention of Jurisdiction and Tribunal's Role

A. Context

[114] Since the Tribunal issued the Merit Decision, the Tribunal has consistently retained jurisdiction to address the various remedial issues in this case. As noted by the Tribunal in its 2016 CHRT 10, the remedial process is complex with far-reaching consequences. The Tribunal structured the remedial process to implement a practical, meaningful and effective remedial process in accordance with the CHRA. In doing so, the Tribunal committed to first address immediate reforms to the FNCFS Program and the 1965 Agreement while longer term program reform would be addressed subsequently. The Tribunal also retained jurisdiction to address requests for financial compensation for victims of the discriminatory practice. This ruling is part of the financial compensation process for which the Tribunal has continuously retained jurisdiction throughout its various rulings

[115] In its submissions that led to the Compensation Decision, the AFN requested that the distribution of compensation to victims be managed by an independent body. The AFN argued that this process would provide for the efficient and expeditious compensation of victims (Compensation Decision, paras. 39-44). The Tribunal agreed that this approach was appropriate and the parties adopted it into the Draft Compensation Framework at section 9.

[116] Within the independent compensation process proposed in the Draft Compensation Framework, section 9.6 contemplates review of an individual compensation decision by the Tribunal:

> 9.6. Potential beneficiaries denied compensation can request the second-level review committee to reconsider the decision if new information that is relevant to the decision is provided, or appeal to an appeals body composed of individuals agreed to by the Parties and hosted by the Central Administrator. The appeals body will be non-political and independent of the federal public service. The Parties agree that decisions of the appeals body may be subject to further review by the Tribunal. The reconsideration and appeals process will be fully articulated in the Guide.

[117] The Draft Compensation Framework does not provide any additional guidance in terms of what is contemplated by "further review by the Tribunal".

[118] The Panel, by letter dated October 20, 2020, requested submissions from the Commission on the Tribunal's authority to retain jurisdiction in accordance with the provisions of section 9.6 of the Draft Compensation Framework. The Panel welcomed any comments from other parties on this matter.

B. Commission's Submissions

[119] The Commission responded to the Panel's letter of October 20, 2020 requesting submissions on this issue. The other parties either agreed with the Commission's submissions or did not address this issue.

[120] The Commission argues that the Draft Compensation Framework, including the detailed appeals process and the involvement of third party adjudicators, is consistent with the purpose of the CHRA and similar to the approach taken in previous cases.

[121] The Commission frames the Tribunal's appellate role as part of the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction. The retained jurisdiction itself is part of the broad discretion section 53 of the CHRA provides to fashion remedies. It allows the Tribunal to direct the parties to attempt to implement a remedy while retaining the ability to step in if the parties fail to do so.

[122] The proposed structure of the Tribunal's supervision is analogous to prior cases such as Grant v. Manitoba Telecom Services Inc, 2012 CHRT 20; Public Service Alliance of Canada v. Canada (Treasury Board), 1998 CanLII 3995 (CHRT) and Walden et al. v. Attorney General of Canada, Consent Order dated July 31, 2012. In all those cases, the Tribunal retained jurisdiction to decide the matter in the event that the parties were unable to agree. That is no different from the current case where the Draft Compensation Framework provides for procedures through which the parties will attempt to reach an agreement and, if they are unable to do so, the Tribunal has jurisdiction to determine any outstanding disputes. In particular, the Tribunal in Walden had and used its jurisdiction to determine requests brought by non-complainant individuals (Walden et al. v. Attorney General of Canada, 2016 CHRT 19 and 2018 CHRT 20). The Commission does not see any legal distinction between Walden where the initial attempt at an agreement was between the government and the non-complainant and the Draft Compensation Framework that provides that an independent Claims Administrator will attempt to facilitate agreement, including through an appeals process.

[123] The Commission acknowledges that the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction may be called upon for approximately three and a half years after the compensation process is initiated. The Commission indicates that there is no statutory or case law limit to the length of the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction.

C. Analysis

[124] The Panel agrees with the Commission's characterization of the Tribunal's supervisory role as part of the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction. The retained jurisdiction itself is part of the broad discretion s. 53 of the CHRA provides to fashion effective remedies. It allows the Tribunal to direct the parties to attempt to implement a remedy while retaining the ability to step in if the parties fail to do so. The Panel in this case has exercised this authority on a number of occasions and has provided extensive reasons that were never challenged in this case. The Panel relies on its previous rulings and will not echo them all here. As an example, in 2016, the Panel wrote:

> Remedial orders designed to address systemic discrimination can be difficult to implement and, therefore, may require ongoing supervision. Retaining jurisdiction in these circumstances ensures the Panel's remedial orders are effectively implemented (see Grover at paras. 32-33),
>
> (see 2016 CHRT 10, at para. 36 and further analysis at paras. 12-18).

[125] Later in 2017, the Panel provided additional guidance:

> (…) Rather, in line with the remedial principles outlined above, the Panel's purpose in crafting orders for immediate relief and in retaining jurisdiction to oversee their implementation is to ensure that as many of the adverse impacts and denials of services identified in the [Merit] Decision are temporarily addressed while INAC's First Nations child welfare programing is being reformed. That said, in crafting any further orders to immediately redress or prevent the discrimination identified in the [Merit] Decision, it is necessary for the Panel to examine the actions Canada has taken to date in implementing the Panel's orders and it may make findings as to whether those actions are or are not in compliance with those orders.
>
> As the Federal Court of Canada stated in Grover v. Canada (National Research Council), (1994), 24 CHRR D/390 (FC) at para. 32, "[o]ften it may be more desirable for the Tribunal to provide guidelines in order to allow the parties to work out between themselves the details of the [order], rather than to have an unworkable order forced upon them by the Tribunal." This statement is in line with the Panel's approach to remedies to date in this matter. In order to facilitate the immediate implementation of the general remedies ordered in the [Merit] Decision, the Panel has requested additional information from the parties, monitored Canada's implementation of its orders and, through its subsequent rulings, provided additional guidance to the parties and issued a number of additional orders based on the detailed findings and reasoning already included in the [Merit] Decision.
> (2017 CHRT 14, at paras. 31-32).

[126] In 2018, the Panel rendered an important decision that led to a Consultation Protocol signed by Canadian Ministers and the parties including the National Chief of the AFN. In this protocol, Canada fully accepted to implement the Tribunal's 2018 CHRT 4 ruling and previous rulings. Of note, the Panel relying on its previous rulings and consistent with its approach to remedies since the Merit Decision stated as follows:

> Indeed, the Supreme Court in Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse) v. Communauté urbaine de Montréal, 2004 SCC 30 (CanLII) has also directed human rights tribunals to ensure that their remedies are effective, creative when necessary, and respond to the fundamental nature of the rights in question:
>
> Despite occasional disagreements over the appropriate means of redress, the case law of this Court, (…), stresses the need for flexibility and imagination in the crafting of remedies for infringements of fundamental human rights (…) Thus, in the context of seeking appropriate recourse before an administrative body or a court of competent jurisdiction, the enforcement of this law can lead to the imposition of affirmative or negative obligations designed to correct or bring an end to situations that are incompatible with the Quebec Charter. (see at para. 26).
>
> (see 2018 CHRT 4, at. paras. 51-52).
>
> As stated above, the CHRA's objectives under sections 2 and 53 are not only to eradicate discrimination but also to prevent the practice from re-occurring. If the Panel finds that some of the same behaviours and patterns that led to systemic discrimination are still occurring, it has to intervene. This is the case here.
> (2018 CHRT 4, at para. 165).

[127] Section 9.6 of the Draft Compensation Framework reflects, but does not create, the Tribunal's authority to review decisions of the appeals body. Rather, the Tribunal's authority appropriately flows from its retained jurisdiction. This arrangement appropriately reflects the value in providing the parties an opportunity to resolve aspects of the dispute themselves while confirming the Tribunal's ultimate responsibility to ensure that the inquiry before the Tribunal is resolved in accordance with the provisions of the CHRA.

[128] Determining whether an individual complainant is entitled to compensation under the CHRA and, if so, how much compensation is a core aspect of determining a complaint before the Tribunal. That remains true in the unique circumstances of this case where the complaint was brought by the Caring Society and the AFN on behalf of a group of victims who were not identified by name (CHRA, s. 40(2)).

[129] The Tribunal has provided a number of decisions and rulings directly addressing the victims' entitlement to compensation for discriminatory conduct. Most notably, the Merit Decision found that Canada's programs and funding discriminated against First Nations children and amounted to discriminatory conduct. In the Compensation Decision, the Tribunal found that the victims on whose behalf the complaint was brought were entitled to compensation. The Tribunal addressed the quantum of compensation and considered some general eligibility parameters such as which classes of family members were entitled to compensation. The Tribunal also recognized the value in directing the parties to negotiate further aspects of the compensation process. The Tribunal provided further guidance in subsequent rulings. In particular, the Tribunal addressed in 2020 CHRT 7 issues of the age at which First Nations child victims would be eligible to receive compensation funds, eligibility for compensation of children apprehended into care prior to January 1, 2006 but who remained in care as of that date, and compensation to the estates of deceased victims. In 2020 CHRT 15, the Tribunal addressed disputes between the parties relating to compensation for First Nation children living off-reserve, challenges specific to victims living in remote communities, the scope of family caregivers entitled to compensation, and definitions for terms relating to Jordan's Principle. In 2020 CHRT 20, the Tribunal assisted the parties in developing mechanisms to identify eligibility criteria for Jordan's Principle as it related to First Nations identity. Consistent with the principles of reconciliation and First Nations right to self-determination, the Tribunal preferred to provide the parties guidance in their discussions and avoid defining who is a First Nations child for eligibility purposes under Jordan's Principle.

[130] Consistently throughout its prior decisions and rulings, the Tribunal has resolved contested issues and encouraged the parties to negotiate issues on which they are able to make progress. Section 9.6 of the Draft Compensation Framework further reflects the Tribunal encouraging the parties to reach a negotiated settlement while retaining jurisdiction in the event negotiation is unsuccessful. The overall structure of the CHRA strongly encourages parties to resolve disputes through negotiation and the importance of negotiation is heightened in this case. However, there is always a possibility that negotiation is unsuccessful. The Tribunal is obliged to retain jurisdiction in order to resolve a dispute that negotiation fails to resolve. This is consistent with the Tribunal's approach in the Grant, Public Service of Canada, and Walden cases submitted by the Commission in which the Tribunal provided directions and a framework for negotiations but retained jurisdiction in the event that negotiations failed. It is also consistent with cases from other tribunals such as the case of Alberta (Labour Relations Board) v. International Woodworkers of America, Local 1-207, 1989 ABCA 7 where, at paragraph 16, the court explained that it was appropriate for the Board to direct the parties to negotiate while the Board retained jurisdiction to impose a remedy if the parties could not agree and it was even acceptable for the Board to suggest that the parties engage third-party arbitration as part of their attempt to reach a settlement despite the fact that the Board did not have jurisdiction to order binding arbitration. The provision in section 9.6 that the Tribunal may review decisions of the appeals body simply reflects that, as a consequence of the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction, it is able to provide further direction or impose a remedy in the event that the parties, through the Central Administrator and the appeals body, are unable to agree with a potential beneficiary on that individual's entitlement to compensation. Section 9.6, and the parties' agreement, is not the source of the Tribunal's authority in this section.

[131] The remaining provisions in section 9, including aspects of section 9.6 not related to the Tribunal's jurisdiction, are a manifestation of the parties negotiating compensation with individual beneficiaries in accordance with the direction provided in the Tribunal's orders.

[132] In this particular case, the large volume of anticipated individual claims for compensation in this case would make it difficult, if not impossible, for the Tribunal to expeditiously adjudicate each claim. The parties would no doubt face similar challenges if they sought to review and negotiate each of the individual requests for compensation themselves. However, section 9 reflects the parties delegating their ability to negotiate individual beneficiary's entitlement to compensation to the Central Administrator who is capable of implementing a more expeditious process. While the merits of the independent process are obvious, the key observation is that the Central Administrator's authority comes from the parties' assignment of their ability to negotiate in order to resolve disputes in a human rights complaint.

[133] While providing agency for the parties to negotiate is important, the Tribunal is ultimately responsible for ensuring the CHRA is upheld. Accordingly the Tribunal may, in rare cases, decline to adopt a position negotiated by the parties (e.g. Taylor (on behalf of Kevin Taylor) v. Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada and Health Canada, 2020 CHRT 10). Section 9.6 reflects that the Tribunal may review a decision of the appeals body regardless of whether the parties and the potential beneficiary agree with the outcome.

[134] In conclusion, section 9.6 reflects two different sources of authority. The provision relating to the Tribunal's ability to review decisions of the appeals body does not create the Tribunal's authority. Rather, it appropriately reflects the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction. In contrast, the Central Administrator's authority is created in section 9. This authority comes from the parties' ability to negotiate aspects of a human rights complaint.

D. Conclusion

[135] The Tribunal retains jurisdiction on all its compensation orders including the approval and implementation of the Compensation Process. The Tribunal's retention of jurisdiction in relation to the compensation issue does not affect the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction on any other aspects of the case for which the Panel continues to retain jurisdiction.

I. Introduction

[1] The Panel congratulates the AFN and Canada for making important steps forward towards reconciliation and for their collaborative work on the Final Settlement Agreement on compensation for the class members in the class action (FSA). The FSA is outstanding in many ways, it promises prompt payment, it is a First Nations controlled distribution of funds, and it allows compensation in excess of what is permitted under the CHRA for many victims/survivors. The FSA aims to compensate a larger number of victims/survivors going back to 1991. The Panel wants to make clear that it recognizes First Nations inherent rights of self-government and the importance of First Nations making decisions that concern them. This should always be encouraged. The Panel believes this was the approach intended in the FSA which was First Nations-led.

II. Context

[2] In 2016, the Tribunal released First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada), 2016 CHRT 2 [Merit Decision] and found that this case is about children and how the past and current child welfare practices in First Nations communities on reserves, across Canada, have impacted and continue to impact First Nations children, their families and their communities. The Tribunal found that Canada racially discriminated against First Nations children on reserve and in the Yukon in a systemic way not only by underfunding the First Nations Child and Family Services Program (FNCFS) but also in the manner that it designed, managed and controlled it. One of the worst harms found by the Tribunal was that the FNCFS Program failed to provide adequate prevention services and sufficient funding. This created incentives to remove First Nations children from their homes, families and communities as a first resort rather than as a last resort. Another major harm to First Nations children was that zero cases were approved under Jordan's Principle given the narrow interpretation and restrictive eligibility criteria developed by Canada. The Tribunal found that beyond providing adequate funding, there is a need to refocus the policy of the program to respect human rights principles and sound social work practice in the best interest of children. The Tribunal established Canada's liability for systemic and racial discrimination and ordered Canada to cease the discriminatory practice, take measures to redress and prevent it from reoccurring, and reform the FNCFS Program and the 1965 Agreement in Ontario to reflect the findings in the Merit Decision. The Tribunal determined it would proceed in phases for immediate, mid-term and long-term relief and program reform and financial compensation so as to allow immediate change followed by adjustments and finally, sustainable long-term relief. This process would allow the long-term relief to be informed by data collection, new studies and best practices as identified by First Nations experts, First Nations communities and First Nations Agencies considering their communities' specific needs, the National Advisory Committee on child and family services reform and the parties.

[3] The Tribunal also ordered Canada to cease applying its narrow definition of Jordan's Principle and to take measures to immediately implement the full meaning and scope of Jordan's Principle. Jordan's Principle orders and the substantive equality goal were further detailed in subsequent rulings. In 2020 CHRT 20 the Tribunal stated that:

> Jordan's Principle is a human rights principle grounded in substantive equality. The criterion included in the Tribunal's definition in 2017 CHRT 14 of providing services "above normative standard" furthers substantive equality for First Nations children in focusing on their specific needs which includes accounting for intergenerational trauma and other important considerations resulting from the discrimination found in the Merit Decision and other disadvantages such as historical disadvantage they may face. The definition and orders account for First Nations' specific needs and unique circumstances. Jordan's Principle is meant to meet Canada's positive domestic and international obligations towards First Nations children under the CHRA, the Charter, the Convention on the Rights of the Child and the UNDRIP to name a few. Moreover, the Panel relying on the evidentiary record found that it is the most expeditious mechanism currently in place to start eliminating discrimination found in this case and experienced by First Nations children while the National Program is being reformed. Moreover, this especially given its substantive equality objective which also accounts for intersectionality aspects of the discrimination in all government services affecting First Nations children and families. Substantive equality is both a right and a remedy in this case: a right that is owed to First Nations children as a constant and a sustainable remedy to address the discrimination and prevent its reoccurrence. This falls well within the scope of this claim.

[4] Consequently, the Tribunal determined all the above need to be adequately funded. This means in a meaningful and sustainable manner so as to eliminate the systemic discrimination and prevent it from reoccurring.

[5] The Tribunal issued a series of rulings and orders to completely reform the Federal First Nations Child and Family Services Program. In 2019, the Tribunal ruled and found Canada's systemic and racial discrimination caused harms of the worst kind to First Nations children and families. The Tribunal ordered compensation to victims/survivors and, at the request of the complainants and interested parties, the Tribunal made binding orders against Canada to provide compensation to victims/survivors. The Tribunal then issued a series of compensation process decisions at the parties' requests and this process came to an end in late 2020 when Canada decided to judicially review the Tribunal's compensation decisions and halt the completion of the compensation process's last stages which would have allowed distribution of the compensation to victims/survivors.

[6] The Tribunal announced in 2016 that it would deal with compensation later, hoping the parties would resolve this before the Tribunal ruled and made definitive orders. The Tribunal can clarify its existing compensation orders but it cannot completely change them in a way that removes entitlements to victims/survivors. The approach to challenge these key determinations is through judicial review.

[7] The Tribunal encouraged the parties for years to resolve compensation issues.

[8] The Panel was clear in 2016 CHRT 10 that it hoped that reconciliation could be advanced through the parties resolving remedial issues through negotiations rather than adjudication (para. 42). The Panel noted in 2016 CHRT 16 that some of the parties cautioned the Tribunal about the potential adverse impacts that remedial orders could have (para. 13). Accordingly, the Tribunal strongly encouraged the parties to negotiate remedies, including on the issue of compensation. The Tribunal offered to work with the parties in mediation-adjudication to help the parties craft remedies that would best satisfy their needs and most effectively provide redress to victims. Only Canada declined.

[9] The issue left unresolved, the Tribunal was obligated to rule on compensation and the compensation process. In addressing compensation, the Tribunal was required to make challenging decisions addressing novel issues. Canada advanced multiple arguments opposing compensation. The Tribunal has made legal findings based on the evidence and linking the evidence to harms justifying orders under the CHRA. This exercise is made by the Panel who exercise a quasi-judicial role under quasi-constitutional legislation. The Tribunal, guided by all the parties in this case, including the AFN, made bold and complex decisions in the best interests of First Nations children and families. The Tribunal's decisions have been upheld by the Federal Court. Now that the Tribunal has issued those compensation decisions on quantum and categories of victims, they are no longer up for negotiation. They are a baseline. Negotiation involves compromise, which can sometimes result in two steps forward and one step back and this may be found acceptable by the parties to the negotiation. However, negotiation cannot be used to take a step backwards from what the Tribunal has already ordered.

[10] Once it found systemic discrimination, the Panel worked with rigor to carefully craft sound findings of fact and law that recognized fundamental rights for First Nations children and families in Canada and protect and vindicate those rights. The same Panel that made those liability findings against Canada is asked to let go of its approach to adopt a class action approach serving different legal purposes. The Panel was conscious that class actions were forthcoming and made sure they were not hindered by the Tribunal's compensation process. Now it is the Tribunal's decisions that are being hindered by the FSA applying an early-stage class action lens. Indeed, the parties did not finalize the compensation distribution process to allow for the distribution of funds for the compensation already ordered by this Tribunal in 2019. They pursued another approach instead that did not fully account for the CHRA regime and the Tribunal's orders.

[11] In May 2022, the AFN and Canada advised the Tribunal that they needed a hearing in June to present the FSA. The Tribunal set aside all summer to deal with the matter expeditiously and to have sufficient time to properly consider over 3000 pages of documents but the AFN and Canada advised that class counsel were not yet ready to sign the FSA. The FSA was finally signed on July 4, 2022, and announced publicly but was only presented to the Tribunal on July 22, 2022. The motion to address the FSA was heard in September to afford fairness to all parties. The Panel agrees the victims/survivors have been waiting long enough and emphasizes that they could have been compensated at any time since the Tribunal's decision in 2016 and even more so after the Compensation Decision in 2019.

[12] The Panel appreciates the parties' work to prepare for this hearing on a short-time frame and the submissions they provided both in writing before the hearing and at the hearing. There were a few issues on which the Panel had outstanding questions after the hearing. The Panel Chair requested that the parties address these outstanding questions. Once again, the Panel thanks the parties for responding to these questions promptly.

[13] The Panel emphasizes that it acknowledges First Nations inherent rights to self-determination and self-governance. The Panel recognizes the that the Canadian legal system views this motion as balancing individual and collective rights, while First Nations may frame the dialogue around responsibilities. The Tribunal emphasizes that First Nations rights holders are best placed to make decisions for their own citizens in or outside the courts. The Tribunal stresses the important fact that First Nations are free to make agreements concerning their citizens. The Tribunal understands the difficult choices made by the AFN and why the AFN has made them. First Nations had to work with $20 billion when they were asking much more for all cases.

III. Summary of the Parties' Positions

A. AFN and Canada

(i) Initial Submissions

[14] On July 22, 2022, the AFN and Canada submitted a joint notice of motion and supporting materials.

[15] The AFN and Canada requested a declaration that the Final Settlement Agreement (FSA) fully satisfies the terms of the Panel's Compensation Decision, related compensation orders and the Compensation Framework. In the alternative, the AFN and Canada request the Tribunal to amend the various compensation orders and the Compensation Framework to conform to the FSA. In any event, the Tribunal's declaration or amendments would be conditional on the Federal Court approving the FSA.

[16] The AFN has the support of the Attorney General of Canada and the representative plaintiffs of the class actions before the Federal Court.

(a) Context

[17] The AFN outlines the context that led to this motion. It explains how Canada sought to engage in negotiations to provide compensation for children covered by the class action proceedings and the CHRT proceedings through a global compensation settlement. Simultaneously, Canada engaged in negotiations on long-term reform of the First Nations Child and Family Services Program (FNCFS Program) and Jordan's Principle. The FSA provides $20 billion in compensation to survivors.

[18] The AFN identifies its history of trying to address the discrimination in the FNCFS Program, dating back to 1998 and involving reports such as the National Policy Review and the Wen:de reports.

[19] The AFN indicates that it was the only party in these CHRT proceedings to advance a claim for individual compensation for children, parents and siblings affected by Canada's discrimination. The Tribunal ultimately awarded the maximum compensation available under the CHRA to affected First Nations children and caregiving parents and grandparents. This compensation was for children removed from their homes, families and communities and those who experienced a delay, denial or gap in the delivery of an essential service. The AFN notes that the Tribunal retained jurisdiction to address issues that arose in the compensation process. Furthermore, the Tribunal sought to promote a dialogic approach with discussions and negotiations between the parties. The AFN explains how the parties engaged in subsequent discussions and also came back to the Tribunal for further rulings on compensation. The Tribunal retained jurisdiction on all its compensation rulings, including retaining jurisdiction over the Compensation Framework.

[20] The AFN notes that the compensation decisions were upheld by the Federal Court on judicial review. During those arguments, the AFN and Caring Society argued that Canada should pay compensation to every child affected by the FNCFS Program that was taken into out-of-home care and to children affected by Canada's narrow interpretation of Jordan's Principle. Compensation should be paid to both children and their parents or grandparents. The AFN highlights the comments in the Federal Court decision encouraging the parties to engage in good faith discussions to achieve a fair and just settlement.

[21] The AFN describes the class action suits brought in the Federal Court. The class actions provide compensation for victims of Canada's discrimination dating back to 1991. The classes of victims eligible for compensation under the class actions drew on the victims identified in the Compensation decision. It establishes six classes of victims:

A) Removed child class: First Nations children removed from their homes between 1991 and 2022 as minors while they or one of their parents was ordinarily resident on reserve.

B) Removed child family class: Parents, grandparents or siblings of members of the removed child class.

C) Jordan's Principle class: All First Nations minors living in Canada who between 2007 and 2017 had a confirmed need for an essential service and faced a denial, delay or service gap with respect to that needed essential service.

D) Trout child class: Similar to the Jordan's Principle class, but covering First Nations children between 1991 and 2007.

E) Jordan's Principle family class: Parents, grandparents or siblings of members of the Jordan's Principle class.

F) Trout family class: Parents, grandparents or siblings of members of the Trout child class.

[22] The AFN indicates its estimates on the size of each class. The Removed child class is estimated at 115,000 members. The Removed child family class is estimated to have 1.5 caregiving parents or grandparents eligible for compensation for each child, with some caregivers having multiple removed children. The other classes are harder to estimate. The Jordan's Principle class is estimated to be between 58,385 and 69,728 members. The Trout child class is estimated at 104,000. There is no estimate for the Jordan's Principle and Trout family class sizes.

[23] The AFN recounts the history of the negotiations that resulted in the FSA. Discussions first occurred through a mediator as part of the Federal Court process relating to the class actions. In addition to the parties to the class actions, the Caring Society participated in these mediations. Following this, negotiations occurred under the supervision of the Honourable Murray Sinclair. These negotiations primarily involved the parties to the class actions, with some consultations with the Caring Society and other parties before the Tribunal. These negotiations led to an Agreement-in-Principle.

[24] The Agreement-in-Principle provided $20 billion to release Canada of all compensation claims under the Tribunal proceedings and class actions. Any unused compensation funds would not revert back to Canada. The parties acknowledged there was uncertainty on the number of victims eligible for compensation. The design of the distribution of the funds was up to the class action plaintiffs. The Agreement-in-Principle also addressed the opt-out period, the fact that the orders would satisfy the Tribunal compensation process, the tax treatment of compensation, notice, legal fees and a request for a public apology. The parties used the Agreement-in-Principle as the basis to develop the FSA.

[25] The AFN indicates that class counsel and the AFN had the following objectives when developing the FSA:

A) maintain and increase the awards under the Tribunal's Compensation Decision to the greatest extent possible;

B) ensure proportionality in compensation based on objective factors;

C) where compromises are required, compensation should favour children;

D) a trauma informed and culturally sensitive process;

E) no obligation for survivors to undergo an interview or cross-examination to receive compensation;

F) a claims process that is easy and simple enough not to require professional assistance to get compensation;

G) provide support to survivors through the compensation process; and

H) the entire settlement fund amounts go to survivors without deductions for counsel fees or payments to third parties.

(b) FSA Terms

[26] The AFN summarizes the terms of the FSA.

[27] The preamble codifies the objectives of the FSA. This includes administering the funds in an expeditious, cost-effective, user-friendly, culturally sensitive and trauma-informed manner. Overall, the objectives aim to ensure survivors are well supported in the process and do not experience barriers and re-traumatization.

[28] The $20 billion in settlement funds are to be paid into trust once all possibilities of appeal from the settlement order have been exhausted.

[29] The AFN summarizes the classes covered by the FSA as follows:

A) Removed child class: A First Nations individual who

   i. while under the age of majority;

   ii. while they or at least one of their caregivers were ordinarily resident on reserve or living in the Yukon;

   iii. were removed from their home by child welfare authorities or voluntarily placed into care between April 1, 1991 and March 31, 2022;

   iv. whose placement was funded by ISC.

B) Removed child family class: All brothers, sisters, mothers, fathers, grandmothers and grandfathers of a member of the removed child class at the time of removal.

C) Jordan's Principle class: First Nations individuals who, between December 12, 2007 and November 2, 2017, did not receive from Canada an essential service (whether by denial or service gap) relating to a confirmed need, or whose receipt of an essential service relating to a confirmed need was delayed by Canada on ground including a lack of funding or jurisdiction, or a result of a service gap or jurisdictional dispute.

D) Jordan's Principle family class: All brothers, sisters, mothers, fathers, grandmothers or grandfathers of a member of the Jordan's Principle Class at the time of the delay, denial or service gap.

E) Trout child class: First Nations individuals who, between April 1, 1991 and December 11, 2007, did not receive from Canada an essential service (whether by denial or service gap) relating to a confirmed need, or whose receipt of an essential service relating to a confirmed need was delayed by Canada on grounds including a lack of funding or jurisdiction, or a result of a service gap or jurisdictional dispute.

F) Trout family class: All brothers, sisters, mothers, fathers, grandmothers or grandfathers of a member of the Trout Child Class at the time of the delay, denial or service gap.

[30] First Nations individuals includes individuals registered pursuant to the Indian Act, those entitled to be registered under s. 6(1) or 6(2) of the Indian Act as it read on February 11, 2022, and those included on Band Membership lists and who met the Band Membership requirements under s. 10-12 of the Indian Act by February 11, 2022. For purposes of the Jordan's Principle class, it also includes individuals recognized by their First Nation by February 11, 2022.

[31] The AFN estimates that $7.25 billion will be used to compensate the removed child class, $5.75 billion for the removed child family class, $3 billion for the Jordan's Principle class, $2 billion to the Trout child class and $2 billion for the Jordan's Principle and Trout family classes.

[32] The AFN indicates that the parties will recommend an administrator to be appointed by the court. The administrator will be responsible for developing processes to compensate individual claimants and ensuring the funds flow in a trauma-informed manner. The administrator will be responsible for ensuring appropriate standards are maintained in how the funds are distributed to beneficiaries. This is consistent with the objectives of the claims process, that aims to minimize the administrative burden on survivors. The administrator will provide regular reports, which will assist a First Nations led Settlement Implementation Committee and ultimately the Federal Court in overseeing the process and addressing any systemic issues that arise.

[33] The AFN identifies that the FSA will have a comprehensive plan to provide notice to beneficiaries. There will be an opt-out period. Beneficiaries will have three years to make a claim once they reach the age of majority, with extensions possible for personal circumstances.

[34] A Cy-près fund will benefit beneficiaries who do not receive direct compensation. The fund will have an endowment of $50 million and support activities such as family reunification, access to cultural activities, access to transitional supports and facilitating access to services for Jordan's Principle beneficiaries who may lose access to services upon attaining the age of majority.

[35] The AFN highlights that the full $20 billion in compensation funds will benefit survivors because Canada has agreed to pay the costs of administering the settlement and counsel fees separately. In addition, the $20 billion will be invested and any interest will also benefit survivors.

[36] The AFN notes that Canada will make best efforts to ensure that the benefits are not taxable income and do not affect federal, provincial or territorial social assistance benefits.

[37] The AFN explains that the FSA provides wellness supports for beneficiaries. These include service coordination, bolstering the existing network of health and cultural supports, access to mental health counselling, and access to a youth specific support line.

[38] The AFN explains the process for compensating the estates of deceased children who are entitled to compensation. It also indicates that there is a process in place for individuals who lack legal capacity because of a disability.

[39] The FSA contemplates Canada proposing to the Office of the Prime Minister that the Prime Minister make an apology.

[40] The AFN notes that there are some areas where more work is required. These areas include finalizing the Jordan's Principle assessment methodology, approving the plan to give notice to beneficiaries, assembling data in Canada's control, appointing an administrator, and receiving approval of the FSA by the Federal Court.

(c) Arguments

[41] First, the AFN argues that the Tribunal should support the FSA because it has the support of the AFN, Canada and class action counsel. The AFN has their full support in its submissions. The AFN indicates it supports the FSA because it ensures the timely payment of compensation, significantly expands the number of survivors eligible for compensation, and provides that those who suffered the greatest harm will receive the greatest compensation. The AFN views the FSA as the most effective and efficient means of paying out the significant compensation for First Nation victims of Canada's discrimination. The AFN emphasises that it has pushed for individual compensation since the start of the Tribunal's case and notes that, as the national political governing body for First Nations, it is best positioned to understand the impact of the compensation on First Nations across Canada.

[42] Second, the AFN argues that the Tribunal has the jurisdiction to endorse the FSA. The AFN highlights the broad remedial powers under the CHRA. It identifies how the Tribunal has used the broad remedial authority in this case to craft the existing orders in this case, including retaining jurisdiction that provides the Tribunal broad discretion to return to a matter. The AFN relies on the dialogic approach as endorsed by the Federal Court. The AFN views the dialogic approach as encouraging the parties to engage in negotiations and having sufficient flexibility to support the negotiations that occurred in this case. The CHRA supports the Tribunal being flexible and innovative in providing human rights remedies.

[43] Given this context of the Tribunal's remedial powers, the AFN argues the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction is sufficiently broad to permit it to consider the FSA as satisfying its compensation orders. The Tribunal has explicitly retained the jurisdiction on remedial issues which provides it jurisdiction to consider the AFN and Canada's proposal to endorse the FSA. The FSA is a product of negotiations as contemplated with the dialogic approach.

[44] Third, the AFN argues that the Tribunal has discretion in the manner in which it evaluates the FSA as satisfying the Tribunal's compensation orders. The AFN submits that there are no precedents directly on point for when the parties successfully negotiated a settlement outside the Tribunal's process that satisfies a compensation order. There are some parallels with the Compensation Framework negotiated by the parties but there are still differences in the circumstances. The AFN accordingly submits the Tribunal should interpret its broad remedial jurisdiction to consider whether the FSA satisfies the Tribunal's compensation orders.

[45] Generally speaking, the AFN contends that the Tribunal should apply a test of whether the FSA reasonably and in a principled manner satisfies the Tribunal's compensation orders and the underlying principle of promoting the rights of survivors. The AFN suggests specific factors that can help make this assessment. These include whether the FSA meets the Tribunal and CHRA's compensation objectives, international human rights principles, the results of the dialogic process, and reconciliation. The AFN also asks the Tribunal to draw on principles considered by the Federal Court in approving class action settlements compensating First Nations individuals for Canada's historic discrimination. In such circumstances, the Federal Court considers whether the settlement is fair and reasonable and whether it is in the best interests of the class as a whole. This can involve considering the settlement terms and conditions, the likelihood of success or recovery through litigation, the future expense and duration of further litigation, the dynamics of settlement negotiations and positions taken therein, the risks of not unconditionally approving the settlement, and the position of the representative plaintiffs. Of particular significance are the litigation risks of not approving the agreement and the view of the representative plaintiffs.

[46] Fourth, the AFN sets out how the different parts of the FSA align with and build on the Tribunal's compensation orders.

[47] The quantum of compensation is fair, reasonable and principled. The AFN argues it meets or exceeds the objectives of the Tribunal's orders. The total compensation of $20 billion is significant. The amounts payable to individuals will be meaningful and the total compensation is historic and reflects the magnitude of the harms.

[48] The AFN submits that the compensation mechanism is reasonable and takes advantage of experience gained from previous First Nations settlements. The mechanism minimizes re-traumatizing victims. It also prioritizes access to justice, efficiency and expediency. In order to achieve this, the FSA adopts an approach that is modeled on the Indian Residential School Settlement common experience payment. There is a presumption in favour of qualification for compensation with low burdens of proof and evidentiary requirements on survivors. Proportionality in compensation relies on objective factors whenever possible.

[49] The AFN explains that members of the removed child class would receive, at a minimum, the $40,000 in damages ordered by the Tribunal. The FSA expands compensation temporally to cover children affected by Canada's discriminatory funding back to April 1, 1991 when Directive 20-1 came into force. This expands the number of children eligible for compensation by about 56,000. The AFN argues that the eligibility is also expanded to children who were removed from their home but were not removed from their community because they were placed in ISC funded care within their community. In addition to expanding eligibility, basing eligibility on ISC funded care links compensation to the discriminatory practice that incentivised removals and placements over preventative measures and it facilitates the identification of affected children. The AFN indicates that there is compensation for victims in this category who suffered exceptional harm based on objective proxies of harm such as a child's age and number of years in care. This allows the compensation to exceed the statutory maximum the Tribunal could order. The exact value of these enhancement payments is not yet known, both because the number of beneficiaries is not yet known and the relative weight of different factors is not yet known.

[50] The AFN indicates that compensation for the removed child family class is similarly based on ensuring a minimum payment of $40,000 to eligible beneficiaries. It also expands the eligible beneficiaries as the number of eligible children is increased. The AFN argues that the FSA expands the caregivers eligible for compensation beyond biological parents and grandparents as contemplated in the Tribunal's orders to now include adoptive and step caregivers.

[51] The AFN argues that the FSA expands the scope of eligible beneficiaries with the Trout child class and the Trout family class. These classes expand eligibility for Jordan's Principle to cover the period between 1991 and 2007 both for affected children and caregivers. The FSA will provide up to $20,000 for children who do not have objective aggravating factors and up to $40,000 for those children with objective aggravating factors. Caregivers of children who suffered the highest levels of impact may be entitled to some direct compensation. Including these beneficiaries is significant as their harm predates the recognition of Jordan's Principle.

[52] The AFN supports the establishment of a Cy-près fund that will primarily benefit class members who do not receive direct compensation. It will be endowed with $50 million. This includes siblings of affected children. The benefits of the Cy-près fund are consistent with the Tribunal's concern that this sort of fund be in addition to, rather than instead of, direct compensation.

[53] The AFN contends that the FSA supports the Tribunal's concern that any compensation process minimizes trauma to survivors. This is consistent with the objectives of the Tribunal's compensation orders. It does this both by requiring the administrator to take a trauma-informed approach and requiring the administrator to follow a presumption that claimants are acting in good faith and requiring the administrator to draw all reasonable inferences in favour of claimants. Some further examples include a guarantee that none of the child victims will be required to submit to an interview or examination and the Cy-près fund's objective of providing culturally sensitive and trauma-informed services. The supports during the compensation process include service coordination, bolstering existing health and cultural supports, access to mental health counselling, and enhanced helpline services.

[54] The AFN argues that the supports available to victims under the FSA supports and expands the initiatives contemplated under the Tribunal's compensation orders. The supports that are available are robust. They will also remain available until all beneficiaries have completed the claims process. In addition to the supports aimed at ensuring a culturally sensitive and trauma-informed approach, navigators will be available to help claimants navigate the process. Canada will provide further funding for five years to the AFN to implement First Nations-led supports. The Cy-près fund aims to provide benefits to class members who are not eligible for direct compensation.

[55] The AFN explains that it has a notice plan that aims to ensure every beneficiary will receive notice in order to submit a claim. Individuals who sign up will receive notice when they are eligible to make a claim for compensation.

[56] The AFN indicates that the FSA provides an opt-out period of six-months. Individuals may opt out of the compensation process during that time. If the Tribunal declares that the FSA satisfies its compensation orders, such individuals would not be able to pursue compensation under the Tribunal's orders.

[57] There are a number of further ways in which the FSA mirrors the Tribunal's compensation orders. These include the administrator in charge of distributing compensation, the distribution protocol, Canada funding supports to beneficiaries as they navigate the process, efforts to ensure the compensation is tax-free and does not affect social assistance benefits, a right for survivors to appeal denials of benefits, and protections to ensure survivors are the ones who benefit from the compensation.

[58] Fifth, the AFN argues that while the FSA seeks alignment with the Tribunal's compensation orders, where there are necessary deviations, they are consistent with the principles underlying the Tribunal's compensation orders. The AFN argues that compromises were required because of the fixed amount of compensation available, the complexities and lack of data for Jordan's Principle and Trout class members, and expanding eligibility back to 1991. Compromises were designed to favour children who suffered substantial impacts.

[59] The AFN indicates there are two points where the removed child family class may deviate from the Tribunal's Compensation Framework. First, caregiving parents and grandparents will receive additional compensation up to $60,000 in the event they had multiple children removed rather than multiples of $40,000. The second change is that if there is an unexpected number of claimants, compensation may be reduced to ensure that all caregiving parent and grandparent victims receive compensation. The maximum compensation of $60,000 similarly ensures there are enough funds to compensate all eligible caregiving parents and grandparents. Further, family class members who are not eligible for direct compensation can still benefit from the Cy-près fund.

[60] The AFN contends that the process for compensating Jordan's Principle victims generally follows the principles identified by the Tribunal. The FSA aims to ensure that children who suffered discrimination and were objectively impacted are compensated through a process that is objective and efficient and the definition of essential services is reasonable. The process focuses on establishing a confirmed need for an essential service that was the subject of a delay, denial or service gap. Those claimants who are most impacted will receive at least $40,000 while those who are less seriously impacted will receive up to $40,000. This accounts for the significant uncertainty in the class size and is expected to result in children who were eligible for Jordan's Principle compensation under the Tribunal's orders receiving at least $40,000. The framework to determine what is an essential service will be developed with the assistance of experts. The starting point is the list of services currently eligible for Jordan's Principle funding. The process is designed to be flexible so that it can consider services that are essential for a particular child but are not generally essential services. The process does not require interviews or examinations of claimants. There is a recognition that the type of documentation required to support a claim might vary.

[61] The AFN explains that only caregiving parents and grandparents of Jordan's Principle and Trout class children who suffered a significant impact will be eligible for compensation. This reduction in eligibility occurred because the number of caregiving parents and grandparents was unknown. Caregivers who do not receive a direct benefit would nonetheless benefit from the Cy-près fund.

[62] The AFN indicates that the exclusion for caregivers who committed abuse limits the definition of abuse to sexual abuse and serious physical abuse. In particular, it does not include neglect or emotional maltreatment that may qualify as psychological abuse. This limits the need to assess the reason for the child's removal. A caregiver who is denied compensation may challenge the denial but this will not involve the removed child.

[63] The AFN notes that compensation for estates is available to the estates of children and also to family class members who complete an application prior to their death. The FSA contemplates situations where there is no appointed estate executor and cases where beneficiaries are persons with a disability that prevents them from having the legal capacity to manage their own finances.

[64] The AFN acknowledges that a release from liability was not contemplated in the Tribunal's orders but submits that its limited nature, applying only to Canada and not other service providers or governments. The FSA also does not foreclose individuals seeking compensation above the FSA entitlements for personal harm suffered as a result of the child welfare system.

[65] Sixth, the AFN identifies a number of specific factors that support endorsing the FSA. These include international human rights, reconciliation, the dialogic approach, litigation risk, and participation of the representative plaintiffs.

[66] The AFN submits that international human rights law, and in particular the UNDRIP, support the FSA. In particular, articles 7 and 8 protect First Nations from the forced removal of their children and forced assimilation. The United Nations Covenant on the Rights of the Child recognizes the rights of children. While the Tribunal's orders were an effective means of redress for children affected by discrimination during a certain period, reconciliation measures also provide effective redress.

[67] The AFN views the FSA as promoting the goals of reconciliation. The words and intention of the FSA promote reconciliation. It will recommend an apology from the Prime Minister. The result was a product of negotiations instead of litigation. The FSA furthers the work of the Tribunal's compensation orders. Importantly, this process and the compensation process it will create are First Nations-led. The FSA reflects First Nations knowledge, experience and expertise. The AFN has consistently sought individual compensation, as the FSA achieves. The AFN represents First Nation rights-holders who endorsed the FSA through their representatives.

[68] The AFN argues that the FSA was ultimately the result of the dialogic approach. This is consistent with the Tribunal's desire for the compensation process to be defined by the parties. The AFN indicates that while the dialogue primarily involved the AFN, Canada and Moushoom class counsel, the involvement of the Caring Society and the representative plaintiffs enriched the discussions. These were First Nations lead negotiations. The Caring Society was kept informed at various points in the negotiations.

[69] The AFN contends that the threat of future litigation supports endorsing the FSA. Legal proceedings are fraught with uncertainty and Canada has filed an appeal of the Tribunal's compensation orders with the Federal Court of Appeal. The certainty of the settlement is preferable to proceeding with this continued litigation risk. Even if the class action litigation succeeds, there is no guarantee of receiving greater compensation. The Trout class members are particularly vulnerable if the case were to proceed to litigation, as Jordan's Principle had not yet been recognized. Members of the removed child class who experienced discrimination prior to 2005 are also vulnerable because they are not entitled to compensation under the Tribunal's orders. Even within the Tribunal proceedings, there are significant outstanding issues in the Compensation Framework that the parties have solved in the FSA. Furthermore, the compensation would start flowing expeditiously under the FSA.

[70] The AFN highlights the representative plaintiffs' support for the FSA. This support is significant, as these individuals have been involved in the process from the outset. They provided their input. They recognize the need for a result that is fair and equitable and recognizes the need to expeditiously compensate survivors in a way that minimizes re-traumatizing victims.

[71] In conclusion, the AFN contends that the FSA satisfies the Tribunal's compensation orders. The $20 billion will effectively implement the Tribunal's orders and result in the expeditious financial compensation of survivors. The compensation quantum and process are designed to restore dignity to victims. It is not an implementation of the Tribunal's compensation decisions but reflects a negotiated settlement based on the same principles. This is the best resolution available for First Nations across Canada. It builds on the work done by the Tribunal.

(ii) Reply Submissions

[72] In its reply submissions, the AFN reiterates the significant quantum of the settlement agreement, both in direct compensation and in terms of program reform. The AFN also reiterates the significant encouragement from both the Tribunal and the Federal Court to engage in negotiations. The AFN contends that the Caring Society misunderstands the FSA and in fact participated in its development. Furthermore, the Caring Society opposed individual compensation to survivors and instead favoured payments into a trust fund. The Commission's technical arguments should also be rejected. The Commission's concern for precedent fails to consider that the FSA is unprecedented in scale and scope. Any individuals entitled to compensation under the Tribunal's orders who might not receive it under the FSA will nonetheless benefit from the Cy-près fund. The FSA was largely supported by First Nations leadership and was a First Nations-led process. Not accepting it will create significant litigation risk, delay and general uncertainty. The settlement funds are at risk if the Tribunal does not approve the FSA.

[73] First, the AFN indicates that it is following the direction from Justice Favel's decision to engage in good faith negotiations. The Federal Court decision should not be read as finding that the Tribunal's compensation orders are final and cannot be revisited.

[74] Second, the AFN submits that the compensation order is not final. The Panel explicitly stated that it retained jurisdiction and welcomed suggestions and clarification on the compensation process, wording, or content of the orders. The FSA clearly addresses the ambiguity of what is meant by children "in care." The AFN disagrees with the Commission's reading of Hughes v. Elections Canada, 2010 CHRT 4 and argues that instead demonstrates the latitude available to the Tribunal for remedial orders. The AFN contends that this case is distinguishable from cases about finality cited by the Commission and Caring Society as those cases were in an employment context that lack the complexity and need for reconciliation in the current case. Furthermore, the AFN is not asking the Tribunal to entirely revisit the remedies issues, as there are a number of uncertainties and outstanding issues with the Compensation Framework. The remedies in this case are not yet final. The AFN finds the Caring Society's arguments to include broad categories of beneficiaries as creating uncertainty.

[75] Third, the AFN argues that the Panel is not functus officio and that the principle of finality does not require the Tribunal to reject the FSA. The AFN argues that the FSA brings finality to the litigation, while rejecting it creates uncertainty, confusion and continued litigation. Tribunals have greater flexibility to retain jurisdiction than courts do and this is the sort of situation where tribunals should apply that flexibility. First, the lack of appeal rights in the CHRA means that the Tribunal should take a less formalistic and more flexible approach to reconsidering decisions. The availability of judicial review is not a right of appeal. The AFN relies on Merham v Royal Bank of Canada, 2009 FC 1127 for the proposition that the Tribunal can retain jurisdiction even after a judicial review. Second, the doctrine of finality applies more flexibly when a Tribunal is asked to consider whether a novel course of action complies with its orders. The AFN relies on Rogers Sugar Ltd v United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local 832, 1999 CanLII 14235 (MB QB) for the proposition that a tribunal can answer questions about whether a course of action not contemplated at the time of the order complies with its order. None of the parties contemplated the more advantageous FSA at the time of its compensation orders. The FSA has the overwhelming support of First Nations across the country and there should not be further delays in providing compensation.

[76] Fourth, the AFN contends that the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction enables it to grant the relief sought. The Panel is seized to determine whether the parties have satisfactorily settled the outstanding compensation issues. The Tribunal's continued jurisdiction is not limited to procedural matters. Contrary to the Commission's contention, Doucet-Boudreau v Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), [2003] 3 SCR 3 in fact supports the Tribunal's broad retained jurisdiction. Further, the Caring Society is incorrect that endorsing the FSA would overturn the Tribunal's earlier orders – those would remain as powerful precedents.

[77] Fifth, the AFN disputes that its motion is premature. The significant size of the FSA makes it unrealistic not to have a phased approach. The staged approach in this proceeding was designed to promote consultation with First Nations. The Jordan's Principle compensation in particular is complex, and the phased approach ensures that it can be implemented in trauma-informed and culturally relevant manner. Furthermore, the AFN disagrees that Jordan's Principle compensation remains vague and uncertain. The Federal Court evidence includes the AFN's impact assessment matrix for Jordan's Principle and an expert report. The existing detail on Jordan's Principle compensation represents an evolution and more detail on eligibility for compensation.

[78] Sixth, the AFN contends that the Caring Society second-guesses the terms of the FSA. The AFN argues that the Panel should focus on the benefits of the FSA – the 116,000 removed children who are expected to receive compensation. This expands the scope compared to the Tribunal's original orders. The AFN argues that the Jordan's Principle compensation will entitle children who have suffered physical, developmental, or lasting or permanent harm will receive a minimum of $40,000, with an intention to provide these children more than $40,000. The AFN indicates that the children who may receive less than $40,000 may not have been eligible for compensation under the Tribunal's orders. The AFN believes that the list of essential services, which differs from the list proposed by the Caring Society, is in the best interests of the class.

[79] The AFN also disputes the Caring Society's claim that the Tribunal has not distinguished between biological parents. The AFN relies on 2020 CHRT 15 at paras. 32, 44, and 45 for the proposition that the Tribunal limited compensation to caregivers who were biologically related to affected children. The AFN maintains that expanding the eligible list of caregivers would subject children to more intensive questioning to determine which caregiver could properly receive compensation.

[80] Given that the opt-out provisions from the Tribunal's Compensation Framework have not been finalized, it is impossible to conclude that the FSA does not conform to the Tribunal's opt out provisions.

[81] Seventh, tinkering with the FSA will unwind the careful construction of the agreement. All the provisions of the FSA are interconnected and changing any one provision may jeopardize the $20 billion settlement. The law on approval of class action settlements is clear that the settlement is either approved or rejected as a whole.

[82] Eighth, the AFN was the only party to request individual compensation and is the national representative organisation of First Nations. It is not precluded from seeking a variation of the Tribunal's compensation orders. Through its resolutions from the Chiefs in Assembly, the Tribunal has found that the AFN has the mandate to speak on behalf of affected children. Similarly, the AFN contends that the First Nation interested parties – the Chiefs of Ontario and Nishnawbe Aski Nation – provide their unqualified support for the FSA. The AFN argues that it is best positioned to speak on behalf of the First Nation victims in this case.

B. Canada

[83] Canada did not submit initial submissions in support of the motion and instead relied on the AFN's submissions. Canada did, however, submit reply submissions.

[84] Overall, Canada argues that the FSA is the product of negotiation and that endorsing it supports reconciliation. The Tribunal has the jurisdiction to significantly amend its compensation orders, if necessary, as it did this in 2022 CHRT 8. The support of representatives of First Nation rights holders favours approving the FSA.

[85] More specifically, Canada explains that the Tribunal can modify its earlier orders. The Tribunal has retained jurisdiction and can change a previous decision if new circumstances arise. The issue for the Tribunal is whether the FSA satisfies its previous orders. Some flexibility is required, as it would otherwise be impossible for the parties to negotiate a settlement which differed in any way from the Tribunal's orders. This would undermine the dialogic approach. This approach was endorsed by Justice Favel in the judicial review. Furthermore, the Federal Court's judicial review did not endorse the Tribunal's orders as the sole possible outcome but only as a reasonable outcome that allows space for other orders. The Tribunal's retained jurisdiction does not distinguish between substantive and clerical revisions of previous orders, as demonstrated with the substantive amendments in 2022 CHRT 8. The expressions of the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction to promote dialogue and the quasi-constitutional nature of the CHRA provide ample authority for the Tribunal to grant the requested orders. No settlement is perfect as they necessarily involve balancing benefits and compromises. This is not an attempt to undermine the Tribunal but instead an attempt to move forward with parties who represent the First Nations rights holders.

[86] Canada contends that the settlement should be approved because it is fair and reasonable. It does not perfectly match the compensation orders but some flexibility is required. The AFN and Moushoom class counsel have devised a method of compensating claimants proportional to the harm they suffered. The AFN consulted with First Nations leadership and the Caring Society in this process. The FSA extends compensation to cover an additional 15 years and provides some beneficiaries with compensation that will exceed what the Tribunal ordered.

[87] Canada indicates that the Caring Society's argument that the Tribunal's orders covered removed children placed in non-ISC funded placements is a new argument that should not be raised at this late stage in the proceedings. This is an attempt to add a new group of beneficiaries that would significantly alter the Tribunal's existing orders. This group has not been previously raised before the Tribunal so there is no evidence or argument relating to them.

[88] Canada denies that the motion is premature. The phased approach aims to ensure the final approach approved by the Federal Court has broad support from First Nations and claimants. Individual claimants who are not satisfied by this approach will have the full information they need before choosing whether to opt out.

C. Amnesty International

[89] Amnesty International indicated it would not file submissions on this motion.

D. Chiefs of Ontario

[90] The Chiefs of Ontario (COO) indicated that its leadership council agreed that the FSA was fair, reasonable and for the most part satisfies the Tribunal's compensation orders. The COO clarified it did not accept the FSA ''without qualification'' as described by the AFN.

[91] The COO undertook a consultation process to ensure that the FSA had support throughout the regions and First Nations it represents. While settlements rarely give all parties exactly what they want, the COO ultimately accepted the FSA despite its difficulties and deficiencies. It presents a reasonable outcome that brings finality to the process and compensates survivors without further delays.

E. Nishnawbe Aski Nation

[92] The Nishnawbe Aski Nation (NAN) supports the motion as the FSA substantively satisfies the Tribunal's compensation orders. NAN recognises that the FSA is not perfect but it respects the rights of its citizens to receive meaningful compensation. The FSA provides safeguards to protect survivors in remote communities.

[93] NAN identified concerns that distributing large settlement funds in remote communities can have significant negative consequences for survivors. NAN is pleased that the current process builds on past experiences to address these challenges.

[94] NAN understands that the Tribunal made its awards of $40,000 considering the maximum compensation it could order. NAN also understands Canada would not agree to provide unlimited compensation funds for the FSA. Accordingly, NAN supports the concept of proportionality even if it means certain beneficiaries receive less than $40,000.

[95] Further, NAN supports finality. It recognizes that the parties want finality for the settlement agreement and that there are dispute resolution mechanisms built into the FSA such that the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction of compensation matters would not be necessary.

F. Caring Society

[96] The Caring Society opposes the motion.

[97] The Caring Society emphasises that this case involves children. It is important that the approach to the case recognises the particular circumstances of children and the harms that they suffered. The Tribunal's remedies were tailored to the established evidence of harms. Canada opposed this case throughout. Now, an outside class action would provide more compensation to some victims before the Tribunal but would significantly detract from the Tribunal's awards in other ways and oust the Tribunal's jurisdiction. While the Tribunal retains jurisdiction, the compensation orders themselves are final. The Tribunal must ensure all victims entitled to compensation under its orders receive it. The uncertainty on Jordan's Principle compensation also makes this motion premature. If the Tribunal nonetheless assesses the merits of the FSA, the Tribunal should still reject the FSA. It does not clearly satisfy the Tribunal's compensation orders.

(i) Facts

[98] The Caring Society provides an overview of pertinent facts, starting from the filing of the complaint to the substance of the FSA.

[99] The AFN and Caring Society filed the complaint in 2007 as a last resort after trying to address the underlying issues through negotiations with Canada. Canada continually obstructed the process. The Tribunal found that Canada retaliated against Dr. Blackstock and separately awarded abuse of process costs against Canada for delaying the process by failing to disclose a large number of highly relevant documents. The Tribunal heard and accepted largely uncontradicted evidence about the harm caused by Canada's discrimination. This evidence demonstrated the harm of both removals under the First Nations Child and Family Services Program and from the narrow implementation of Jordan's Principle. The Tribunal recognized the suffering First Nations children experienced. The Tribunal found that Canada was aware of the discrimination and refused to act to rectify it.

[100] In terms of compensation, the Caring Society requested $20,000 plus interest for Canada's wilful and reckless conduct for each child affected by Canada's discrimination. The Caring Society requested that these funds be paid into a trust fund. The AFN strongly advocated for the maximum compensation available to be paid to every victim of Canada's discrimination and did not restrict this request to those in ISC-funded care. Canada argued there was insufficient evidence to justify the requested compensation.

[101] The Tribunal ordered $40,000 in compensation to defined categories of child victims and eligible caregiving parents and grandparents. The end date for compensation was still to be determined since the Tribunal found the discrimination was ongoing. The Tribunal emphasized that its remedies were based on the evidence presented. The orders did not make any distinctions between First Nations children placed in ISC-funded care and those in other care arrangements, as it was the removal itself that was the harm. These remedies are based on human rights principles, not tort principles. They apply regardless of the existence of a class action.

[102] The Caring Society reviews the development of the Compensation Framework and presents it as an example of the dialogic framework in action. It involved negotiations between the parties but required many issues to be adjudicated by the Tribunal. This process provided an opportunity for consultations and for the other parties to receive information from Canada. The dialogic approach where the parties could draw on the Tribunal's expertise to address disputes contributed to the success in developing the Compensation Framework. This process was upheld during the judicial review.

[103] The Compensation Framework established key aspects for compensating beneficiaries. It defines a "necessary/unnecessary removal" in s. 4.2.1. The definition focuses on the impact of the removal on the child and not the source of funding. Similarly, the definitions of "essential service," "service gap," and "unreasonable delay" focus on the experience of the child. An "essential service" captures substantive equality for First Nations children seeking social services and that it is essential because the absence of the service would cause the child to suffer real harm. It would not cover all services eligible for funding under Jordan's Principle. A "service gap" evolved in response to Canada's arguments and requires that the child's need must be confirmed and the service must be recommended by a professional. While some objective confirmation of need was required, Canada was not required to be aware of the need. An "unreasonable delay" was a delay of more than 12 hours for an urgent request and 48 hours for non-urgent requests unless Canada could demonstrate that the delay did not prejudice the affected First Nations child.

[104] On the issue of compensating estates, the Tribunal found that it would be unfair not to compensate estates of victims who had passed away while waiting to receive compensation.

[105] The Caring Society is not a party to the class actions. The Caring Society did, however, participate in some discussions and set out its position that it would not support a settlement that reduced the compensation for affected children below the $40,000 the Tribunal ordered Canada to pay. The Caring Society was not invited to participate in drafting the FSA although it provided some feedback. There was no recourse to an adjudicator on points of disagreement while the FSA was being drafted.

[106] The Caring Society outlines three key departures from the Tribunal's orders and uncertainty about Jordan's Principle.

[107] First and most significantly in the Caring Society's view, the FSA excludes First Nations children removed from their home, family and community and placed into non-ISC funded care. The Caring Society contends that Canada's discriminatory conduct includes underfunding preventive services and least disruptive measures which incentivized children being unnecessarily taken into care. The focus was not on whether the placement was funded by Canada. Some First Nations children were placed in ISC funded care after they were removed, while others were not. In any event, they suffered harm from the removal. While funding actual costs for foster care placements exacerbated the harm, that was not Canada's only discriminatory conduct. Focusing on the funding source is contrary to the Tribunal's focus on the experiences of the affected children.

[108] The FSA disentitles the estates of deceased caregiving parents and grandparents. The Tribunal rejected this position as it would have allowed Canada to benefit from delaying compensation to victims of its discrimination. Excluding this category of beneficiaries is not consistent with the objectives of the CHRA.

[109] The FSA differs from the compensation the Tribunal ordered for caregiving parents and grandparents. The Tribunal ordered $40,000 in compensation to a parent or grandparent who was the primary caregiver for a First Nations child eligible for compensation unless the child was removed for reasons of sexual, physical or emotional abuse. The Tribunal made no distinction between biological and adoptive parents.

[110] The FSA does not guarantee the same compensation. The limited pot of funding does not guarantee all eligible caregiving parents and grandparents will receive $40,000 if they had a child removed. For Jordan's Principle parents and caregiving grandparents, only some classes are eligible for compensation. Reducing the compensation some caregiving parents and grandparents are entitled to and eliminating it for others is not in keeping with the human rights approach adopted in this case.

[111] The FSA does not provide certainty that Jordan's Principle and Trout class members will receive comparable compensation. Compensation will be based on a confirmed need for an eligible service. Only First Nations children who experienced a "significant impact" will be guaranteed to receive $40,000. This differs from the Tribunal's approach. As such, the definition of "significant impact" will be significant in determining whether children eligible for compensation under the Tribunal's orders would receive it under the FSA. The term is not currently defined.

[112] The Caring Society contends that the opt-out in the FSA replaces the opt-out in the Compensation Framework and is not clearly adapted to the circumstance where half the victims are still children. The AFN and Canada did not seek the Tribunal's approval for the opt out form despite the fact that it waives rights under both the class action and the Tribunal process. The FSA requires victims to decide if they will opt out of the FSA by February 2023, by which time they may not yet have a full picture of their rights under the FSA. The requirement to opt out of both the Tribunal process and the class action puts victims who would receive less than $40,000 under the FSA in an untenable position. While this is a moot point if the Tribunal suspends its compensation process in favour of the FSA, it otherwise creates uncertainty.

[113] The release is also broadly worded. It is unclear if Canada would attempt to use it to limit the enforcement of a long-term reform order from the Tribunal.

(ii) Arguments

[114] The Caring Society identifies three issues. First, the Caring Society contends the Tribunal does not have the jurisdiction to modify its previous decisions as requested by the AFN and Canada. Second, the motion is premature given the details that have yet to be established in the FSA. Third, even if the Tribunal can revisit its earlier decisions, it should not approve the FSA.

[115] First, the Caring Society argues that the Tribunal does not have the jurisdiction to modify its previous decisions as requested. Vertical stare decisis obliges the Tribunal to follow the Federal Court's judicial review upholding the compensation orders. The Caring Society supports the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction to address outstanding compensation issues. This should not, however, extend to re-adjudicating final decisions. Chandler v Alberta Association of Architects, [1989] 2 SCR 848 does not empower a Tribunal to remain seized such that it decides a matter differently, which is what the AFN and Canada are seeking in this motion. Consistency and finality remain important, especially in this case where the Federal Court has decided a judicial review.

[116] The AFN and Canada have failed to specify the amendments they seek. This lack of specificity undermines procedural fairness, the rule of law and the principle of finality. Furthermore, the amendments cannot reduce compensation as parties cannot contract out of human rights obligations. It is contrary to the objectives of the CHRA to allow Canada to change venues to avoid human rights legislation by reaching an agreement with only certain parties to the Tribunal case.

[117] While the CHRA allows a complaint to be dismissed because it was adequately addressed elsewhere, it does not prevent the Tribunal from awarding compensation on the basis that other proceedings could award compensation.

[118] Second, the Caring Society contends that the motion is premature. The FSA does not provide certainty as to which victims eligible for compensation under the Tribunal's orders will be eligible for compensation. The eligibility for Jordan's Principle claimants is particularly vague, as there is no indication of the threshold required for materiality. Claimants cannot materially assess whether their circumstances will meet the eligibility criteria. There is no public guidance on how a significant impact will be determined, which may affect the quantity of compensation for Jordan's Principle and Trout class claimants. The definition of delay has also not yet been determined.

[119] The Caring Society contends that the eligibility for removed children to receive compensation is premised on a misconception about what triggers the eligibility for compensation. From the Caring Society's perspective, it was always clear that it was the act of removal that triggered eligibility for compensation because that effectively captured the harm from Canada's discriminatory conduct. If there is now a dispute about the meaning of "in care" in the Tribunal's orders, that is appropriately resolved through the dialogic approach and seeking clarification from the Tribunal if required.

[120] The final point of uncertainty is the potential impact of the release on the Tribunal's supervision of long-term reform initiatives.

[121] Third, the Tribunal ought to apply a human rights lens if it considers whether it should endorse the FSA.

[122] In applying the human rights framework, the Tribunal relied on evidence of harm to make its compensation orders. The AFN and Canada should have a corresponding obligation to lead evidence to establish why victims are no longer worthy of the compensation the Tribunal has awarded them.

[123] The Tribunal should apply a human rights lens rather than a class action or tort lens. The Tribunal therefore should not approach this motion as a court approving a class action settlement. The Federal Court endorsed the Tribunal's dialogic approach. The dialogic approach does not, however, encompass modifying the Tribunal's compensation orders without evidence after they have been upheld on judicial review and over the objections of other parties. The Caring Society submits that it would create a problematic precedent for other cases if the Tribunal were to accept revoking compensation for victims who suffered the worst case of discrimination. Remedial orders from human rights tribunals must be final rather than a bargaining chip. The CHRA provides for the Commission to approve human rights settlement agreements but there is no comparable requirement for settlements outside the human rights regime. The Tribunal is the proper forum for resolving human rights claims and allowing another process to invalidate the Tribunal's orders undermines the human rights regime.

[124] This case is particularly significant because the former s. 67 created a presumption for many First Nation individuals that the human rights regime was not able to protect them. This case was instrumental in changing that but modifying the compensation orders could undermine trust in human rights among First Nations communities.

[125] The Tribunal has continuously emphasised the best interests of the First Nations children affected by this case. The Tribunal should continue to apply this lens. The Caring Society submits that the Tribunal process has never drawn compensation distinctions based on the type of placement. Children had no control over their placement once they were removed and who funded it. Furthermore, it does not reflect the reason for the child's removal from their home – namely, that Canada's discriminatory provision of the FNCFS Program meant that they were not adequately supported with the least disruptive measures and experienced the trauma of being removed from their homes.

[126] The Caring Society is concerned that granting the motion would be a dangerous precedent for the human rights regimes. Victims will be vulnerable if human rights damages can be set aside through a civil process. It is unfair to force victims to defend their entitlements against an outside process. It is particularly problematic to accept the federal government negotiating a reduction in the compensation it will pay victims.

G. Commission

[127] The Commission focuses its submissions on administrative law principles. It recognizes that the FSA would result in significant compensation for a large number of individuals if it were to be implemented. The Commission makes no submissions on whether the FSA is a good resolution for its intended beneficiaries.

[128] The Commission submits that the Tribunal has jurisdiction to consider whether the FSA will satisfy its compensation orders. However, the FSA does not satisfy the Tribunal's compensation orders.

[129] In terms of the AFN's alternative relief of amending the Tribunal's orders, the Commission submits that the Tribunal lacks the jurisdiction to substantively amend its compensation orders. The Tribunal's compensation orders are final. The Tribunal is functus officio. While tribunals should apply this principle flexibly, none of the exceptions justifying the Tribunal revisiting its earlier rulings applies in this motion. Finality is particularly important in this case given the duration of the case.

[130] The Commission reviews Attorney General of Canada v. Canadian Human Rights Commission, 2013 FC 921 (Berberi), Canada (Attorney General) v. Grover, 1994 CanLII 18487 (FC) and Hughes v Transport Canada, 2021 CHRT 34 to identify the sort of situation in which the Tribunal could retain jurisdiction and the limits on that ability.

[131] The Tribunal's retained jurisdiction relates to making additional orders to ensure its compensation orders are effectively implemented. It does not extend to changing the substance of its prior remedial orders. If it is broader, it is to add or specify categories of beneficiaries, not to reduce or narrow beneficiaries.

[132] Canada sought to review the compensation orders as final orders rather than as interim or interlocutory orders. The route to challenge or vary the orders is through judicial review, now at the Federal Court of Appeal. To simultaneously ask the Tribunal to revisit the orders challenges established principles and procedures of administrative law. The Federal Court of Appeal would not have the appropriate record before it if the Tribunal were to substantively vary its orders. There would also be a risk that both the Federal Court of Appeal and the Tribunal are simultaneously reviewing the orders. If the Tribunal amended its orders first, the Federal Court of Appeal might find that the judicial review was moot, necessitating an entirely new judicial review if there was a desire to challenge the orders. Re-opening the case would also strain the Tribunal's resources as more litigants sought to challenge final Tribunal decisions.

[133] In the event that the Tribunal reconsiders its orders, the Commission contends that the Tribunal should apply a human rights lens based on the CHRA. The Tribunal's role under the CHRA is to provide redress for victims of a discriminatory practice, which requires examining the FSA to determine whether it provides appropriate compensation to victims based on a human rights lens. The Tribunal must apply principles of fairness and access to justice in balancing the expanded beneficiary list under the FSA with those individuals who will receive less compensation or be denied compensation. The Tribunal's focus needs to be on those individuals covered by its prior orders. The Tribunal should not apply a class actions framework.

H. Post-Hearing Submissions

[134] After the hearing, the Panel Chair requested further submissions on specific questions. The first question sought clarification on whether the parties negotiating the FSA negotiate it on the basis that the Tribunal's orders provided compensation for ISC-funded placements of First Nations children. The second question followed up and on the first and asked if a misapprehension of the scope of the Tribunal's orders affected First Nations' support for the FSA. The third question invited further comments from the parties on the issue of individual versus collective rights that the AFN raised in its reply submissions. These submissions are addressed in the reasons as they arise.

IV. Functus officio and Finality

A. Law on functus officio and finality

[135] The Panel has previously reviewed the principles of functus officio and finality in 2020 CHRT 7:

[54] Furthermore, the Federal Court in Grover v. Canada (National Research Council) (1994), 1994 CanLII 18487 (FC), 80 FTR 256, 28 Admin LR (2d) 231 (F.C.) [Grover], a case that this Panel relied on in previous decisions in this case (see for example, 2017 CHRT 14, at para. 32, see also 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 39), an application for judicial review of a Tribunal decision had to decide whether the Tribunal had the power to reserve jurisdiction with regards to a remedial order. Grover is summarized as follows in Berberi v. Attorney General of Canada, 2011 CHRT 23 [Berberi]:

> [13] …The Tribunal had ordered that the complainant be appointed to a specific job, but retained jurisdiction to hear further evidence with regards to the implementation of the order. The Federal Court held that although the Act does not contain an express provision that allows the Tribunal to reopen an inquiry, the wide remedial powers set out therein, coupled with the principle that human rights legislation should be interpreted liberally, in a manner that accords full recognition and effect to the rights protected under such legislation, enables the Tribunal to reserve jurisdiction on certain matters in order to ensure that the remedies ordered by the Tribunal are forthcoming to complainants (see Grover at paras. 29-36). The Federal Court added:
> [14] It is clear that the Act compels the award of effective remedies and therefore, in certain circumstances the Tribunal must be given the ability to ensure that their remedial orders are effectively implemented. Therefore, the remedial powers in subsection 53(2) should be interpreted as including the power to reserve jurisdiction on certain matters in order to ensure that the remedies ordered by the Tribunal are forthcoming to complainants. The denial of such a power would be overly formalistic and would defeat the remedial purpose of the legislation. In the context of a rather complex remedial order, it makes sense for the Tribunal to remain seized of jurisdiction with respect to remedial issues in order to facilitate the implementation of the remedy. This is consistent with the overall purpose of the legislation and with the flexible approach advocated by Sopinka J. in Chandler, supra. It would frustrate the mandate of the legislation to require the complainant to seek the enforcement of an unambiguous order in the Federal Court or to file a new complaint in order to obtain the full remedy awarded by the Tribunal. (Grover at para. 33)
> [15] Similarly, in Canada (Attorney General) v. Moore, 1998 CanLII 9085 (FC), [1998] 4 F.C. 585 [Moore], the Federal Court had to determine whether the Tribunal exceeded its jurisdiction by reconsidering and changing a cease and desist order. Having found the complaint to be substantiated, the Tribunal made a general direction in its order and gave the parties the opportunity to work out the details of the order while the Tribunal retained jurisdiction. After examining the reasoning in Grover and Chandler, the Federal Court stated:

[16] The reasoning in these cases supports the conclusion that the Tribunal has broad discretion to return to a matter and I find that it had discretion in the circumstances here. Whether that discretion is appropriately exercised by the Tribunal will depend on the circumstances of each case. That is consistent with the principle set out in Chandler v. Alberta Association of Architects, relied upon by the applicant, which dealt with the decision of a board other than the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal. (Moore at para. 49)

[17] The Federal Court determined that the Tribunal had reserved jurisdiction and there was no indication that the Tribunal viewed its decision as final and conclusive in a manner that would preclude it from returning to a matter included in the order. Therefore, on the authority of Grover, the Federal Court concluded that subsection 53(2) of the Act empowered the Tribunal to reopen the proceedings (see Moore at para. 50).

[18] The Tribunal jurisprudence that has considered the functus officio principle and interpreted Grover and Moore, has generally found that absent a reservation of jurisdiction from the Tribunal on an issue, the Tribunal's decision is final unless an exception to the functus officio principle can be established (see Douglas v. SLH Transport Inc., 2010 CHRT 25; Walden v. Canada (Social Development), 2010 CHRT 19; Warman v. Beaumont, 2009 CHRT 32; and, Goyette v. Voyageur Colonial Ltée, (November 16, 2001), TD 14/01 (CHRT)). However, recent Federal Court jurisprudence, decided several years after Grover and Moore and which examined the authority of the Commission to reconsider its decisions, provides further guidance on the application of the functus officio principle to administrative tribunals and commissions.

(Berberi at paras. 13-18, emphasis ours)

[21] The application of the functus officio principle to administrative tribunals must be flexible and not overly formalistic (see Chandler at para. 21). In Grover, in determining whether the Tribunal could supervise the implementation of its remedial orders, the Federal Court recognized that the Tribunal has the power to retain jurisdiction over its remedial orders to ensure that they are effectively implemented. In Moore, in deciding whether the Tribunal could reconsider and change a remedial order, the Federal Court expanded on the reasoning > in Grover and stated that "the Tribunal has broad discretion to return to a matter..." (Moore at para. 49). In Grover and Moore, while the retention of jurisdiction by the Tribunal was a factor considered by the Federal Court in determining whether the Tribunal appropriately exercised its discretion to return to a matter, ultimately, it was not the only factor considered by the Court. In addition to examining the context of each case, the Tribunal must also consider whether "there are indications in the enabling statute that a decision can be reopened in order to enable the tribunal to discharge the function committed to it by enabling legislation" (Chandler at para. 22). This method of analyzing the Tribunal's discretion to return to a matter is consistent with the Federal Court's reasoning in Kleysen and Merham. The question then becomes: considering the Act and the circumstances of the case, should the Tribunal return to the matter in order to discharge the function committed to it by the Canadian Human Rights Act?

>
> [22] The primary focus of the Act is to "...identify and eliminate discrimination" (Robichaud v. Canada (Treasury Board), 1987 CanLII 73 (SCC), [1987] 2 S.C.R. 84 at para. 13). In this regard, subsection 53(2) of the Act grants the Tribunal broad remedial discretion to eliminate discrimination when a complaint of discrimination is substantiated (see Grover at para. 31). Therefore, as the Federal Court has stated, "subsection 53(2) should be interpreted in a manner which best facilitates the compensation of those subject to discrimination" (Grover at para. 32). The Act does not provide a right of appeal of Tribunal decisions, and judicial review is not the appropriate forum to seek out the implementation of a Tribunal decision. As the Federal Court indicated to the Complainant: "The Applicant is at liberty to seek an order from the Tribunal with respect to implementation of the remedy" (Berberi v. Canadian Human Rights Tribunal and Attorney General of Canada (RCMP), 2011 FC 485 at para. 65). When the Tribunal makes a remedial order under subsection 53(2), that order can be made an order of the Federal Court for the purposes of enforcement under section 57 of the Act. Section 57 allows decisions of the Tribunal to "...be enforced on their own account through contempt proceedings because they, like decisions of the superior Courts, are considered by the legislator to be deserving of the respect which the contempt powers are intended to impose" (Canada (Human Rights Commission) v. Warman, 2011 FCA 297 at para. 44).
> (Berberi, at paras. 21-22)

[55] The Panel agrees with the above reasoning outlined in Berberi on the retention of jurisdiction over remedial orders to ensure that they are effectively implemented and has adopted and followed this approach from the Merit Decision and onward.

[56] Additionally, the Tribunal used a similar approach to remedies in Grant v. Manitoba Telecom Services Inc., 2013 CHRT 35 [Grant] once the decision on the merits was rendered:

> [3] The Tribunal retained jurisdiction on many of the remedies requested by the Complainant, including the missed pension contributions, in order to get further submissions and clarification from the parties.
>
> [4] Both parties were given the opportunity to provide additional submissions on the Complainant's outstanding remedial requests from Grant (decision) on a conference call on July 10, 2012.
>
> (Grant at paras. 3-4, emphasis ours).
>
> [7] In Grant (remedies), the Tribunal again retained jurisdiction in the event the parties were unable to reach an agreement on the pension remedy, among others.
>
> [8] The parties have been unable to work out the details of the Complainant's lost pension and disagree on what remedy the Tribunal ordered with respect thereof.
> (Grant, 2013 CHRT 35 at paras 7-8, emphasis ours).

[57] The Tribunal in Grant provided further direction on the remedy in that subsequent ruling. Of interest, this case was challenged at the Federal Court after the decision on the merits while the Tribunal was deciding further remedies. The application for judicial review was ultimately discontinued.

[136] The Tribunal continues to rely on its previous analysis outlined above and will now address the additional case law raised in the parties' submissions.

[137] Chandler v. Alberta Association of Architects, [1989] 2 SCR 848 involved a review of the Practice Review Board of the Alberta Association of Architects (the Board) issuing an intention to resume its hearing to address remedies. The Board initially made findings of misconduct and issued related penalties. However, those findings and penalties were struck because the Board lacked the jurisdiction to issue them. The Board only had the power to issue recommendations. After the findings of misconduct and related penalties were overturned, the Board gave notice to the parties that it intended to reconvene to make recommendations that were within its jurisdiction.

[138] Broadly speaking, the majority of the Supreme Court concluded that the Board had never issued a valid remedy decision. It was therefore entitled to receive further submissions and issue a remedy within its jurisdiction.

[139] In reaching this conclusion, the majority commented that as a general rule, a tribunal cannot revisit a decision because it has changed its mind, made an error or there has been a change in circumstances. It may only alter a decision if authorized by statute, where the error is clerical or there was an error in expressing the manifest intention of the tribunal.

[140] Given that this general rule is based on the policy principle of finality, it must be applied flexibly. That flexibility was appropriate in this case where the Board had not granted any valid remedy. However, this flexibility would not allow a tribunal to alter its remedies once it has issued a valid remedial decision:

> I do not understand Martland J. to go so far as to hold that functus officio has no application to administrative tribunals. Apart from the English practice which is based on a reluctance to amend or reopen formal judgments, there is a sound policy reason for recognizing the finality of proceedings before administrative tribunals. As a general rule, once such a tribunal has reached a final decision in respect to the matter that is before it in accordance with its enabling statute, that decision cannot be revisited because the tribunal has changed its mind, made an error within jurisdiction or because there has been a change of circumstances. It can only do so if authorized by statute or if there has been a slip or error within the exceptions enunciated in Paper Machinery Ltd. v. J. O. Ross Engineering Corp., supra.
>
> To this extent, the principle of functus officio applies. It is based, however, on the policy ground which favours finality of proceedings rather than the rule which was developed with respect to formal judgments of a court whose decision was subject to a full appeal. For this reason, I am of the opinion that its application must be more flexible and less formalistic in respect to the decisions of administrative tribunals which are subject to appeal only on a point of law. Justice may require the reopening of administrative proceedings in order to provide relief which would otherwise be available on appeal.
>
> Furthermore, if the tribunal has failed to dispose of an issue which is fairly raised by the proceedings and of which the tribunal is empowered by its enabling statute to dispose, it ought to be allowed to complete its statutory task. If, however, the administrative entity is empowered to dispose of a matter by one or more specified remedies or by alternative remedies, the fact > that one is selected does not entitle it to reopen proceedings to make another or further selection.

[141] In its reply submissions, the AFN relies on Canada (Attorney General) v. Symtron Systems Inc., 1999 CanLII 9343 (FCA) for the proposition that the availability of judicial review does not play a determinative role in the Tribunal's ability to revisit its earlier decisions. Symtron Systems involved a complaint under NAFTA to the Canadian International Trade Tribunal by an American company, Symtron, that the Department of Defence had not properly evaluated whether a competitor complied with the minimum RFP requirements. The CITT's initial decision directed the Department of Defence to review whether Symtron and the successful proponent met the RFP requirement. The review was silent on the main reason the competitor was alleged to not meet the requirements. Symtron brough the case back to the CITT, which concluded that the Department of Defence had not addressed whether the competitor, International Code Fire Services, met the RFP requirements. The Department of Defence and the competitor sought judicial review.

[142] On judicial review, the Federal Court of Appeal found that functus officio did not apply to the second complaint to the CITT because it was a new complaint. Nonetheless, the FCA commented that the CITT must allow "some latitude when faced with a new complaint which might, in other circumstances, be the subject of an appeal or an action for enforcement."

[143] Aside from the distinguishing feature that Symtron Systems involved a new complaint, Symtron Systems says little about the degree of flexibility a tribunal should have. The specific facts in Symtron Systems seem to contemplate approaching the tribunal's jurisdiction flexibly to ensure a remedy is effectively implemented. There was no suggestion in that case that the flexibility extends to revoking or narrowing an earlier remedial decision. Instead, the flexibility is more in line with how the Tribunal has previously interpreted its retained jurisdiction in this case to provide the flexibility to ensure that its remedies are effectively implemented.

[144] The AFN also relies on Merham v. Royal Bank of Canada, 2009 FC 1127 for the proposition that an administrative decision-maker can reconsider a decision even after it has been upheld on judicial review.

[145] Merham involved a human rights complaint to the Commission by Mr. Merham against his manager at RBC. The Commission dismissed the complaint when it was first submitted and the Commission's decision was upheld on a judicial review. Mr. Merham did not challenge the judicial review but successfully brought a small claims court action against his manager that called into question his manager's truthfulness during the Commission investigation. Mr. Merham asked the Commission to reconsider its decision in light of this new evidence. The Commission issued brief reasons indicating it had reviewed Mr. Merham's new evidence and declined to further investigate his complaint.

[146] The Court found that the Commission had jurisdiction to reconsider its decisions even though the decision was upheld on judicial review. However, this is "a discretionary power which must be used sparingly in exceptional and rare circumstances" (para. 25).

[147] Nonetheless, the Federal Court upheld the Commission's decision not to further investigate the complaint. The Commission was reasonable in concluding that Mr. Merham's new evidence would not affect the disposition of the case.

[148] Merham is of minimal assistance to the AFN. In some cases, if new information comes to light, it might be appropriate for the Tribunal to reconsider its earlier substantive decision. However, the nature of the new information in Merham is significantly different than in the current case. The new evidence in Merham, according to Mr. Merham's submissions, cast doubt on the evidentiary basis for the Commission's decision. By contrast, in the current decision, the AFN and Canada do not argue that there is new evidence that contradicts the Tribunal's factual findings that the First Nations children identified in the Tribunal's compensation decisions experienced discrimination. Instead, the AFN and Canada wish to replace the Tribunal's orders with a settlement they subsequently negotiated in a class action. That is distinguishable from the circumstances in Merham where the Commission was asked to reconsider its decision.

[149] The AFN also relies on Rogers Sugar Ltd v United Food and Commercial Workers Union, Local 832, 1999 CanLII 14235 (MB QB) for the proposition that a tribunal can answer questions about whether a course of action not contemplated at the time of the order complies with its order. None of the parties contemplated the more advantageous FSA at the time of the Tribunal's compensation orders. The AFN contends that the FSA has the overwhelming support of First Nations across the country and there should not be further delays in providing compensation.

[150] In Rogers Sugar, the Court of Queen's Bench of Manitoba examined the arbitrator's decisions concerning the appropriate calculations and amounts for severance payments according to the collective agreement.

[151] Subsequent to the parties' receipt of the award, a dispute arose concerning the calculation of severance pay in the case of permanent employees. The parties asked the arbitrator if the company's method of calculating severance pay as represented by the company's spreadsheet was the appropriate method. The arbitrator confirmed that it was appropriate. No written ruling of this decision was received. The parties continued to disagree on the meaning of the arbitrator's ruling and consequently agreed to approach the arbitrator once more. On September 17, 1997, a letter was sent setting out both points of view. A written letter was sent to the arbitrator setting out the particular issue in dispute the second time, namely, whether the arbitrator's award was intended to completely replace the current language of the collective agreement, in particular the reference to "fraction of a year" set out in the collective agreement. On September 26, 1997, the arbitrator provided the parties with a written decision.

[152] The company submitted that the first consensual approach to the arbitrator to clarify the calculation of the severance pay provisions awarded was appropriate and within the arbitrator's reserved jurisdiction to implement his June 4th award. However, when the arbitrator was asked for a second clarification in September, his decision was not a clarification but rather a reversal of his clarification issued on August 15, 1997.

[153] The Court found the doctrine of functus officio applies even if the parties' consent since consent cannot clothe the arbitrator with jurisdiction he does not have. However, the Court cited Chandler for the need for flexibility when administrative tribunals apply this principle. The principle is based on the policy ground which favours finality of proceedings. The arbitrator was not functus officio and did not exceed his jurisdiction when it clarified its order on both occasions, he was within his retained jurisdiction of implementing his award and was attempting to clarify his decision in response to specific questions asked. The Court wrote this “must be understood in the context of the question which was placed before him” (para. 33). In sum, “the arbitrator’s actions in both August and September of 1997 were in the nature of clarification and therefore he was not functus” (para. 33, emphasis added). Notably, the Court did not find the arbitrator to reverse a previous decision that he had made but rather clarified an unclear order.

[154] It also stands for the proposition that flexibility and a less formalistic approach must be applied by administrative tribunals when asked to reopen a matter: “Justice may require the reopening of administrative proceedings in order to provide relief which would otherwise be available on appeal (in a court proceeding). (p. 862) (Chandler was followed in Canada Post Corp. v. C.U.P.W. (1991), 84 D.L.R. (4th) 574.)” (para. 31). The Court stated the principle of functus officio is subject to two exceptions. It does not apply where there has been a slip or a clerical error in drawing up the judgment. It also does not apply when there has been an error in expressing the manifest intention of the fact finder.

[155] This second case clarifying the manifest intention of the fact finder applies in the Tribunal’s current case should the parties request that the Tribunal clarify the non-ISC, categories of removed children further discussed below and also supports previous requests for clarification. This also supports the Tribunal's approach to retained jurisdiction and previous decisions that, for example, clarified that the estates of otherwise eligible victims were within the scope of the Tribunal’s initial Compensation Decision and are owed compensation. Similarly, the Tribunal is not precluded from approving the FSA because it includes beneficiaries that the Tribunal had not previously been asked to consider. However, the case does not support disentitlements for the purpose of compromise through negotiation and in light of a cap on compensation.

[156] In fact, in light of the parties' disagreements in Rogers Sugar, the arbitrator clarified that he had no intention to reduce entitlement. The written decision states: “It was not my intention to reduce in any way the existing entitlement for severance (permanent employees) while I was adding some additional entitlement for those with long service. Therefore, the “fraction of a year” was meant to remain,” (para. 9). The arbitrator later further clarified his order.

[157] Rogers Sugar supports the Tribunal's approach to considering the FSA, to reconvene for a hearing on the contested issue of non-ISC removed children and for further clarification of its orders. However, it does not support an amendment to its previous compensation orders to remove entitlements to victims/survivors when no errors were made concerning those victims/survivors.

[158] The AFN submits that Zutter v. British Colombia (Council of Human Rights), [1995] 57 BCAC 241, 1995 CanLII 1234 (BC CA) applies here and that it stands for the proposition that a Human Rights Tribunal may reconsider its own decisions simply by virtue of the fact that it is a Human Rights Tribunal.

[159] The Panel disagrees with the AFN's interpretation of this decision and finds the facts and issues entirely different from the case at hand:

> [1] The issue on this appeal is whether the British Columbia Council of Human Rights (the "Council") has the jurisdiction to re-open a complaint which has been discontinued by the Council under s. 14(1)(a) of the Human Rights Act, S.B.C. 1984, c. 22 (the "Act").

[160] For unclear reasons, Mr. Zutter was not notified of the decision to discontinue the complaint until September 23, at which time he discovered that no written response to the investigation report summary had ever been received by the Council. He dismissed his solicitor and lodged a complaint with the Law Society. The Court was advised that the solicitor in question was subsequently disciplined for his failure to represent Mr. Zutter adequately (para. 12).

> [13] In the meantime, Zutter once again turned to the Coalition for assistance, and on 30 September 1991 the Coalition wrote asking the Council to re-open the matter and consider the submissions which, by reason of his solicitor's ineptitude, Zutter had been denied the opportunity to make before Council took its decision to discontinue his complaints. Relying on s. 15 of the Act, the Council responded by stating that it did not have the statutory authority to reconsider its decision:
> > 15. A determination under section 14(1)(a), an order under section 14(1)(d)(ii) or section 14(3) or the dismissal of a complaint under section 14(1)(d)(i) shall be communicated in writing to the complainant and the person who is alleged to have contravened this Act, and, where the proceedings are discontinued or the complaint is dismissed, no further > proceedings under this Act shall be taken in relation to the subject matter of the discontinued proceedings or the dismissed complaint.

[14] A further request to re-open, made on Zutter's behalf by the B.C. Public Interest Advocacy Centre in December of 1991, was rejected by the Council in a letter dated 7 February, 1992, the relevant portions of which read as follows:

> The Council does not consider that, once notice of the investigation report and a reasonable opportunity for response have been provided, the principle of procedural fairness imposes a duty to enquire as to the status of a party's response, particularly where the party is represented by legal counsel. In the Council's view, the process of disclosure following completion of the investigation is dictated by the requirements of procedural fairness and is not part of the investigative process as such.
>
> For the above reasons, The Council concludes that the required standard of procedural fairness has been met. Therefore, your request that the Council reconsider its decision of July 25, 1991 is denied.

[161] The Court found:

> [23] … it cannot be doubted that from Zutter's point of view, and indeed from that of any reasonable person, the result to him is unfair in the ordinary sense of that word. Thus, it would be an unfortunate irony if the Council, whose very existence and remedial purpose is characterized by the fundamental values of fairness and justice, nonetheless lacked the jurisdiction to remedy that unfairness.
>
>
> [31] I do not accept the argument of the appellants that the equitable jurisdiction described by Martland J. in Grillas must be viewed as subservient to the doctrine of functus officio, in the case of all administrative tribunals except those where such jurisdiction is expressly stated to exist, in order to give effect to the "sound policy" of finality in the proceedings of such tribunals. That policy will necessarily govern the manner in which the jurisdiction to reconsider is exercised by the Council, thus ensuring its restrictive application, just as the power of this Court to admit fresh evidence is carefully and restrictively exercised in deference to the same policy.
> [32] The equitable jurisdiction to reconsider was recognized to exist in, and found to have been properly exercised by, the administrative tribunals under consideration in Re Lornex Mining Corporation Ltd., 1976 CanLII 1123 (BC SC), [1976] 5 W.W.R. 554 (B.C.S.C.), in Re Ombudsman of Ontario and the Minister of Housing (1979), 1979 CanLII 1933 (ON SC), 103 D.L.R. (3d) 117

> (Ont.H.C.), aff'd, (1980), 1980 CanLII 1740 (ON CA), 117 D.L.R. (3d) 613 (Ont.C.A.), and more recently in Attorney General of Canada v. Grover and Canadian Human Rights Commission (4 July, 1994), T-1945-93 [reported 1994 CanLII 18487 (FC), 24 C.H.R.R. D/390] (F.C.T.D.). In each case, the jurisdiction was exercised notwithstanding the absence of any express acknowledgement of its existence in the tribunal's enabling statute. The judge below applied the first two of these authorities when reaching his conclusion that the Council had jurisdiction to reconsider its decision to discontinue Zutter's complaints in the circumstances of this case, and I am of the view that he was right to do so.

[162] This paragraph citing Grover, supports the Tribunal's approach to retention of jurisdiction on remedial orders including on long-term reform and the orders requested from the parties in 2022 CHRT 8. However, it does not go as far as supporting removing compensation entitlements to victims/survivors that were vindicated in Tribunal orders subsequently affirmed by the Federal Court. Even in the absence of a Federal Court decision, once the Tribunal has made compensation entitlements orders to victims/survivors, it cannot disentitle them absent a Federal Court order to do so for unreasonableness.

B. The Tribunal's retained jurisdiction on the compensation issue and the issues of functus officio and finality of its orders [163] The Tribunal is not functus to consider if the FSA fully satisfies the Tribunal's orders and finds it substantially but not fully satisfies the Tribunal's orders.

[164] As it will be demonstrated below, the Panel remained seized of all its compensation orders to ensure effective implementation of its orders.

[165] Further, the Panel is not barred by the Federal Court decision from reviewing the FSA in order to consider if the FSA fully satisfies the Tribunal's orders.

[166] From 2019 to 2022 the Tribunal issued a series of rulings on the issue of compensation. We will look at them in turn and highlight some portions that are relevant to this motion.

[167] The first compensation ruling also called by the parties as the Compensation Entitlement Decision is 2019 CHRT 39. This decision is extensive and focuses on the evidence of harm, pain and suffering to First Nations children and families and the government's actions which were found to be devoid of caution. The CHRA is structured in a way where the remedies are at the discretion of the Tribunal Member(s) once the complaint is substantiated. There are many cases where discrimination has been found and no special compensation was awarded. This stems from the fact that the evidence of conduct that is devoid of caution must be established on a balance of probabilities. In some cases, this may not be found by the Tribunal. In this case, the Panel provided extensive reasons to support its findings of fact and legal conclusions. All the other compensation rulings follow the same reasoning found in the Compensation Entitlement Decision. The quantum of compensation awarded was also established at the Complainants' request, including the AFN who was mandated by the Chiefs-in-Assembly to seek the maximum compensation amounts under the *CHRA (*see AFN directed by the Chiefs in Assembly resolution no.85/2018). The Tribunal agreed and also ensured that victims/survivors who desire to obtain more than the maximum amount of compensation under the CHRA could do so through other recourses. Of note, the AFN welcomed the Compensation Entitlement Decision and also defended it in Federal Court. The Federal Court agreed with the AFN, the Caring Society and the Commission. The decision was found to be reasonable. As will be evident in reviewing the compensation decisions, the quantum for compensation was established in the first compensation decision and was never revisited throughout the series of rulings. What was asked following the Compensation Entitlement Decision was to clarify and add entitlements, not remove them, based on the evidence and to clarify definitions. The balance of the requests was for the purpose of establishing a compensation process, trust funds and the approval of a framework for compensation.

[168] At the beginning, of the first compensation ruling, the Tribunal provided reasons and set the table for the compensation process:

> [258] The Panel in considering access to justice, efficiency and expeditiousness has opted for the above orders to avoid a case-by-case assessment of degrees of pain and suffering for each child, parent or grandparent referred to in the orders above. As stated by the NAN, there is no perfect solution on this issue, the Panel agrees. The difficulty of the task at hand does not justify denying compensation to victims/survivors. In recognizing that the maximum of $20,000 is warranted for any of the situations described above, the case-by-case analysis of pain and suffering is avoided and it is attributed to a vulnerable group of victims/survivors who as exemplified by the evidence in this case have suffered as a result of the systemic racial discrimination. Some children and parents or grandparents may have suffered more than others however, the compensation remedies are capped under the CHRA and the Panel cannot award more than the maximum allowed even if it is a small amount in comparison to the degree of harm and of racial discrimination experienced by the First Nations children and their families. The maximum compensation awarded is considered justifiable for any child or adult being part of the groups identified in the orders above.

[259] This type of approach to compensation is similar to the Common Experience Payment compensation in the IRSSA outlined above. The Common Experience Payment recognized that the experience of living at an Indian Residential School had impacted all students who attended these institutions. The CEP compensated all former students who attended for the emotional abuse suffered, the loss of family life, the loss of language, culture, etc. (see Affidavit of Mr. Jeremy Kolodziej's dated April 4 2019 at, para. 10).

[260] The Panel prefers AFN's request that compensation be paid to victims directly following an appropriate process instead of being paid in a fund where First Nations children and families could access services and healing activities to alleviate some of the effects of the discrimination they experienced. The Panel is not objecting to a trust fund per se, rather it objects that the compensation be paid in a trust fund to finance services and healing activities in lieu of financial compensation as suggested by the Caring Society. Such meaningful activities should be offered by Canada however, not in replacement of financial compensation to victims/survivors. Financial compensation belongs to the victims/survivors who are the ones who should be empowered to decide for themselves on how best to use this financial compensation.

[261] However, the Panel also acknowledges the Caring Society's argument that it is not appropriate to pay $40,000 to a 3-year-old. Therefore, there is a need to establish a process where the children who are under 18 or 21 years old have the compensation paid to them secured in a fund that would be accessible upon reaching majority.

[262] In terms of Jordan's Principle, many children who were denied services and who are still living with their parents could have the compensation funds administered by their parents or grandparents until the age of majority.

[263] For all the other children who have no parents, grandparents or responsible adult family members and who are underage, a trust fund could be an option amongst others that should be part of the discussions referred to below.

> [264] Special protections for mentally disabled children and parents or grandparents who abuse substances that may affect their judgment should be considered in the process.
>
> [265] It would be preferable that the social benefits of victims/survivors not be affected by compensation remedies. This can form part of the process for compensation discussions.
>
> [266] The possibility for individual victims/survivors to opt-out should form part of this compensation process.
>
> [267] Given that the parties and interested parties in this case are all First Nations except the Commission and the AGC and, that they all have different views on the appropriate definition of a First Nations child in this case, it is paramount that this form part of the discussions on the process for compensation. The Panel reiterates that it recognizes the First Nations human rights and Indigenous rights of self-determination and self-governance.
>
> [268] If a trust fund and/or committee is proposed, it may be valuable to also include non-political members on the trust fund and/or committee such as adult victims/survivors, Indigenous women, elders, grandmothers, etc.
>
> [269] Additionally, the Panel recognizes the need for a culturally safe process to locate the victims/survivors identified above namely, First Nations children and their parents or grandparents. The process needs to respect their rights and their privacy. The Indian registry and Jordan's Principle process and record are tools amongst other possible tools to assist in locating victims/survivors. There is also a need to establish an independent process for distributing the compensation to the victims/survivors. The AFN and the Caring Society have both expressed an interest to assist in that regard. Therefore, Canada shall enter into discussions with the AFN and the Caring Society on this issue. The Commission and the interested parties should be consulted in this process however, they are not ordered to participate if they decide not to. The Panel is not making a final determination on the process here rather, it will allow parties to discuss possible options and return to the Tribunal with propositions if any, no later than December 10, 2019. The Panel will then consider those propositions and make a determination on the appropriate process to locate victims/survivors and to distribute compensation. (emphasis added).
> [270] As part of the compensation process consultation, the Panel welcomes any comment/suggestion and request for clarification from any party in regards to moving forward with the compensation process and/or the wording and/or content of the orders. For example, if categories of victims/survivors should be further detailed and new categories added. (2019 CHRT 39)

[169] This clearly indicates that the Tribunal did not recognize that it was functus on the issue of compensation or that all orders were complete. Notably, however, the question of quantum of compensation was never up for discussion and no suggestion was made by the Tribunal or the parties to modify the quantum of compensation or to reduce or disentitle categories already recognized by the Tribunal in its compensation orders. In fact, this aspect was final and supported by findings and reasons and sent a strong deterrent message to Canada and a message of hope to the victims/survivors whose rights were vindicated by those findings and corresponding orders. Further, the Tribunal's reasons illustrate the significant difference between systemic human rights remedies and those flowing from tort law. The Tribunal noted the important purpose of individual compensation for victims of discrimination:

> was necessary to deter the reoccurrence of the discriminatory practice or of similar ones, and more importantly to validate the victims/survivors' hurtful experience resulting from the discrimination.
> (2019 CHRT 39 at para 14).

[170] Indeed, in the Compensation Entitlement Decision, 2019 CHRT 39, at para. 206, the Tribunal also made clear that its obligations are to safeguard the human rights of the victims/survivors it identified, irrespective of any proposed class proceedings:

> The fact that a class action has been filed does not change the Tribunal's obligations under the Act to remedy discrimination and if applicable, as it is here, to provide a deterrent and discourage those who discriminate, to provide meaningful systemic and individual remedies to a group of vulnerable First Nations children and their families who are victims/survivors in this case.

[171] More recently, the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal, made significant comments in Disability Rights Coalition v. Nova Scotia (Attorney General), 2021 NSCA 70, regarding the important societal purpose of deterrence in cases involving government behaviour:

> [254] In Vancouver (City) v. Ward, 2010 SCC 27 ("Ward") the Supreme Court of Canada cited the critical role that deterrence plays in arriving at damage awards against governments to compensate for rights violations. Deterrence is a real, necessary and significant factor:
>
> > [29] […] Deterrence, like vindication, has a societal purpose. Deterrence seeks to regulate government behaviour, generally, in order to achieve compliance with the Constitution. […] Similarly, deterrence as an object of Charter damages is not aimed at deterring the specific wrongdoer, but rather at influencing government behaviour in order to secure state compliance with the Charter in the future.

> [256] In Walsh, the Alberta Court of Appeal also commented on the importance of an award acting as a deterrent against future discriminatory conduct:
>
> > [31] Human rights legislation must be accorded a broad and purposive interpretation having regard to its fundamental purpose: to recognize and affirm that all persons are equal in dignity and rights and to protect against and compensate for discrimination. In addition to compensating victims of discrimination, the remedial authority under human rights legislation serves another important societal goal: to prevent future discrimination by acting as both a deterrent and an educational tool: Robichaud v. Brennan, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 84 (S.C.C.).
> >
> > [32] Damage awards that do not provide for appropriate compensation can minimize the serious nature of the discrimination, undermine the mandate and principles that are the foundation of human rights legislation, and further marginalize a complainant. Inadequate awards can have the unintended but very real effect of perpetuating aspects of discriminatory conduct.
> >
> > [33] Human rights tribunals recognize that both pecuniary and non-pecuniary, or general, damages can and should be awarded in appropriate cases.
>
> [257] We are of the view that the Board erred in failing to take into account the deterrent impact of any damage award that it might make, (emphasis added).

[172] The Panel also awarded interest on compensation in the Compensation Entitlement Decision which reinforces the finality of the quantum of compensation awarded.

> [274] Subject to the rules made under section 48.9, an order to pay compensation under this section may include an award of interest at a rate and for a period that the member or panel considers appropriate.
>
> [275] As such, the Panel grants interest on the compensation awarded, at the current Bank of Canada rate, as follows:
>
> [276] The compensation for pain and suffering and special compensation includes an award of interest for the same periods covered in the above orders. This approach was used by the Tribunal in the past (see for example, Grant v. Manitoba Telecom Services Inc., 2012 CHRT 20 at, para. 21).
>

[173] This being said, the Panel agrees with Canada and the AFN that the Federal Court in affirming the Tribunal's orders found the Tribunal had made reasonable decisions within the range of different reasonable outcomes. This is not to be understood that once final orders on compensation quantum and categories of victims/survivors have been made, they can later be changed to accommodate a settlement that reduces or removes some entitlements to include others within a fixed amount of money. This exercise may be reasonable when orders have not yet been made. The agreement occurred after the evidence-based findings and orders were made confirming compensation entitlement to categories of victims/survivors by this Tribunal. This important fact is determinative in considering the FSA. The Tribunal was open to adding people which is exactly what the FSA does and on this point the Tribunal is very pleased.

[174] However, the Tribunal never envisioned reducing compensation quantum or disentitling the victims/survivors who have already been recognized before the Tribunal through evidence-based findings in previous rulings. The difficulty would not have occurred but for the fixed amount of $20 billion that Canada offered, which forced First Nations to make difficult choices. We will return to this aspect below.

[175] The request that the Tribunal approve the FSA would have been entirely different and more appropriate if the FSA had been presented to the Tribunal before the Tribunal had issued its orders or if the FSA included all victims/survivors covered by the Tribunal's orders.

[176] The compensation process continues at this time and the Tribunal foresaw that the parties could appear before the Tribunal to seek clarifications and further orders on process and implementation. An example of seeking clarification is when the parties' different interpretation of the Tribunal's orders impacts the implementation of the orders.

[177] Now the Tribunal has made entitlement orders upheld by the Federal Court. The Tribunal's decision remains untouched at this time. It is open to the parties to come back before the Tribunal for the implementation phase.

[178] Moreover, the parties could not contract out or ask the Tribunal to amend its evidence-based findings establishing systemic racial discrimination and related orders in the Merit Decision to a finding that there never was racial discrimination and, therefore, no remedy is required. In the same vein, if evidence-based findings are made that victims/survivors have suffered and should be compensated, the parties cannot contract out or ask the Tribunal to amend its previous evidence-based findings and related orders to a finding that certain victims/survivors entitled by this Tribunal have not suffered and should no longer receive compensation.

[179] This is significantly different than asking the Tribunal to make a finding based on new evidence presented that demonstrates that some aspects of the discrimination found by this Tribunal has ceased in compliance with the injunction-like order made by this Panel to cease the discriminatory practice or that some amendment requests may enhance the Tribunal's previous orders to eliminate discrimination (2022 CHRT 8). The Tribunal's retention of jurisdiction is to ensure its orders are effectively implemented. This includes not narrowing its orders (see for example Jordan's Principle definition in 2017 CHRT 14) and eliminating the discrimination found in a complex nation-wide case involving First Nations from all regions. This is done through reporting, motions, clarification requests, etc. and findings are made on the evidence.

[180] Moreover, in 2022 CHRT 8, the Tribunal accepted to make a finding based on the evidence, its previous findings and orders to amend its orders to establish an end date for compensation:

> Pursuant to 2019 CHRT 39 at paragraphs 245, 248, 249 and 254, establish March 31, 2022, as the end date for compensation for removed First Nations children and their parents/caregiving grandparents
> (2022 CHRT 8 at para. 172.9).

[181] Of note, this finding was made on the evidence presented that linked the increased sustainable prevention funding and community-based programs with the ceasing of removals of children from their homes, families and communities:

> [149] The above findings demonstrate the need for culturally appropriate and safe prevention services that address the key drivers resulting in First Nations children entering care and the need for adequately funded and sustainable prevention services that are tailored to the distinct needs of First Nations children, families and communities.
> [150] The elimination of the mass removal of children is achievable when a real shift is made from reactive services that bring children into care to preventive services, especially when prevention services are developed and delivered by the First Nations children's respective First Nations communities.

> The evidence provided by the parties demonstrates that this shift will be made possible with the April 1, 2022 implementation of increased prevention funds provided to First Nations and First Nations child and family service providers across Canada.
>
> [151] Finally, the consent orders discussed above are in line with the Panel's findings and orders. The Panel believes the full and timely implementation of those orders will significantly improve the lives of First Nations children, families and communities.
> (2022 CHRT 8)

[182] The Panel agrees with Canada that this is not the first time the Tribunal has significantly amended an order, as demonstrated by the order in 2022 CHRT 8 discussed above. Although consent is not a precondition to jurisdiction, both the Commission and the Caring Society agreed that the Tribunal had the authority to make that order. The 2022 CHRT 8 order made substantive changes to this Tribunal's previous orders. It ordered Canada to fund post-majority care at actual costs; fund additional research by the Institute of Fiscal Studies and Democracy; fund prevention measures on an ongoing basis at $2500, adjusted for inflation, per person for those persons on reserve and in the Yukon; and, finally, it set March 31, 2022, as the end date for compensation for removed children and their caregiving parents and grandparents.

[183] The Panel finds that the 2022 CHRT 8 amendments clearly are in line with the retained jurisdiction to ensure discrimination is eliminated and does not reoccur.

[184] The preceding example supports the fact that the Tribunal had retained jurisdiction to ensure effective implementation of its orders. The Tribunal expanded its orders and amended its orders to establish an end date for compensation based on the evidence provided that removals of children from their communities are being eliminated through sustainable and adequately funded community-led and developed programs.

[185] Moreover, to determine if the Tribunal can amend its orders, one needs to look at the nature of the amendments sought and the evidence supporting the amendments. Furthermore, a close look at the orders linked to the findings and reasons is necessary to determine if the nature of the amendments sought is permissible.

[186] Following the Compensation Entitlement Decision, the Tribunal issued another ruling, 2020 CHRT 7, explaining the nature and purpose of the Tribunal's retention of jurisdiction:

> [51] The Panel in its Compensation Decision, has clearly left the orders open to possible amendments in case any party, including Canada, wanted to add or clarify categories of victims/survivors or wording amendments to the ruling similar to the process related to the Tribunal's ruling in 2018 CHRT 4 and also informed by the process surrounding the Tribunal's rulings in 2017 CHRT 14 and 2017 CHRT 35. While this practice is rare, in this specific ground-breaking and complex case it is beneficial and also acknowledges the importance of the parties' input and expertise in regards to the effectiveness of the Panel's orders, (emphasis added).
>
> [52] The Panel explicitly retained jurisdiction over compensation (see Compensation Decision at para. 277), including on a number of issues as part of the compensation process consultation, welcoming any comments, suggestions and requests for clarification from any party in regards to moving forward with the compensation process and the wording or content of the orders. For example, whether the categories of victims/survivors should be further specified or new categories added (see Compensation Decision at para. 270), (emphasis added).
>
> [53] This is a clear indication that the Panel was open to suggestions for possible modifications of the Compensation Decision Order, welcoming comments and suggestions from any party. The Panel originally chose the January 1, 2006 and December 2007 cut-off dates following the Caring Society's requests in its last compensation submissions with the understanding that the evidence before the Tribunal supported those dates and also supported earlier dates as well. Considering this, instead of making orders above what was requested, the Panel opted for an order including the possibility of making amendments or further compensation orders. The Panel was mindful that parties upon discussion of the compensation orders and process may wish to add or further specify categories of compensation beneficiaries. This process is complex and requires flexibility, (emphasis added).
>
>
> [74] The Panel relies on its Compensation Decision Order in 2019 CHRT 39 and adds the following further orders:
> [75] Canada is ordered to pay compensation under s. 53(2)(e) pain and suffering ($20,000) and s. 53(3) wilful and reckless discriminatory practice ($20,000) to First Nations children living on reserve and in the Yukon Territory, who were removed from their homes and taken into care for compensable reasons prior to or on January 1, 2006 and remained in care on January 1, 2006, per the Tribunal's Compensation Decision Order.

> [76] Canada is also ordered to pay compensation under s. 53(2)(e) pain and suffering ($20,000) and s. 53(3) wilful and reckless discriminatory practice ($20,000) to First Nations parents or caregiving grandparents living on reserve and in the Yukon Territory of First Nations children living on reserve and in the Yukon Territory, who were removed from their homes and were taken into care for compensable reasons prior to or on January 1, 2006 and remained in care on January 1, 2006, per the Tribunal's Compensation Decision Order.
>
> [151] The Panel relies on its Compensation Decision Order in 2019 CHRT 39 and adds the following further order:
> [152] Canada is ordered to pay compensation under s. 53(2)(e) pain and suffering ($20,000) and s. 53(3) wilful and reckless discriminatory practice ($20,000) to the estates of all First Nations children and parents or caregiving grandparents who have died after suffering discriminatory practices described in the Compensation Decision Order, including the referenced period in the Order above mentioned in Question 2.

[187] Again, none of the reasons above support a compensation disentitlement or a reduction of quantum. Rather, they support adding and clarifying orders, not removing entitlements. The quantum in the Compensation Entitlement Decision is also followed in the added orders. This reinforces the finality of the quantum orders. In adding more beneficiaries entitled to compensation, the amounts of compensation already ordered are applied to them in the same manner. No request was made by the AFN to reduce the amounts of compensation to those added categories. In fact, the AFN and the Caring Society argued to add them as forming part of the Tribunal's previous compensation orders. The Tribunal examined the evidence and submissions and made findings justifying the additional orders.

[188] Further, the Tribunal's willingness to clarify compensation entitlements and the possibility of adding, not removing, beneficiaries in light of the evidence presented is clear:

> [154] Furthermore, the Panel requests submissions on this point and, on whether First Nations children living on reserve or off-reserve who, as a result of Canada's racial discrimination found in this case, experienced a gap, delay and/or denial of services, were deprived of essential services and were removed and placed in out-of-home care in order to access services prior to December 12, 2007 or on December 12, 2007 and their parents or caregiving grandparents living on reserve or off-reserve should receive compensation. The Panel also requests submissions on whether First Nations children living on reserve or off-reserve who were not removed from the home but experienced a gap, delay and/or denial of services, were deprived of essential > services as a result of the discrimination found in this case prior to December 12, 2007 or on December 12, 2007 and their parents or caregiving grandparents living on reserve or off-reserve should be compensated.

> [155] The Panel will establish a schedule for parties to make submissions on the questions and comments identified in the two preceding paragraphs.
>
> [156] Additionally, the interested parties, the Chiefs of Ontario and the Nishnawbe Aski Nation have requested further amendments to the compensation orders to broaden the compensation orders to include off-reserve First Nations children and to include a broader class of caregivers reflecting caregiving practices in many First Nations communities including aunties, uncles, cousins, older siblings, or other family members/kin who were acting in a primary caregiving role, amongst other things. The Panel has questions for the interested parties and parties on these issues. The Panel will establish a schedule for parties to make submissions on the Panel's questions and will make a determination once the questions are fully answered. Depending on the outcome, the Panel may further amend the compensation orders. (emphasis added).
>
> [157] The Panel retains jurisdiction until the issue of the process for compensation has been resolved by consent order or otherwise and will then revisit the need for further retention of jurisdiction on the issue of compensation. This does not affect the Panel's retention of jurisdiction on other issues in this case.
>

[189] In a subsequent ruling, 2020 CHRT 15, the Panel referred to its previous compensation orders and quantum when asked to broaden its order and provide clarifications:

> [2] In the Compensation Decision, Canada was ordered to pay compensation in the amount of $40,000 to victims of Canada's discriminatory practices under the First Nations Child and Family Services Program (FNCFS program) and Jordan's Principle. This Panel ordered Canada to enter into discussions with the Assembly of First Nations (AFN) and the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada (Caring Society) and to consult with the Canadian Human Rights Commission (Commission) and the interested parties, the Chiefs of Ontario (COO) and the Nishnawbe Aski Nation (NAN), to co-develop a culturally safe compensation process framework including a process to locate the victims/survivors identified in the Tribunal's decision, namely First Nations children and their parents or grandparents. The parties were given a mandate to explore possible options for the compensation process framework and return to the Tribunal. The AFN, the Caring Society and Canada have jointly indicated that many of the COO, the NAN and the Commission's suggestions were incorporated into the Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan. The Panel believes that this is a positive outcome.

> [3] However, some elements of the Draft Compensation Framework are not agreed upon by all parties and interested parties. In particular the two interested parties, the COO and the NAN, made additional requests to broaden the scope of the Compensation Decision orders with which the other parties did not agree, as it will be explained below. Further, the COO and the NAN made a number of specific requests for amendments to the Draft Compensation Framework. The NAN's requests mainly focus on remote First Nations communities, some of which will be discussed below. This reflects the complexity of this case in many regards. The Panel is especially mindful that each First Nation is unique and has specific needs and expertise. The Panel's work is attentive to the inherent rights of self-determination and of self-governance of First Nations which are also important human rights. When First Nations parties and interested parties in this case present competing perspectives and ask this Tribunal to prefer their strategic views over those of their First Nations friends, it does add complexity in determining the matter. Nevertheless, the Panel believes that all the parties and interested parties' views are important, valuable and enrich the process. This being said, it is one thing for this Panel to make innovative decisions yet, it is another to choose between different First Nations' perspectives. However, a choice needs to be made and the Panel agrees with the joint Caring Society, AFN, and Canada submissions and the AFN's additional submissions on caregivers which will be explained below. At this point, the Panel's questions have now been answered and the Panel is satisfied with the proposed Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan and will not address all of the interested parties' suggestions that were not accepted by the other parties (i.e. the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada) ordered to work on the Draft Compensation Framework. The Panel will address the contentious issue involving specific definitions including some suggestions from the NAN concerning remote First Nations communities and two substantial requests from the COO and the NAN to broaden the scope of compensation below. For the reasons set out below, the Panel agrees with the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada's position on the COO and the NAN's requests.

[190] The Tribunal's retention of jurisdiction allowed it to address wording clarifications related to the compensation orders:

> [4] Discussions between Canada, the AFN and the Caring Society on a compensation scheme commenced on January 7, 2020. The discussions resulting in the Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan have been productive, and the parties have been able to agree on how to resolve most issues. At this point, there remains disagreement on three important definitions on which the parties cannot find common ground. These definitions are "essential service", "service gap" and "unreasonable delay". While the Panel is not imposing the specific wording for the definitions, the Panel > provides reasons and guidance to assist the parties in finalizing those definitions as it will be explained below.

>

[191] The compensation process was viewed by the parties as follows and the Tribunal agreed:

> [5] The Caring Society, the AFN and Canada wish to clarify the proposed process for the completion of the Tribunal's orders on compensation. As the AGC outlined in its April 30, 2020 letter, the Complainants and the Respondent are submitting the Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan for the Tribunal's approval in principle. Once the Tribunal releases its decision on the outstanding Compensation Process matters, the Draft Compensation Framework will be adjusted to reflect said orders and will undergo a final copy edit to ensure consistency in terms. The Complainants and the Respondent will then consider the document final and will provide a copy to the Tribunal to be incorporated into its final order. The Panel agrees with this proposed process.

[192] In light of the above, the Tribunal approved the Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan "in principle" and discussed the opt out provision:

> [12] The Panel has studied the Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan alongside all the parties', including interested parties', submissions and requests. The Panel approves the Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan "in principle", with the exception of the issues addressed below. The "in principle" approval should be understood in the context that this framework is not yet finalized and that the parties will modify this Draft Compensation Framework and Draft Notice Plan to reflect the Panel's reasons and orders on the outstanding issues regarding compensation. The Draft Compensation Framework, Draft Notice Plan and the accompanying explanations in the joint Caring Society, AFN and Canada submissions provide the foundation for a Nation-wide compensation process. The opt-out provision in the Draft Compensation Framework addresses the right of any beneficiary to renounce compensation under this process and pursue other recourses should they opt to do so. The opt-out provision protects the rights of people who disagree with this process and who prefer to follow other paths. The Panel expects that the parties will file a final Draft Compensation Framework and final Draft Notice Plan seeking a consent order from this Tribunal.

[193] The Tribunal's orders in 2020 CHRT 20 and 2020 CHRT 36 have impacted the compensation entitlement in broadening the categories of victims once the Tribunal had clarified the First Nation children who are recognized by their Nation are eligible under Jordan's Principle.

[194] Again, none of the above findings support a reduction of quantum or a disentitlement of compensation for any category of victims/survivors recognized in the Tribunal's orders.

[195] None of the orders entertain or envision a disentitlement of compensation once orders have been made. On the contrary, the Tribunal ensured the victims/survivors could opt out and/or also pursue other recourses to obtain more compensation if they so desired. The Tribunal had discussions with parties on expanding, not removing, categories of beneficiaries. However, the parties submitted adding beneficiaries may jeopardize the entire compensation process:

> [10] The NAN also made submissions in favour of such broadened compensation orders as described above. However, upon consideration, the Panel does not want to jeopardize the compensation process as a whole.

[196] The Tribunal was cautioned by the AFN to reject the NAN's requests to expand compensation. The AFN feared that it would jeopardize the compensation process. The Tribunal agreed with the AFN.

[197] Moreover, the Tribunal's retention of jurisdiction on compensation was necessary given the Tribunal's supervisory role in the compensation process. As it will be further demonstrated below, the same can be said about the compensation payment process under the Compensation Framework once the guide is finalized by the parties.

[198] Of note, Canada itself viewed the compensation orders as final and argued against reopening those orders:

> [9] Canada argues that their comments on the temporal scope above do not suggest a reopening of these compensation orders under Jordan's Principle. Additionally, Canada submits that the complaint mentioned Jordan's Principle and did not mention services prior to the adoption of Jordan's Principle in December 2007.

> [176] The Panel retains jurisdiction until the process for compensation issue has been resolved by consent order or otherwise and will then revisit the need for further retention of jurisdiction on the issue of compensation. This does not affect the Panel's retention of jurisdiction on other issues in this case.
>

[199] In 2021 CHRT 6, the Tribunal addressed its retention of jurisdiction as follows:

> [135] The Tribunal retains jurisdiction on all its compensation orders including the approval and implementation of the Compensation Process. The Tribunal's retention of jurisdiction in relation to the compensation issue does not affect the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction on any other aspects of the case for which the Panel continues to retain jurisdiction.

[200] Further, the Tribunal also discussed the retention of jurisdiction on the compensation issue in 2021 CHRT 7:

> [41] The Panel retains jurisdiction on all its Compensation orders including the order in this ruling and will revisit its retention of jurisdiction as the Panel sees fit in light of the upcoming evolution of this case or once the individual claims for compensation have been completed.

[201] The retention of jurisdiction read with the reasons in 2021 CHRT 7 make clear that the retention of jurisdiction at this point is for the implementation of the compensation orders and processing of claims under the Framework for the Payment of Compensation (Compensation Framework) under 2019 CHRT 39 and accompanying schedules. This was necessary given the Tribunal's supervisory role in the payment of compensation:

> [27] The Draft Compensation Framework includes provisions for processing claims. The process involves a multi-level review and appeal process (9.1-9.6). The process remains under the ultimate supervision of the Tribunal (9.6).
>

[202] Section 9.6 of the Compensation Framework reads as follows:

> 9.6. Potential beneficiaries denied compensation can request the second-level review committee to reconsider the decision if new information that is relevant to the decision is provided, or appeal to an appeals body composed of individuals agreed to by the Parties and hosted by the Central Administrator. The appeals body will be non-political and independent of the > federal public service. The Parties agree that decisions of the appeals body may be subject to further review by the Tribunal. The reconsideration and appeals process will be fully articulated in the Guide.

[203] Under the Compensation Framework, the Tribunal may review the decision of the appeals body to ensure its compensation orders are properly interpreted and followed by the appeals body.

[204] In 2021 CHRT 7, the Panel examined the Framework for the Payment of Compensation under 2019 CHRT 39 and accompanying schedules as detailed in the Draft Compensation Framework filed on December 23, 2020.

[205] The Panel carefully examined the parties' Framework for the Payment of Compensation under 2019 CHRT 39 and accompanying schedules as detailed in the Draft Compensation Framework filed on December 23, 2020 to ensure this was in line with its orders. Otherwise, the Panel would have asked questions and requested adjustments. While the Panel's orders prevailed, the compensation process needed to reflect the Tribunal's reasons and orders in order to be approved by the Tribunal.

[206] The Panel found the Draft Compensation Framework to be in line with its previous orders which speaks to the analysis conducted by this Tribunal on the issue of compensation and the continuity of 2019 CHRT 39:

> [33] The Panel reviewed the Draft Compensation Framework submitted on December 23, 2020 and acknowledges it contains the appropriate changes reflecting the Panel's recent compensation rulings.
>
> (2021 CHRT 7, emphasis added).
>
> [37] After careful consideration of the specifics of this consent order request, which is summarized above, the Panel finds that the consent order sought is appropriate and just in light of the specific facts of the case, the evidence presented, its previous orders and the specifics of the consent order sought.
>
> (2021 CHRT 7, emphasis added).

[207] The parties themselves understood the need for consistency with the Tribunal's orders and that they could not deviate from these orders even if on consent:

> 1.2. The Framework is intended to be consistent with the Tribunal's Compensation Entitlement Order. Where there are discrepancies between this Framework and the Compensation Entitlement Order, or such further > orders from the Tribunal as may be applicable, those orders will prevail and remain binding.

>
> (Compensation Framework, emphasis added).

[208] The parties only completed the Compensation Framework once the Tribunal had made orders on contentious and outstanding questions on eligibility for compensation as explained above and other clarifications.

> 1.3. The Framework is intended to facilitate and expedite the payment of compensation to the beneficiaries described in the Compensation Entitlement Order, as amended by subsequent Tribunal decisions.
>
> (Compensation Framework, emphasis added).

[209] This is also reflected in the Framework for example, section 4.2.5.

> "First Nations child" means a child who:
>
> > a) was registered or eligible to be registered under the Indian Act;
> >
> > b) had one parent/guardian who is registered or eligible to be registered
> >
> > under the Indian Act;

[210] This reflects the Tribunal's orders in 2020 CHRT 20.

[211] The compensation orders are reflected in the Compensation Framework in many areas. For example, the parties requested the Tribunal's clarification on specific definitions such as "Essential service", "Service gap", "Unreasonable delay" and "confirmed need" prior to finalizing the Compensation Framework:

> 4.2.3.1. For purposes of s. 4.2.2. "confirmed needed" and "recommended by a professional" must be interpreted as per 4.2.2.2.
> (Compensation Framework)

[212] The Tribunal viewed the Compensation Framework as now forming part of its orders and agreed to issue a consent order. Consent orders, while more flexible given the parties' agreement, are still subject to section 53 of the CHRA and once issued are part of the Tribunal's orders. They must be implemented and are not recommendations or aspirational documents.

[213] Of note, the Tribunal analyzed and made findings on the Compensation Framework in 2021 CHRT 7 in order to approve it. This is made clear when reading the ruling. For example, 2021 CHRT 7 states:

> [22] Section 4 stipulates which First Nations children and caregivers are eligible for compensation. It addresses children who were necessarily or unnecessarily removed from their families (4.2.1). In relation to Jordan's Principle, it outlines what constitutes an essential service, service gap, and unreasonable delay (4.2.2). It defines the meaning of the term First Nations child in the context of compensation (4.2.5). Generally, a First Nations child includes a child who is registered or eligible to be registered under the Indian Act, has a parent who is registered or eligible to be registered under the Indian Act, is recognized by their First Nation for the purpose of Jordan's Principle, or was ordinarily resident on a reserve or in a community with a self-government agreement (4.2.5).
> [23] Section 5 outlines various provisions to locate and identify eligible beneficiaries.

[214] This is an example of the Tribunal reviewing the Compensation Framework and highlighting specific parts of the Compensation Framework. It is clear when reading all the compensation rulings in order including the last ruling approving the Compensation Framework that the approved Compensation Framework was found to be in line with the Tribunal's orders:

> 4. Definitions of Beneficiaries
>
> 4.1. A "beneficiary" of compensation is a person, living or deceased, described at paras. 245-257 of the Compensation Entitlement Order, as expanded by the Tribunal's decision in 2020 CHRT 7, at paras 125-129.
>
> (Compensation Framework)

[215] The parties themselves described the Tribunal's decision in 2019 CHRT 39 as the Compensation Entitlement Decision and acknowledged it was further expanded in 2020 CHRT 7.

[216] After its analysis, the Tribunal found:

> [19] The purpose of the Draft Compensation Framework is to "facilitate and expedite payment of compensation" to beneficiaries (1.3). It is intended to be consistent with, and subordinate to, the Tribunal's orders (1.2).
>
> (2021 CHRT 7, emphasis added).
>
>
> [40] Pursuant to section 53 of the CHRA and its previous rulings, the Tribunal approves the Framework for the Payment of Compensation under 2019 CHRT 39 along with accompanying schedules as submitted by the parties on December 23, 2020. The Tribunal will make the Framework available to the public upon request.
> (2021 CHRT 7, emphasis added)

[217] This is not the first time the Tribunal is being asked to challenge eligibility to previous compensation orders. NAN requested an amendment to the Draft Compensation Framework to change the time period for which First Nations children would be eligible for Jordan's Principle compensation. The Tribunal answered it could no longer do so:

> [16] In 2021 CHRT 6, released February 11, 2021, the Tribunal addressed the approach for compensating victims/survivors who are legally unable to manage their own finances. The Tribunal determined that it was appropriate and within the Tribunal's legal authority to approve a compensation regime where an Appointed Trustee, as defined in the Draft Compensation Framework, would manage the compensation funds for victims/survivors who lack the legal capacity to do so themselves. Further, the Tribunal rejected a request by NAN to challenge the eligibility criteria for compensation given the Tribunal had already ruled on the issue and upheld the scope of compensation payments set out in the Draft Compensation Framework.
> (2021 CHRT 7, emphasis added)

[218] Of note, the Tribunal's title in 2021 CHRT 6 explains the intent of the ruling: Compensation Process Ruling on Four Outstanding Issues in Order to Finalize the Draft Compensation Framework. (emphasis added).

[219] At paragraph [6], the Tribunal wrote:

> [6] … This ruling provides the reasons contemplated in the Panel's December 14, 2020 letter. Following this letter ruling, the parties were able to finalize the Draft Compensation Framework and, on December 23, 2020 they submitted > the final version to obtain a final consent order on the issue of the compensation process.

> (2021 CHRT 6, emphasis added).

[220] A closer look to some of the submissions made by the parties and reasons from this Panel demonstrate the finality of the compensation eligibility orders:

> [110] NAN opposes section 4.2.5.2 of the Draft Compensation Framework's restriction of the timeframe of discrimination for which First Nations children who are not eligible for Indian Act status are entitled to compensation and section 4.2.5.3's restriction of these children's eligibility for compensation for wilful and reckless discrimination under section 53(3) of the CHRA. NAN opposes relying on the colonial Indian Act to differentiate categories of beneficiaries. NAN relies on its earlier submissions from March 20, 2019 on identifying First Nations children for the purpose of Jordan's Principle. NAN argues that it was always of the view that Jordan's Principle applied to all First Nations children and that Canada should have been of this view as well. NAN relies on evidence cited in Daniels v. Canada, 2013 FC 6 to demonstrate Canada's knowledge. Further, the treaty relationships, which Canada recognizes, do not allow Canada to unilaterally determine First Nations identity. Further, NAN does not find it persuasive for Canada to argue that Canada believed a provision designed to prevent jurisdictional gaps in services for First Nations children only applied to First Nations children eligible for Indian Act status. Accordingly, the Merit Decision cannot represent a clear break from the past as contemplated in Hislop. NAN argues that Canada's exclusion of First Nations children without Indian Act status was unreasonable according to the criteria established in Hislop, para. 107. In addition, NAN argues the different timeframes for which beneficiaries are entitled to compensation will complicate the process.
> [111] Canada, the AFN and the Caring Society submitted a joint response opposing NAN's request to remove sections 4.2.5.2 and 4.2.5.3 from the Draft Compensation Framework. They note that the provisions were not drafted with the intent to deny compensation to any eligible beneficiaries and that, to the extent of any inconsistency with the Tribunal's orders, section 1.2 ensures the Tribunal's orders take precedence. They argue that while NAN would prefer an earlier start date for compensation than that provided in section 4.2.5.2, the issue has already been litigated and should not be reconsidered. Canada, the AFN and the Caring Society considered it unreasonable to award damages for wilful and reckless conduct while the eligibility criteria for Jordan's Principle were unclear. They submit that while sections 4.2.5.2 and 4.2.5.3 do not precisely mirror specific language in the Tribunal's orders, any potential beneficiary who disagrees with the provisions will have an opportunity to contest them.

> [112] The Panel generally agrees with the merit of the NAN's additional submissions. Moreover, the Panel notes the NAN opposes relying on the colonial Indian Act to differentiate categories of beneficiaries.
>
> [113] However, as mentioned above, the eligibility for compensation under Jordan's Principle orders have already been argued and answered by this Tribunal. Furthermore, the Panel finds the joint response from the AFN, the Caring Society and Canada referred to in para. 111 above to be acceptable especially in light of sections 1.2 and 9.6 of the Draft Compensation Framework.
>
> [129] The Tribunal has provided a number of decisions and rulings directly addressing the victims' entitlement to compensation for discriminatory conduct. Most notably, the Merit Decision found that Canada's programs and funding discriminated against First Nations children and amounted to discriminatory conduct. In the Compensation Decision, the Tribunal found that the victims on whose behalf the complaint was brought were entitled to compensation. The Tribunal addressed the quantum of compensation and considered some general eligibility parameters such as which classes of family members were entitled to compensation. The Tribunal also recognized the value in directing the parties to negotiate further aspects of the compensation process.
> (2021 CHRT 6, emphasis added)

[221] The following paragraph also speaks to the Tribunal's view that the retention of jurisdiction on the compensation issue at this point was separate from the other issues in these proceedings:

> [42] This does not affect the Panel's retention of jurisdiction on other issues in this case.
>
> (2021 CHRT 7)

[222] Before the FSA was presented to the Tribunal for approval, the parties requested a number of consent orders and amendments to the Tribunal's previous orders.

[223] The Tribunal's ruling in 2022 CHRT 8 clearly demonstrates the analysis to determine if the requested orders are in line with the Tribunal's findings and orders and if such amendments can be made:

> (viii) Amendment to 2021 CHRT 12
>
> Order request # 8. Pursuant to 2021 CHRT 12 at paragraph 42(5), adding the following paragraph to the Tribunal's order in 2021 CHRT 12:

> [42.1] In amendment to paragraph 42(1), Canada shall, as of April 1, 2022, fund prevention/least disruptive measures for non-Agency First Nations (as defined in 2021 CHRT 12) at $2500 per person resident on reserve and in the Yukon, on the same terms as outlined in 2018 CHRT 4 at paragraph 421.1 with respect to FNCFS Agencies.

[106] On March 7, 2022, Stephanie Wellman's provided a very helpful affidavit and evidence attached. Upon review of the evidence attached to the affidavit, the Panel finds the evidence to be consistent with the affirmed declaration. Stephanie Wellman indicates that:

> 70. First Nations have long advocated for adequate prevention funding for FNCFS. It has been well documented in reports, such as the Wen:de We are Coming to the Light of Day, Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples filed into the record as Exhibit HR-2, and the Joint National Policy Review (2000) filed into the record as Exhibit HR-1, that the current funding formula for the FNCFS Program inadequately invests in prevention.
>
> 71. Prevention within the FNCFS Program reform context must aim to ensure that children remain in their family and First Nation as a priority, with removal as a last resort. Prevention, including early intervention policies, must be adequately practiced and funded in each community.

[107] The Panel agrees and has considered the above-mentioned evidence and has made multiple findings in that regard, e.g. 2018 CHRT 4:

> [161] The Panel has always recognized that there may be some children in need of protection who need to be removed from their homes. However, in the [Merit] Decision, the findings highlighted the fact that too many children were removed unnecessarily, when they could have had the opportunity to remain at home with prevention services.

[108] Stephanie Wellman also affirms prevention "must be developed and mobilized to the standards that communities set and at the levels that communities decide" (March 7, 2022 Affidavit at para. 71).

[109] The Panel finds this is consistent with the spirit of its rulings requiring Canada to consider the unique and distinct needs of First Nations communities and to avoid a one-size fits-all top-down approach. In 2018 CHRT 4, the Panel wrote:

> [163] The Panel has always believed that specific needs and culturally appropriate services will vary from one Nation to another and the agencies and communities are best placed to indicate what those services should look like. This does not mean accepting the unnecessary continuation of removal of the children for lack of data and accountability. While at the same > time, refusing to fund prevention on actuals resulting in, the continuation of making more investments in maintenance (emphasis added).

[110] Stephanie Wellman adds that:

> 72. Canada must consider prevention and reform within the context of First Nations social determinants of health and wellbeing, including environment, education, gender, economic opportunities, community safety, housing and infrastructure, meaningful access to culture and land, access to justice, and individual and community self-determination, among others.
>
> 73. Prevention must address the structural and systemic reasons for First Nations' higher rates of involvement with child and family services. For example, housing, water, racism, infrastructure inadequacies, poverty, etc. All these impact child and family wellbeing, and prevention must therefore encompass the systemic drivers of First Nations' overrepresentation in child and family services. Systemic change must also recognize the colonization of First Nations as a fundamental underlying health, social and economic determinant.
>
> 74. Prevention must include evidence-based primary, secondary, and tertiary culturally based programming situated in a life-course continuum: from pre-natal development to birthing, childhood, adolescence, adulthood, as Elders, and through death and post-death.

[111] The Panel entirely agrees with the above. This corroborates the evidence in this case and is in line with the Panel's findings in the Merit Decision and in 2018 CHRT 4:

> [166] It is important to remind ourselves that this is about children experiencing significant negative impacts on their lives. It is also urgent to address the underlying causes that promote removal rather than least disruptive measures (see the [Merit] Decision at paras. 341-347), (emphasis added).

[112] As explained above and in previous rulings, the Panel made clear that the discriminatory underfunding, especially the lack of funding for prevention including least disruptive measures was a big part of the issue.

[113] For example, in 2018 CHRT 4, a prevention/least disruptive measures focused ruling by this Tribunal, found (emphasis omitted):

> [93] The fundamental core of Canada's systemic discrimination is that it fails to fund First Nation Child Welfare based on need, including addressing and redressing historical disadvantages. The Panel in its decision wrote that it's "...focus is whether funding is being determined based on an evaluation of the > distinct needs and circumstances of First Nations children and families and the communities" (…).

>
> [119] The Panel finds that the current manner in which prevention funds are distributed while unlimited funds are allocated to keep children in care is harming children, families, communities and Nations in Canada.
>
>
> [150] Canada cannot justify paying enormous amounts of money for children in care when the cost is much higher than prevention programs to keep the child in the home. This is not an acceptable or sound fiscal or social policy. This is a decision made by Canada unilaterally and it is harming the children. (…), (see the Decision at paras. 262 and para. 297).
>
>
> [180] The Panel reiterates that the best interest of the child is the primary concern in decisions that affect children. See, for instance, UNCRC, article 3 and article 2 which affirm that all children should be treated fairly and protected from discrimination. (see also the [Merit] Decision at paras.447-449). The Panel found that removing children from their families as a first resort rather than a last resort was not in line with the best interests of the child. This is an important finding that was meant to inform reform and immediate relief (see the [Merit] Decision at paras 341-349).
>
> [191] The United Nations CESCR recommended that Canada review and increase its funding to family and child welfare services for Indigenous Peoples living on reserves and fully comply with the Tribunal's January 2016 [Merit] Decision. The CESCR also called on Canada to implement the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's recommendations with regards to Indian Residential Schools. (see Economic and Social Council, CESCR, concluding observations on the sixth periodic report of Canada, March 4223, 2016, E/C.12/CAN/CO/6, paras.35-36; See also Affidavit of Dr. Cindy Blackstock, December 17, 2016, at para. 33, Exhibit L).

[114] The Panel entirely agrees with this wise approach to prevention reform proposed by the parties in order to generate real and lasting systemic change. Moreover, the evidence filed supports this finding.

[115] As set out in Ms. Wellman's March 7, 2022 Affidavit:

> 76. The per capita costs are based on current prevention services and actual spending described in the case studies analyzed by the IFSD. For instance, the $2,500 per capita cost is based on a case study of K'wak'walat'si Child and Family Services (KCFS), which serves the 'Namgis First Nation and the village of Alert Bay on Cormorant Island off the coast of British Columbia. Since 2007, not a single child in 'Namgis First Nation has been placed in care. This success has been largely credited to the introduction of comprehensive prevention programming.

[116] This success story is referenced in Stephanie Wellman's affidavit and also included in the IFSD report #1, Enabling Children to Thrive filed in evidence. The report states that a case for prevention is clear from both FNCFS agency cases and from existing research. The unanimity from agencies and experts on the importance and need for a focus on prevention services and funding to match cannot be overemphasized (pp.93-94). This report is relevant and reliable especially given the methodology employed and the expert actors involved including the advisory role of the National Advisory Committee.

[117] Stephanie Wellman's affidavit continues:

> 77. These best practices in prevention are further modelled after Carrier Sekani Family Services (CSFS), a large prevention focused organization. The agency's life cycle model (from cradle to grave), informed by its own research, extends across health and social programs and services. From intensive family preservation to telehealth initiatives, CSFS has empowered its staff to innovate, try, fail, and succeed, in support of the people and communities they serve.
>
> 78. By providing a budget of $2,500 per capita for prevention, Canada would enable service providers and communities to deliver this best practice life cycle model of prevention.

[118] This is also consistent with previous findings by this Panel. In 2018 CHRT 4, the Panel said (emphasis omitted):

> [118] The orders are made in the best interests of children and are meant to reverse incentives to place children in care.
>
> [119] The Panel finds that the current manner in which prevention funds are distributed while unlimited funds are allocated to keep children in care is harming children, families, communities and Nations in Canada.
> [120] The best way to illustrate this is to reproduce Ms. Lang's answer to the AFN's question: AFN: So if every child in Ontario that's on First Nations was apprehended, INAC would pay costs for those apprehensions correct? (…) So my question is, it's kind of peculiar to me that the federal government has no qualms, no concerns whatsoever about costs of taking children into care and that's an unlimited pot, and when it comes to prevention services, they're not willing to make that same sacrifice. To me that just does not make sense. Now as a Program director, is that the case where if every child in Ontario that's First Nation on reserve is apprehended tomorrow, you would pay the maintenance costs on all those apprehensions? Ms. Lang: for eligible expenditures, yes.

[121] This is a striking example of a system built on colonial views perpetuating historical harm against Indigenous peoples, and all justified under policy. While the necessity to account for public funds is certainly legitimate it becomes troubling when used as an argument to justify the mass removal of children rather than preventing it. There is a need to shift this right now to cease discrimination. The Panel finds the seriousness and emergency of the issue is not grasped with some of Canada's actions and responses. This is a clear example of a policy that was found discriminatory and that is still perpetuating discrimination. Consequently, the Panel finds it has to intervene by way of additional orders. In further support of the Panel's finding, compelling evidence was brought in the context of the motions' proceedings.

[148] Of particular note, Wen:De Report Three recommends a new funding stream for prevention/least disruptive measures (at pp. 19-21). At page 35, Wen:De Report Three indicates that increased funding for prevention/least disruptive measures will provide costs savings over time:

> Bowlus and McKenna (2003) estimate that the annual cost of child maltreatment to Canadian society is 16 billion dollars per annum. As increasing numbers of studies indicate that First Nations children are overrepresented amongst children in care and Aboriginal children in care; they compose a significant portion of these economic costs (Trocme, Knoke and Blackstock, 2004; Trocme, Fallon, McLaurin and Shangreaux, 2005; McKenzie, 2002). A failure of governments to invest in a substantial way in prevention and least disruptive measures is a false economy – The choice is to either invest now and save later or save now and pay up to 6-7 times more later (World Health Organization, 2004.), (see 2018 CHRT 4 at. paras. 148-149 citing the Merit Decision).

> [160] This is the time to move forward and to take giants steps to reverse the incentives that bring children into care using the findings in the [Merit] Decision, previous reports, the parties' expertise and also everything gathered by Canada through its discussions since the [Merit] Decision.

[119] The 2018 CHRT 4 immediate relief orders on actuals were made in 2018 after the Caring Society and the AFN, urged the Panel to order them. The parties made compelling arguments and brought evidence to support it. The Panel indicated that the orders could be amended as the quality of information increased. The Panel recognized "that in light of its orders and the fact that data collection will be further improved in the future and the NAC's work will progress, more adjustments will need to be made as the quality of information increases." (see 2018 CHRT 4 at para. 237). This is the case here. The evidence in the record demonstrates that there is a need to amend the previous prevention orders given that a number of issues arose as part of the implementation phase of the 2018 CHRT 4 orders.

[120] Moreover, the parties were able to establish that the process for reimbursement to actuals was causing hardships for First Nations and First Nations Agencies. Dr. Blackstock has affirmed that:

> 19. … While the funding at actuals approach has been effective in ensuring more prevention services are provided to children, youth, and families, ISC determining eligible prevention expenses has been problematic particularly given the lack of social work expertise within the department.

[121] Further, Dr. Blackstock also affirmed that "the "request-based" nature of the actuals process has also posed an obstacle for some FNCFS Agencies, who may lack capacity to make the request." (March 4, 2022 affidavit at para. 19). The Tribunal finds this was previously demonstrated in these proceedings (see for example, 2020 CHRT 24 at. paras 34-36).

[122] Moreover, recent relevant and reliable evidence contained in the IFSD report #2, Funding First Nations child and family services (FNCFS): A performance budget approach to well-being, July 31, 2020 found at p. 29 that:

> The significant 48% increase in FNCFS program spending in 2018–19 is attributed to the CHRT-mandated payments (the FNCFS program spending is projected to decrease by 9% in 2019–20) …. Case study analysis suggests that the CHRT payments have had immediate impacts on programming and operations. The supplementary investments, however, are one-time payments and not guaranteed beyond the next fiscal year. This reality puts progress on prevention programming and practices at risk.

[123] The above also supports the need for greater prevention funding as per the order requests including the eligibility for these funds to be carried forward by the First Nation and/or First Nations Child and Family Service providers(s).

[124] Furthermore, Dr. Blackstock affirms that "[g]reater "up-front" funding will allow FNCFS Agencies to focus their energies and resources on program development and delivery." (March 4, 2022 affidavit at para. 19).

[125] The Panel finds the evidence supports the need for a shift from the "request-based" nature of the actuals process where ISC determines eligible prevention expenses to a comprehensive community-level programming. The implementation of these orders will provide families with supports they need and in providing First Nations, FNCFS Agencies with greater resources "up front" to begin addressing the structural risk factors that contribute to the over-representation of First Nations children in care. This will also provide greater funding to First Nations without FNCFS Agencies.

[126] The IFSD report also supports this shift.

[127] The Panel agrees and is really pleased with these order requests. The parties' hard work will generate real change for First Nations children and youth. This responds to the Tribunal's 2018 call for giant steps towards a shift.

[128] As indicated in Stephanie Wellman's March 7, 2022 Affidavit:

> 75. The $2,500 per capita level of prevention funding is based on the case studies conducted by the IFSD in its Phase 1 report, which resulted in two fundamentally different approaches to prevention programming. This ranged from a First Nation with minimal prevention programming ($800) to comprehensive community-level programming targeted to the entire community, operating on a prevention basis ($2,500). The $2,500 per capita amount is to be considered the level necessary for agencies or communities to reasonably deliver best practices in prevention.

[129] As noted in IFSD report # 2, Funding First Nations child and family services (FNCFS): A performance budget approach to well-being at p. 248:

> … In its Phase 1 study, [Enabling First Nations Children To Thrive], December 15, 2018, that costed the FNCFS system, IFSD estimated (based on actual models) that per capita expenditures for prevention should range from $800 to $2,500 across the entire community. At $800, programming is principally youth-focused and may not be CFS focused. At $2,500 per person, a full lifecycle approach to programming can be possible with linkages between health, social and development programming. …
> The First Nation's current per capita CFS expenditure estimates align to previous findings for communities unaligned to an FNCFS agency (ranging from $500 to $1,000 based on the > population source). As the First Nation contemplates its next steps in CFS, it may wish to consider increasing its per capita budget to expand its resources for program and service delivery. IFSD estimated that the average cost of a child in care to be $63,000 per year. With opportunities for prevention program that have demonstrated positive results, there are various options for supporting the well-being of children, families and communities through wrap-around holistic services.

[130] As noted in IFSD report #1, Enabling First Nations Children To Thrive these costs would be on-going in nature and subject to changes in population and inflation. Per person spending on prevention should range from $800–$2,500 with total annual costs of $224M to $708M (p. 10).

[131] The report provides further details at pages 87-88:

> Prevention was the focus of experts and agencies, and consistently defined as the most significant funding gap that agencies are facing. The gap in prevention funding is a challenge and is connected to the system's current funding structure that incentivizes the placement of children in care.
>
> Shifting to a prevention-focused approach will require increased investment and a change in funding structure, such that agencies have the ability to allocate resources to meet community need. To cost-estimate an increase in prevention funding for FNCFS agencies, benchmarks of current prevention spending were identified and a range of per capita investments in prevention were defined: $800, $2,000 and $2,500.
>
> The per capita costs are based on current prevention services and actual spending described in case studies. The prevention cost estimates are premised on the assumption that prevention should target the entire population in the agency's catchment and not only the child population served.

[132] Moreover, as defined in 2021 CHRT 12, Non-Agency communities also form part of the Tribunal's previous orders. The Panel agrees that they should also benefit from the increased ongoing prevention funding as detailed in order request # 8. As explained above, this will greatly benefit their communities.

[133] The parties were successful in demonstrating the need for the requested orders # 7 as modified and 8. The Panel entirely agrees with the order requests # 7 & 8 and finds they are justified and supported by the evidence. Furthermore, the Tribunal has the authority to make those orders as it will be explained below.

[224] Three important aspects can be drawn from this approach. First, the Tribunal always relies on evidence to support its findings and orders. Second, the Tribunal analyses if the requested orders are in line with its previous reasons, findings and orders. Third, the focus of the retention of jurisdiction is to achieve sustainable reform and long-term relief that build on short-term and long-term orders in the best interest of First Nations children and families as defined by First Nations themselves.

[225] This approach is consistent with the clearly expressed intent by the Tribunal to issue short-term, mid-term and long-term relief and for long-term relief to be informed by the short-term and mid-term phases.

[226] The Panel previously wrote in 2018 CHRT 4:

> [387] It took years for the First Nations children to get justice. Discrimination was proven. Justice includes meaningful remedies. Surely Canada understands this. The Panel cannot simply make final orders and close the file. The Panel determined that a phased approach to remedies was needed to ensure short term relief was granted first, then long term relief, and reform which takes much longer to implement. The Panel understood that if Canada took 5 years or more to reform the Program, there was a crucial need to address discrimination now in the most meaningful way possible with the evidence available now.
>
> [415] The Panel also recognizes that in light of its orders, and the fact that data collection will be further improved in the future and the NAC's work will progress, more adjustments will need to be made as the quality of information increases.

[227] The Tribunal has clearly expressed on a number of occasions that it will retain jurisdiction until sustainable long-term relief and reform has been addressed in a way that is responsive to the Tribunal's findings and role to eliminate the discrimination found and prevent its reoccurrence or similar discriminatory practices to arise. The Tribunal has always focused on the need to uphold the principle of substantive equality considering the specific needs of First Nations children, families, communities and Nations as an integral part of eliminating the systemic discrimination found. Those specific needs are accounted for in First Nations-led and designed prevention programs for example.

[228] The Tribunal recently discussed its retention of jurisdiction on all its orders in 2022 CHRT 8:

> [175] Pending a complete and final agreement on long term relief on consent or otherwise and consistent with the approach to remedies taken in this case and referred to above, the Panel retains jurisdiction on the Consent Orders contained in this ruling. The Panel will revisit its retention of jurisdiction once the parties have filed a final and complete agreement on long-term relief or as the Panel sees fit considering the upcoming evolution of this case.
> [176] This does not affect the Panel's retention of jurisdiction on other issues and orders in this case. The Panel continues to retain jurisdiction on all its rulings and orders to ensure that they are effectively implemented and that systemic discrimination is eliminated.

[229] All the above support the conclusion that the Tribunal's retention of jurisdiction allows the Tribunal to examine the FSA in order to determine if it is in line with its orders and victims/survivors receive appropriate compensation. The Tribunal is not functus officio in that regard. Furthermore, the principle of functus officio and finality applies to the Tribunal and must be applied flexibly considering the factual matrix of the case, findings, reasons and orders already made in this case. This is a case-by-case exercise based on law, facts and the evidence that involves applying the case law to the matter at hand with a careful review of the Tribunal's retention of jurisdiction and the purpose for such retention of jurisdiction. In this case, as demonstrated above, the quantum for compensation is final. The categories of victims/survivors who are entitled to compensation is final in the sense that they cannot be reduced or disentitled unless their compensation is found unreasonable by a reviewing Court.

[230] The Tribunal considered the request for compensation by direct and specific reference to the evidence in this case. This fundamental tenet of justice was underscored by the Federal Court in its upholding of the Tribunals' orders, concluding that the Tribunal's jurisdiction to make the orders flowed not only from the parameters and objectives of the CHRA, but also from the evidentiary foundation upon which the Tribunal grounded its decisions:

> Ultimately, the Compensation Decision is reasonable because the CHRA provides the Tribunal with broad discretion to fashion appropriate remedies to fit the circumstances. To receive an award, the victims did not need to testify > to establish individual harm. The Tribunal already had extensive evidence of Canada's discrimination; the resulting harm experienced by First Nations children and their families (the removal of First Nations children from their homes); and Canada's knowledge of that harm. Further, the Tribunal did not turn the proceedings into a class action because the nature and rationale behind the awards are different from those ordered in a class action. From the outset, First Nations children and families were the subject matter of the complaint and Canada always knew that the Respondents were seeking compensation for the victims. If Canada wanted to challenge these aspects of the Complaint, it should have done so earlier. Canada may not collaterally attack the Merit Decision or other decisions in this proceeding.

> (2021 FC 969 at para. 231, emphasis added).

[231] The Tribunal is responsible for applying the CHRA and the human rights framework reflected in that legislation. While the AFN and Canada have brought this motion to seek the Tribunal's approval for an agreement under the class actions that would settle both the class actions and the complaint before the CHRT, that does not change the fact that the Tribunal is tasked with applying the CHRA. It does not have jurisdiction to apply tort or class actions law, and has consistently throughout this case ensured that it does not do so.

[232] Given that its jurisdiction comes from the CHRA, the Tribunal's role is not duplicative of a court approving a class action settlement. The Tribunal does not have that power and it would be entirely duplicative of the court's role. Further, the Tribunal is not at the stage of the proceedings of deciding whether to approve an early-stage settlement, where liability and compensation are still contested. Instead, the Tribunal is assessing whether its existing orders are satisfied or, in the alternative, whether it should modify them. The Tribunal has consistently taken an evidence-based approach in assessing this case and considers whether the evidence demonstrates its existing orders are satisfied or justifies revisiting its previous orders trough the dialogic approach.

[233] The Tribunal notes that the Federal Court upheld the Tribunal's use of the dialogic approach to the compensation orders, noting that this provided flexibility so that the Tribunal could fulfil its statutory mandate to address discrimination:

> I agree with the Tribunal's reliance on Grover v Canada (National Research Council) (1994), 1994 CanLII 18487 (FC), 24 CHRR 390 [Grover] where the task of determining "effective" remedies was characterized as demanding "innovation and flexibility on the part of the Tribunal…" (2016 CHRT 10 at para > 15). Furthermore, I agree that "the [CHRA] is structured so as to encourage this flexibility" (2016 CHRT 10 at para 15). The Court in Grover stated that flexibility is required because the Tribunal has a difficult statutory mandate to fulfill (at para 40). The approach in Grover, in my view, supports the basis for the dialogic approach. This approach also allowed the parties to address key issues on how to address the discrimination, as my summary in the Procedural History section pointed out.

> (2021 FC 969 at para 138, citing to Grover v Canada (National Research Council) (1994), 1994 CanLII 18487 (FC).

[234] Justice Favel, in the Federal Court's judicial review, aptly captured the fact that compensation under the CHRA is not equivalent to tort damages:

> The CHRA is not designed to address different levels of damages or engage in processes to assess fault-based personal harm. The Tribunal made human rights awards for pain and suffering because of the victim's loss of freedom from discrimination, experience of victimization, and harm to dignity.
> (2021 FC 969 at para 189).

[235] Further, the AFN's argument that the FSA provides finality is partly true and partly wrong. It is true in the literal sense that if not challenged, the FSA could end litigation and bring finality and promptly compensate most, but not all, recognized victims/survivors in the near future. This is the concept that certain disputes must achieve a resolution from which no further appeal may be taken, and from which no collateral proceedings may be permitted to disturb that resolution. The very fact this joint motion is opposed and if it is fully granted may lead to a judicial review of this ruling speaks to the risk of the FSA not achieving finality in that sense.

[236] It is wrong by ignoring another paramount aspect of the need for finality in human rights proceedings as correctly described by the Caring Society: the assurance that once rights have been recognized and vindicated (which is no small task for complainants and victims who often face powerful respondents challenging their claim at every turn), they are no longer up for debate by outside actors or respondents who may disagree with the orders made against them and therefore contract out of their human rights obligations under the CHRA.

[237] The AFN and Canada are so focused on the FSA that they ignore the grave injustice of reducing or disentitling victims/survivors once evidence-based findings and orders that benefit victims have been made by a human rights tribunal. This more broadly sets a dangerous precedent for victims/survivors in Canada.

[238] Canada has consistently argued against the Tribunal's jurisdiction at every stage of this case, from the case's initial referral to the Tribunal, to the Tribunal's remedial jurisdiction to the Tribunal's ability to retain jurisdiction to use the dialogic approach to implement an effective remedy. Canada, in this motion, is proposing an even broader jurisdiction than the Tribunal has ever considered or found where the Tribunal would be able to alter its final compensation orders not because of any issue with the Tribunal's ruling but because Canada and the AFN have reached a tentative settlement of a separate class action.

[239] This question is also a question of the integrity of the human rights regime and of the Tribunal's.

(i) Human Rights Regime

[240] The Federal Court, in this case, addressed the Tribunal's specific role conferred by Parliament:

> Finally, given that Parliament tasked the Tribunal with the primary responsibility for remedying discrimination, I agree that the Court should show deference to the Tribunal in light of its statutory jurisdiction outlined above.
>
> (2021 FC 969 at para 139).

[241] Parliament's intention when it adopted the CHRA was to create a system particularly tailored to address the social wrong of discrimination.

[242] This Panel recognizes, as described by the Caring Society, the rights of the child are human rights that recognize childhood as an important period of development with special circumstances. This is also recognized by all levels of Courts in Canada and was discussed in this Panel's Merit Decision, 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 346:

> A focus on prevention services and least disruptive measures in the provincial statutes mentioned above is inextricably linked to the concept of the best interest of the child: a legal principle of paramount importance in both Canadian and international law (see Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law v. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 4 (CanLII) at para. 9; and, Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 817 at para. 75 [Baker]). As explained by Professor Nicholas Bala:

> [L]eading Canadian precedents, federal and provincial statutes and international treaties are all premised on the principle that decisions about children should be based on an assessment of their best interests. This is a central concept for those who are involved making decisions about children, not only for judges and lawyers, but for also assessors and mediators (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 346).

[243] Child welfare services, or child and family services, are services designed to protect children and encourage family stability. Hence the best interest of the child is a paramount principle in the provision of these services and is a principle recognized in international and Canadian law. This principle is meant to guide and inform decisions that impact all children, including First Nations children (2016 CHRT 2 at para. 3):

> [179] This also corresponds to Canada's international commitments recognizing the special status of children and Indigenous peoples. Also, the Panel found that Canada provides a service through the FNCFS Program and other related provincial/territorial agreements and method of funding the FNCFS Program and related provincial/territorial agreements significantly controls the provision of First Nations children and family services on reserve and in the Yukon to the detriment of First Nations children and families.

[244] The Tribunal agrees with the Caring Society who submits that the Tribunal ought to apply a human rights framework that centers the child and parent/caregiver experience of harm in determining this motion. The Tribunal agrees with the four criteria the Caring Society identifies as important to the analysis:

> (i) a critical examination of the evidence adduced in relation to the victims who will be impacted by the deviations in the Compensation FSA;
>
> (ii) the nature of compensation awarded as a quasi-constitutional right under the CHRA and the meaning of retracting that acknowledgement;
>
> (iii) the best interests of First Nations children and their families, particularly given the historical and intergenerational trauma experienced by the victims, as already acknowledged by the Tribunal; and
> (iv) the potential of creating a dangerous precedent where human rights compensation can be bargained for outside of the dialogic approach and outside of the protections that the human rights regime provides.

[245] The Tribunal is tasked with implementing the CHRA and must ensure the human rights regime is not cast aside in favour of civil claims. The process before the Tribunal has already awarded remedies to compensate for Canada's discrimination. To revisit or undermine those orders raises issues of finality on quantum and entitlements. There is not a legal basis for the sort of change to the Tribunal's existing entitlement orders being requested by Canada and the AFN.

[246] The Caring Society correctly recognizes that the Tribunal carefully crafted its remedies in this case to match the evidence of demonstrated harm to specific First Nations children and caregivers affected by Canada's systemic racial discrimination. These conclusions are based on applying evidence collected over the course of a decade to the legal framework of the CHRA.

[247] Canada challenged this process at every step in front of the Tribunal and sought to judicially review the Panel's compensation decisions. The judicial review has been dismissed, and so the Tribunal's orders are enforceable absent a successful appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal.

[248] The Tribunal also agrees with the Caring Society's concern that the FSA, unlike the Tribunal's orders, requires victims/survivors to give up the right to further recourse in order to accept compensation. This is particularly concerning for victims who are receiving less compensation under the FSA than they would be entitled to under the Tribunal's orders. Further, many of these victims are children whose human rights are particularly important to safeguard. It is not the victims/survivor's fault that Canada's extensive discrimination affected a large number of victims. The victims should not be required to give up their rights to compensation to shield Canada from further liability. The potential for other causes of action against Canada, including Charter claims, should not negate the victims/survivors' ability to access compensation under the CHRA.

[249] Denying entitlements once recognized in orders is an unfair and unjust outcome that the Tribunal cannot endorse given the CHRA's objectives and mandate. The Tribunal's authority flows from its quasi-constitutional legislation and the Tribunal is, according to the Supreme Court, the "final refuge of the disadvantaged and the disenfranchised."

[250] Furthermore, a perpetrator cannot circumvent the Tribunal and Courts by contracting out its human rights obligations in the effort of derogating to existing orders. Canada opposed the compensation requests and then the Tribunal orders and challenged them at the Federal Court and now the Federal Court of Appeal. While it is noble to try to resolve the issues and stop litigation in the interest of reconciliation, this nobility is tarnished when vulnerable victims/survivors who are children or are caregiving parents or grandparents who suffered multiple losses of their children or are deceased are now disentitled by Canada who signed the FSA. This is not healthy reconciliation. This is also the opposite of what the Tribunal intended when it encouraged the parties to negotiate and resolve outstanding matters. The Tribunal did not envision that progress and negotiation would derogate from its binding orders in a way that reduces compensation or disentitles some victims/survivors who were recognized in the Tribunal's orders.

[251] Throughout these proceedings, Canada opposed the complaint and tried to shield itself by arguing that it did not provide the services directly, it opposed remedies, it narrowed the interpretations of the orders on multiple occasions, etc. Now it tries to shield itself from some Tribunal orders by hiding behind the fact the First Nations made those difficult decisions to compromise and carve out victims/survivors from the FSA to add others from the class actions. This is only occurring because Canada placed a cap on compensation. While the amount of compensation is impressive, what is more impressive is the length and breadth of Canada's systemic racial discrimination over decades impacting hundreds of thousands of victims who deserve compensation.

[252] Canada remains responsible for fulfilling its human rights obligations, both in general and the specific orders from the Tribunal. Canada is not absolved of this responsibility by putting the FSA forward as a First Nations-led process. First Nations were constrained by the fixed amount of compensation Canada was willing to provide, which did not ensure all victims/survivors identified through the Tribunal process would be compensated in line with the Tribunal's orders.

[253] Moreover, it would undermine the CHRA's ability to protect human rights if respondents were able to avoid liability by reaching an agreement with only certain parties to a human rights case to remove the case from the Tribunal's jurisdiction in favour of an alternative forum. It would reduce the ability of victims to receive a remedy that acknowledges that their human rights have been violated.

[254] The potential for setting a dangerous precedent is significant and could have widespread impacts on the human rights system. The AFN acknowledges in its submissions that there does not appear to be a precedent along the lines of what the AFN and Canada are requesting. While the AFN contends that this case is unique and unlikely to be replicated, the Tribunal is not convinced that it should sacrifice human rights principles on the assumption that this case is unique. To that end, the Caring Society urges the Tribunal to consider the broader and precedential implications of this motion on the integrity of the human rights regimes throughout Canada, including its specific impact on other First Nations human rights cases. The Tribunal agrees with the Caring Society that setting aside human rights remedies in an alternative forum would leave victims of discrimination vulnerable. The Caring Society is particularly concerned about the implications this has for the human rights regime when the federal government is responsible for the discrimination. The Tribunal has consistently sought to address the systemic discrimination in this case by holding Canada accountable:

> Human rights laws are remedial in nature. They aim to make victims of discrimination "whole" and to dissuade respondents from discriminating in the future. Both of these important policy goals can be achieved by conferring compensation to the victims in this case who are deceased: it ensures that the estate of the victim is compensated for the pain and suffering experienced by the victim and ensures that Canada is held accountable for its racial discrimination and wilful and reckless discriminatory conduct.
> (2020 CHRT 7 at para 130).

[255] It is not appropriate that victims/survivors of discrimination should be required to defend their entitlement to compensation from a collateral attack seeking to remove the Tribunal's jurisdiction and override the orders entitling them to compensation. This is particularly concerning where successful complainants are not entitled to legal fees from successfully advancing their case before the Tribunal, making hiring counsel more challenging (see Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 53, [2011] 3 SCR 471).

[256] It is well established that “contracting out of” a human right is not permissible. As emphasized by the Supreme Court:

> Although the Code contains no explicit restriction on such contracting out, it is nevertheless a public statute and it constitutes public policy in Ontario as appears from a reading of the Statute itself and as declared in the preamble. It is clear from the authorities, both in Canada and in England, that parties are not competent to contract themselves out of the provisions of such enactments and that contracts having such effect are void, as contrary to public policy….The Ontario Human Rights Code has been enacted by the Legislature of the Province of Ontario for the benefit of the community at large and of its individual members and clearly falls within that category of enactment which may not be waived or varied by private contract; therefore this argument cannot receive effect.
> (Ontario Human Rights Commission v. Etobicoke, 1982 CanLII 15 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 202).

[257] Further, it would be an absurd interpretation of the CHRA to allow an outside process to which not all parties have agreed to participate to usurp the role of the Tribunal to order compensation to victims/survivors of discrimination as identified in a Tribunal process. The Tribunal agrees with the Caring Society that public trust in the human rights system is likely to be eroded if orders to compensate victims of discrimination are not binding on respondents and can be bargained away. The Tribunal process allows for the public affirmation of human rights that the current motion would, if granted, undermine. This is particularly true in the current case where the parties have returned to the Tribunal multiple times to compel Canada to remedy its discriminatory conduct. In those rulings, the Tribunal had to confirm that its orders were legally binding on Canada and that Canada was obliged to address the systemic racial discrimination.

[258] Granting the AFN and Canada’s motion now would contradict the Tribunal’s previous rulings that indicated that its remedial orders required implementation. The Caring Society urges the Tribunal to once again reassert the important principle that human rights orders are binding and that compliance is not negotiable. Human rights regimes are meant to offer comprehensive protection over discrimination complaints. Allowing settlement agreements reached in the context of a civil claim to invalidate a ruling made by human rights tribunals could have a series of unintended negative consequences on human rights regimes. The Supreme Court of Canada in Honda Canada Inc. v. Keays, 2008 SCC 39, [2008] 2 SCR 362 distinguished common law remedy from human rights remedies:

> [63] In this case, the trial judge awarded punitive damages on the basis of discriminatory conduct by Honda. Honda argues that discrimination is precluded as an independent cause of action under Seneca College of Applied Arts and Technology v. Bhadauria, 1981 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 181. In that case, this Court clearly articulated that a plaintiff is precluded from pursuing a common law remedy when human rights legislation contains a comprehensive enforcement scheme for violations of its substantive terms. The reasoning behind this conclusion is that the purpose of the Ontario Human Rights Code is to remedy the effects of discrimination; if breaches to the Code were actionable in common law courts, it would encourage litigants to use the Code for a purpose the legislature did not intend — namely, to punish employers who discriminate against their employees. Thus, a person who alleges a breach of the provisions of the Code must seek a remedy within the statutory scheme set out in the Code itself. Moreover, the recent amendments to the Code (which would allow a plaintiff to advance a breach of the Code as a cause of action in connection with another wrong) restrict monetary compensation to loss arising out of the infringement, including any injuries to dignity, feelings and self-respect. In this respect, they confirm the Code's remedial thrust.

[259] More importantly, the Tribunal frowns on reducing compensation or disentitling victims/survivors once they have been vindicated at the Tribunal and upheld by the Federal Court. This dangerous precedent would send a very negative message to victims/survivors in this case and other human rights cases in Canada and could potentially become a powerful deterrent to pursue human rights recourses under the CHRA. Victims/survivors would never have the peace of mind that their substantiated complaints and awarded remedies would be forthcoming to them if, at any time before remedies are implemented, these remedies can be taken away from them without the need for a successful judicial review.

[260] This is even more troubling when we consider the nature of the complaints before the Tribunal in this case. The very nature of human rights rests upon the protection of vulnerable groups. From the beginning the Tribunal found and wrote that this case is about children and the Tribunal's mandate to eliminate discrimination and prevent similar practices from arising. Permitting reductions or disentitlements of compensation for victims/survivors who have been recognized in evidence-based findings and corresponding orders does not breathe life into human rights. Rather, it takes its breath away.

[261] This cannot be how the human rights regime is administered in Canada.

[262] The Tribunal also agrees with the following Commission arguments that explain the human rights regime under the CHRA:

> 42. The CHRA does not expressly address the issue of finality. However, section 57 explains that a Tribunal order to award compensation under section 53(2)(e) or section 53(3) may be made an order of the Federal Court for the purpose of enforcement.
>
> 43. While this Tribunal has broad remedial discretion, this authority is constrained by the CHRA framework and by the evidence presented.
>
> 44. The CHRA requires this Tribunal to balance flexibility and innovation in remedies with natural justice principles.
> 45. The dialogic approach does not mean this Tribunal can reconsider its orders in perpetuity. It is meant to facilitate the implementation of orders. It is not intended to be used to negotiate out of binding legal obligations.

[263] Substantive variations of this Tribunal's orders may lead to new litigation or proceedings that disturb established legal principles. If courts and tribunals could continuously revisit and vary their decisions, the administration of justice would not work the way it was meant to, and it would be procedurally unfair to the parties. When a party is not satisfied with a decision of this Tribunal, it can bring an application for judicial review at the Federal Court. It is only in very limited situations that a court or a tribunal can vary, amend, or reconsider an order or a decision, (see Hughes v Transport Canada, 2021 CHRT 34 at paras 61-62).

[264] The Tribunal further agrees with the Commission that simultaneously seeking recourse through the judicial review or appellate processes while also returning to this Tribunal for the same outcome (i.e., to re-litigate or change the remedies ordered) creates a problematic precedent and challenges established principles and procedures of administrative law.

[265] The Tribunal agrees with the Commission and "acknowledges the AFN's submission that "the FSA will significantly expand the number of survivors who would otherwise not be entitled to compensation" by including classes of beneficiaries that go beyond the scope of the Tribunal inquiry. Equally, some people who are entitled to a remedy under this Tribunal's compensation orders will not receive one under the FSA. In taking these factors into account, this Tribunal must apply principles of fairness and access to justice" (Commission Submissions, para. 65).

[266] The CHRA provides this Tribunal with a specialized framework and statutory mandate purposely designed to meet the unique needs of victims/survivors of discrimination. It is the proper framework to apply when considering how this Tribunal may exercise its discretion. It contemplates the adjudication and remediation of group complaints such as this. Class actions are judicial proceedings that are governed by separate objectives, legal principles, case law, and rules of procedure. All of this is distinguishable from the case at hand. It is not necessary for this Tribunal to apply class action governing factors and jurisprudence to decide whether to vary its orders to conform to the FSA. Expanding or reducing the scope of the groups of complainants included in this Tribunal's compensation orders to mirror the class action groups would require new evidence and a hearing on the merits of these issues. Further, the groups of complainants this Tribunal ordered to be paid compensation are protected from alteration by the principle of finality of quantum and of categories.

[267] The Tribunal must be allowed to complete its task to ensure victims/survivors of the discrimination are compensated. This task cannot involve reducing or removing some victims/survivors' rights to entitlement.

[268] Furthermore, in determining if the victims/survivors will be compensated, the Tribunal cannot divorce the task from the evidence and findings that warrant the remedy. In the same way, in performing an analysis of if victims/survivors will be compensated, the Tribunal must first have found liability under the CHRA, then determine who the victims/survivors are, if they have suffered and what is the appropriate remedy. This is an exercise based on evidence and precedes the implementation phase where the Tribunal examines if the remedy is owed to the victims/survivors. This is not to say that both analyses cannot be done at the same time in a ruling. Rather, this is to highlight the adjudicative process one must follow under the CHRA.

[269] This being said, to make findings on the effectiveness of implementation or if the remedy is forthcoming, the Tribunal must first know what it is that needs to be forthcoming. Consequently, the Tribunal looks at its orders and the evidence on implementation to make findings on their effectiveness. This is not an open door to reduce or remove entitlements. It is a door to improve, refine, clarify orders if need be to ensure they effectively compensate the victims.

[270] One main argument raised in this motion is that the negotiation requires compromise and compromises needed to be made given the fixed amount provided. This is an exercise that is best done at earlier stages of proceedings and prior to orders being made.

[271] Another important argument is the one made on reconciliation. If victims/survivors who have been recognized by a human rights Tribunal and the Federal Court are later removed for the greater good of making a final deal to serve others is this a good example of reconciliation? We think not. On the contrary, it is quite concerning. This is even more concerning when the voices of those excluded are the deceased and children.

[272] Canada and the AFN also highlight that this FSA is First Nations-led. The Tribunal appreciates this important fact. However, sovereign nations who are members of the AFN are not exempt from international human rights scrutiny in regards of their citizens. Moreover, states like Canada cannot contract out of their human rights obligations by invoking the sovereignty of First Nations especially when some First Nations call upon Canada to indicate that they have not provided their consent on the FSA.

[273] The AFN and Canada removed the finality aspect of the Tribunal's orders on quantum and recognized categories of victims/survivors in order to achieve finality in the FSA. This benefits Canada in many ways at the expense of some victims/survivors but may create another problem.

[274] The Panel is concerned that the AFN and Canada may have opened themselves to potential liability if the disentitled victims under the Tribunal's orders opt out of the FSA and seek to pursue a recourse against the AFN and/or Canada for removing them from the FSA and changing their opting out options. This point is more of a comment for reflection and is not determinative on this motion.

[275] The parties have not addressed how First Nations governments who are the rights holders will have to deal with victims/survivors once recognized and now disentitled by their own First Nations who may seek justice. The AFN submits that few First Nations peoples avail themselves of the Commission and Tribunal's proceedings. While it is true that First Nations face barriers advancing human rights claims, during the course of the last decade, the Tribunal's experience is that there has been an increase of First Nations cases referred to the Tribunal by the Commission. The Members of this Panel have travelled across the country and heard numerous First Nations cases that often resolve through mediation. The Panel chair had the privilege of hearing a case in a NAN community in a northern and remote area and others in British Columbia and Nova Scotia. Member Lustig chairs a number of First Nations cases and is the adjudicator who ruled in Beattie v Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development Canada, 2014 CHRT 1.

[276] Moreover, the results for First Nations as a result of these proceedings and the parties collective work cannot be understated. For example, since the Tribunal's 2016 ruling, 2.13 million services have been approved under Jordan's Principle according to Indigenous Services Canada's Jordan's Principle webpage. This is one of the many examples of real change beginning to address the systemic discrimination in this case. The fact the AFN's new executive now changed its mind cannot undo the evidence of change in this case which is a result of the parties' work before this Tribunal to hold Canada accountable. Further, the Tribunal recently relied on this case in a complaint from a rights-holding First Nation concerning the discriminatory underfunding of policing services and substantiated the complaint (see Dominique (on behalf of the members of the Pekuakamiulnuatsh First Nation) v. Public Safety Canada, 2022 CHRT 4 (CanLII)). So far, the Merit Decision is cited in over 50 cases by Tribunals and Courts involving First Nations cases and Non-First Nations cases in Canada.

[277] Furthermore, the Compensation Entitlement Decision was relied upon in other recent human rights cases where the principles of compensation for infringements of human dignity and egregious cases have been discussed: RR v. Vancouver Aboriginal Child and Family Services Society (No. 6), 2022 BCHRT 116 (CanLII); R.L. v. Canadian National Railway Company, 2021 CHRT 33; Hugie v. T-Lane Transportation and Logistics, 2021 CHRT 27; André v. Matimekush-Lac John Nation Innu, 2021 CHRT 8.

[278] The Tribunal agrees with the Caring Society that it should consider the legacy of the now repealed section 67 of the CHRA that was seen in many First Nation communities as excluding them from the protections of the CHRA. This case has changed that perception and the results of this case, in particular the compensation orders, were greeted with celebration in many First Nations communities. In addition to validating the experiences of victims/survivors of Canada's discrimination, this built confidence in the human rights process as an option for First Nations to seek redress. Reversing the Tribunal's compensation orders would undermine this progress and faith in the human rights system. It would send a message that the human rights of First Nations People are negotiable.

[279] The Tribunal remains open to ensure the compensation remedy is forthcoming to the victims/survivors and may require further action however, this is not to say it is fair, just and acceptable to reduce entitlements or disentitle victims/survivors who have been vindicated in the Tribunal's findings.

[280] On this point the Tribunal answers two specific questions as follows:

> 1. Are all the categories of victims/survivors in the Tribunal's orders covered by the FSA?
>
> a. No.
>
> 2. If the answer to question 1 is no, can the Tribunal find that the FSA fully satisfies the Tribunal's orders if categories of victims/survivors have been removed from the Tribunal's orders?
>
> a. No.

V. The FSA and the Specific derogations from the Tribunal's Compensation Orders

[281] The parties addressed four potential derogations from the Tribunal's compensation orders in the FSA:

> 1) Entitlement for First Nations children removed and placed in non-ISC funded placements

2) Estates of deceased caregiving parents and grandparents are not entitled to compensation

3) Certain caregiving parents and grandparents will receive less compensation

4) Some Jordan's Principle victims/survivors may receive less compensation

[282] The Tribunal will address them in turn here. Furthermore, the Tribunal reviewed the FSA in its entirety and finds it substantially satisfies the Tribunal's compensation orders. Given the FSA does not fully satisfy the Tribunal's compensation orders and consequently, cannot be fully approved in its current form, the Tribunal will only focus on the main derogations from the Tribunal's orders given this is the reason for the denial of part of this motion. In sum, the Tribunal will not conduct a clause-by-clause analysis of the FSA in this ruling as it is not necessary or determinative to discuss where the FSA is in line with the Tribunal's orders or where it does vary in an acceptable way (not reducing or removing entitlements to victims/survivors).

A. Entitlement for children removed and placed in non-ISC funded placements [283] The FSA adds another requirement in order to award compensation to First Nations children. The Tribunal decisions provide compensation for children removed from their homes, families and communities as a result of the FNCFS Program's systemic discrimination. The FSA narrows it to removed children who were also placed in ISC-funded care. In light of the evidence presented throughout this case, the Tribunal ordered the maximum compensation available under the CHRA for the great harms caused by the removal of First Nations children rather than the number of years in care or the other harms that occurred in care. The Tribunal explained that a removed child or caregiving parent or grandparent had other recourses in addition to this maximum compensation that they could pursue to obtain higher amounts of compensation for the additional harms they suffered. The FSA and class actions focus on these additional harms and the Tribunal agrees this is an appropriate focus for the FSA and the class actions. However, the requirement of removal and placement in care in an ISC-funded location cannot be considered a proper interpretation of the Tribunal's findings and orders. The Panel disagrees with the AFN and Canada's interpretation of the Tribunal's orders on this point. The Caring Society properly characterized the Tribunal's findings and orders in that regard.

[284] Moreover, the AFN's interpretation of the children eligible for compensation because of their removal by child and family services was raised for the first time in this motion. The AFN may have some valid points about the challenges in identifying the children covered by the Tribunal's Compensation Orders. However, the manner in which these arguments were raised does not permit the Tribunal to assess the AFN's underlying arguments. While there was some limited evidence presented as part of this motion, the parties' arguments essentially focused on what the Tribunal had determined in previous motions. This was appropriate given the nature of this motion. The AFN's arguments about the ambiguity in which children are covered by the Tribunal's orders and the challenges in providing compensation to certain children are better addressed in a separate motion where the parties have sufficient notice to lead evidence on this point. The Tribunal is open to further clarifying and addressing implementation challenges for these victims/survivors. In fact, if there is ambiguity or outstanding challenges that will delay compensation, those issues should be resolved now so that the parties are able to implement the Compensation Framework promptly. There appears to be a dispute about what the Tribunal meant by the term in ''in care'' and this could have been clarified earlier or at least during the time the parties to the FSA were negotiating. This category called by the parties as Non-ISC children is viewed by the AFN and Canada as a new category and the Caring Society views this as a category already included in the scope of the Tribunal's orders.

[285] The parties now disagree on the interpretation of the Tribunal's orders on who are the removed children and if only ISC funded placements are to be considered for the purpose of removed children.

[286] Instead of seeking clarification with the Tribunal as was done on a number of occasions in the past, as part of the compensation process, the AFN and Canada went with their own interpretation which was incorporated in the FSA. The Tribunal addressed clarifications on compensation motions, on average, in two months, except for the very complex issue of First Nations eligibility under Jordan's Principle which took much longer. The Caring Society, recognized by this Tribunal for their expertise in child welfare, disagrees with the AFN and Canada's interpretation and shares the same views as this Panel on this point.

[287] The AFN may have some valid points about the challenges in identifying the children covered by the Tribunal's compensation orders. This is not an issue that the Tribunal was asked to address at the time it made its compensation orders or when asked to add the estates or clarify other aspects such as the children in care as of January 1, 2006 or the definitions of essential services, etc.

[288] The appropriate manner to address this was by way of a motion for clarification of the Tribunal's orders and not by way of this motion. The manner in which these arguments were raised does not permit the Tribunal to assess the AFN's underlying arguments. While there was some limited evidence presented as part of this motion, the parties' arguments essentially focused on what the Tribunal had determined in previous motions. This was appropriate given the nature of this motion.

[289] However, the FSA's attempt to unilaterally remove these victims from the scope of the Tribunal's compensation through the class action proceeding is close to being a collateral attack on the Tribunal's decisions. This being said, the Tribunal has considered the AFN's new submissions on this point and finds that determining whether using ISC-funded placements as a measure of eligibility is appropriate would require a notice of motion clearly raising the issue and allowing an opportunity to fully assess relevant evidence. This motion is not the appropriate manner to do so as it would be procedurally unfair with the tight timelines on this motion that prevent those who oppose the AFN and Canada's views on this point from leading contrary evidence and properly challenging the AFN's evidence.

[290] The Tribunal will now turn to a brief review of its previous rulings.

[291] In the Merit Decision, the Panel discussed the term "in care":

> [117] Protection services are triggered when the safety or the well-being of a child is considered to be compromised. If the child cannot live safely in the family home while measures are taken with the family to remedy the situation, child welfare workers will make arrangements for temporary or permanent placement of the child in another home where he or she can be cared for. This is called placing the child "in care". The first choice for a caregiver in this > situation would usually be a kin connection or a foster family. Kinship care includes children placed out-of-home in the care of the extended family, individuals emotionally connected to the child, or in a family of a similar religious or ethno-cultural background.

>
>
> [119] There are circumstances, however, when the risk to the child's safety or well-being is too great to be mitigated at home, and the child cannot safely remain in his or her family environment. In such circumstances, most provincial statutes require that a social worker first look at the extended family to see if there is an aunt, an uncle or a grandparent who can care for the child. It is only when there is no other solution that a child should be removed from his or her family and placed in foster care under a temporary custody order. Following the issuance of a temporary custody order, the social worker must appear in court to explain the placement and the plan of care for the child and support of the family. The temporary custody order can be renewed and eventually, when all efforts have failed, the child may be placed in permanent care.

(i) Removed children and the parties' differing interpretations post Federal Court ruling

[292] The Panel provided compensation for the removals of children from their homes, families and communities based on the strong evidence that established the link between Canada's discriminatory practice and the evidence of harm for pain and suffering and wilful and reckless conduct. It is not the goal here to be reexplaining what was already explained at length in previous decisions now upheld by the Federal Court as reasonable. The parties now disagree on the interpretation of the Tribunal's orders on who are the removed children and if only ISC funded placements are to be considered for the purpose of removed children.

[293] The Tribunal's decision in 2019 CHRT 39, addressed the link between the evidence and the harms it was compensating. The Tribunal focused on harms to dignity and the Tribunal also ordered a critical and unprecedented human rights remedy that directly impacts the victims/survivors in this case: human rights compensation for the infringement of dignity, pain and suffering and acknowledgement of the federal government's wilful and reckless conduct.

(ii) Non-ISC Removed children

[294] The Panel's summary reasons and views on the issue of compensation were outlined in 2019 CHRT 39 as follows:

> [13] This ruling is dedicated to all the First Nations children, their families and communities who were harmed by the unnecessary removal of children from your homes and your communities. The Panel desires to acknowledge the great suffering that you have endured as victims/survivors of Canada's discriminatory practices. The Panel highlights that our legislation places a cap on the remedies under sections 53 (2) (e) and 53 (3) of the CHRA for victims the maximum being $40,000 and that this amount is reserved for the worst cases. The Panel believes that the unnecessary removal of children from your homes, families and communities qualifies as a worst-case scenario which will be discussed further below and, a breach of your fundamental human rights. The Panel stresses the fact that this amount can never be considered as proportional to the pain suffered and accepting the amount for remedies is not an acknowledgment on your part that this is its value. No amount of compensation can ever recover what you have lost, the scars that are left on your souls or the suffering that you have gone through as a result of racism, colonial practices and discrimination. This is the truth. In awarding the maximum amount allowed under our Statute, the Panel recognizes, to the best of its ability and with the tools that it currently has under the CHRA, that this case of racial discrimination is one of the worst possible cases warranting the maximum awards. The proposition that a systemic case can only warrant systemic remedies is not supported by the law and jurisprudence. The CHRA regime allows for both individual and systemic remedies if supported by the evidence in a particular case. In this case, the evidence supports both individual and systemic remedies. The Tribunal was clear from the beginning of its [Merit] Decision that the Federal First Nations child welfare program is negatively impacting First Nations children and families it undertook to serve and protect. The gaps and adverse effects are a result of a colonial system that elected to base its model on a financial funding model and authorities dividing services into separate programs without proper coordination or funding and was not based on First Nations children and families' real needs and substantive equality. Systemic orders such as reform and a broad definition of Jordan's Principle are means to address those flaws.
>
> [14] Individual remedies are meant to deter the reoccurrence of the discriminatory practice or of similar ones, and more importantly to validate the victims/survivors' hurtful experience resulting from the discrimination.
> [15] When the discriminatory practice was known or ought to have been known, the damages under the wilful and reckless head send a strong message that tolerating such a practice of breaching protected human rights is unacceptable in Canada. The Panel has made numerous findings since the > hearing on the merits contained in 10 rulings. Those findings were made after a thorough review of thousands of pages of evidence including testimony transcripts and reports. Those findings stand and form the basis for this ruling. It is impossible for the Panel to discuss the entirety of the evidence before the Tribunal in a decision. However, compelling evidence exists in the record to permit findings of pain and suffering experienced by a specific vulnerable group, namely First Nations children and their families. While the Panel encourages everyone to read the 10 rulings again to better understand the reasons and context for the present orders, some ruling extracts are selected and reproduced in the pain and suffering, Jordan's Principle and Special compensation sections below for ease of reference in elaborating this Panel's reasons. The Panel finds the Attorney General of Canada's (AGC's) position on compensation unreasonable in light of the evidence, findings and applicable law in this case. The Panel's reasons will be further elaborated below.

[295] Later, in the Compensation Entitlement Decision, the Tribunal further described the harm done to First Nations children and their families which is linked to the removal of the child:

> [147] The children who were unnecessarily removed from their homes, will not be vindicated by a system reform nor will their parents. Even the children who are reunified with their families cannot recover the time they lost with their families. The loss of opportunity to remain in their homes, their families and communities as a result of the racial discrimination is one of the most egregious forms of discrimination leading to serious and well documented consequences including harm and suffering found in the evidence in this case.
>
> [148] As it will be discussed below, the evidence is sufficient to make a finding that each child who was unnecessarily removed from their home, family and community has suffered. Any child who was removed and later reunited with their family has suffered during the time of separation.
>
> [149] The use of the "words unnecessarily removed" account for a distinction between two categories of children: those who did not need to be removed from the home and those who did. If the children are abused sexually, physically or psychologically those children have suffered at the hands of their parents/caregivers and needed to be removed from their homes. However, the children should have been placed in kinship care with a family member or within a trustworthy family within the community. Those First Nations children suffered egregious and compound harm as a result of the discrimination by being removed from their extended families and communities when they should have been comforted by safe persons that they knew. This is a good example of violation of substantive equality.
> [150] The Panel believes that in those situations only the children should be compensated and not the abusers. The Panel understands that some of the

abusers have themselves been abused in residential or boarding schools or otherwise and that these unacceptable crimes of abuse are condemnable. The suffering of First Nations Peoples was recognized by the Panel in the Decision. However, not all abused children became abusers even without the benefit of therapy or other services. The Panel believes it is important for the children victims/survivors of abuse to feel vindicated and not witness financial compensation paid to their abusers regardless of the abusers' intent and history.

[151] Additionally, the Panel also recognizes that the suffering can continue for life for First Nations children and their families even when families are reunited given the gravity of the adverse impacts of breaking families and communities.

[152] Besides, there is sufficient evidence before the Tribunal to make findings of pain and suffering experienced by victims/survivors who are the First Nations children and their families.

[154] Furthermore, an analysis of the Tribunal's findings makes it clear that the Tribunal's orders are aimed at improving the lives of First Nations children and that the First Nations children and families are the ones who suffer from the discrimination. The Tribunal made findings of systemic racial discrimination and agrees this case is a case of systemic racial discrimination. The Panel also made numerous findings of adverse impacts toward First Nations children and families, adverse impacts that cause serious harm and suffering to children: the two are interconnected. While a finding of discrimination and of adverse impacts may not always lead to findings of pain and suffering, in these proceedings it clearly is the case. A review of the 2016 CHRT 2 and subsequent rulings demonstrates this. There is no reason not to accept that both coexist in this case. The individual rights that were infringed upon by systemic racial discrimination warrant remedies alongside systemic reform already ordered by the Tribunal (see 2016 CHRT 2, 10, 16 and 2017 CHRT 7, 14, 35 and 2018 CHRT 4).

[155] Also, the Tribunal has already made numerous findings relating to First Nations children and their families' adverse impacts and suffering in past rulings. Some of these findings can be found in the compilation of citations below:

> The FNCFS Program, corresponding funding formulas and other related provincial/territorial agreements only apply to First Nations people living on-reserve and in the Yukon. It is only because of their race and/or national or ethnic origin that they suffer the adverse impacts outlined above in the provision of child and family services. Furthermore, these adverse impacts perpetuate the historical disadvantage and trauma suffered by Aboriginal people, in particular as a result of the

> The Panel acknowledges the suffering of those First Nations children and families who are or have been denied an equitable opportunity to remain together or to be reunited in a timely manner. We also recognize those First Nations children and families who are or have been adversely impacted by the Government of Canada's past and current child welfare practices on reserves (see 2016 CHRT 2 at, para. 467).

[296] The Panel focused on the effects of the systemic discrimination and how those effects caused harms and led to removals of First Nations children. A number of findings were made in the Compensation Entitlement Decision. Some important findings are reproduced below to highlight the Tribunal's focus on removals:

> [164] The Panel finds that First Nations children and families are harmed and penalized for being poor and for lacking housing. Those are circumstances that are most of the time beyond the parents' control.
>
> [165] The Wen:de report goes on to say that:
>
> > (...) providing an adequate range of neglect focused services is likely more complicated on reserve than off reserve due to existing service deficits within the government and voluntary sector. A study conducted by the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society in 2003 found that First Nations children and families receive very limited benefit from the over 90 billion dollars in voluntary sector services provided to other Canadians annually. Moreover, there are far fewer provincial or municipal government services than off reserve. This means that First Nations families are less able to access child and family support services including addictions services than their non-Aboriginal counterparts (Nadjiwan & Blackstock, 2003). Deficits in support services funding were also found in the federal government allotment for First Nations child and family services (MacDonald & Ladd, 2000.) This report found that the federal government funding for least disruptive measures (a range of services intended to safely keep First Nations children who are experiencing or at risk of experiencing child maltreatment safely at home) is inadequately funded. When one considers the key drivers resulting in First Nations children entering care (substance misuse, poverty and poor housing) and couples that with the dearth in support services, unfavorable conditions to support First Nations families to care for their children emerges (see Wen:de at, pp.13-14) (emphasis ours).

Although there has been no longitudinal studies exploring the experiences of Aboriginal children in care throughout the care continuum (from report to continuing custody), data suggests that Aboriginal children are much more likely to be admitted into care, stay in care and become continuing custody wards. It is possible that the over representation of Aboriginal children in child welfare care is a result of the structural risk factors (poverty, poor housing and substance misuse) not being adequately addressed through the provision of targeted least disruptive measures at both the level of the family and community. The lack of service provision may result in minimal changes to home conditions over the period of time the child remains in care and thus it is more likely the child will not return home (see Wen:de pp.13-14).

The lack of services, opportunities and deplorable living conditions characterizing many of Canada's reserves has led to mass urbanization of Aboriginal peoples (…)

Funding First Nations have made a direct connection between the state of children's health and the colonization and attempted assimilation of Aboriginal peoples: The legacy of dependency, cultural and language impotence, dispossession and helplessness created by residential schools and poorly thought out federal policies continue to have a lasting effect. - Substandard infrastructure and services have been made worse by federal-provincial disagreements over responsibility.

The most profound impact of the lack of clarity relating to jurisdiction results in what many commentators have suggested are gaps in services and funding –resulting in the suffering of First Nations children. As articulated by McDonald and Ladd in their comprehensive Joint Policy Review (prepared for the Assembly of First Nations and DIAND): First Nations agencies are expected through their delegation of authority from the provinces, the expectation of their communities, and by DIAND, to provide a comparable range of services on reserve with the funding they receive through Directive 20.1. The formula, however, provides the same level of funding to agencies regardless of how broad, intense or costly, the range of services is (see Wen:de at, pp.90-91).

The issues raised by FNCFS providers demonstrate the tangible effects of funding limitations on the ability of agencies to address the needs of children. Without funding for > provision of preventative services many children are not given the service they require or are unnecessarily removed from their homes and families. In some provinces the option of removal is even more drastic as children are not funded if placed in the care of family members. The limitations placed on agencies quite clearly jeopardize the well-being of their clients, Aboriginal children and families. As a society we have become increasingly aware of the social devastation of First Nations communities and have discussed at length the importance of healing and cultural revitalization. Despite this knowledge, however, we maintain policies which perpetuate the suffering of First Nations communities and greatly disadvantage the ability of the next generation to effect the necessary change. (see Wen:de at, p.93).

[166] The Supreme Court of Canada found that the removal of a child from a parent's custody affects the individual dignity of that parent:

> In Godbout v. Longueuil, La Forest J. held that: …the autonomy protected by the s. 7 right to liberty encompasses only those matters that can properly be characterized as fundamentally or inherently personal such that, by their very nature, they implicate basic choices going to the core of what it means to enjoy individual dignity and independence… choosing where to establish one's home is, likewise, a quintessentially private decision going to the very heart of personal or individual autonomy.
>
> Although the liberty to choose where one resides is clearly not an inalienable right, it may be considered a strong argument that children should only be forced to leave their family homes in the most extreme circumstances. This is not the case here as Aboriginal children are removed from their homes in far greater numbers than non-Aboriginal children for the purposes of receiving services.
> Alternatively, it may be argued that placement of children in care, due to lack of services, amounts to an infringement of the parent's right to security of the person, under s.7. (see Wen:de at, pp.96-97) (emphasis ours).

[167] According to the Supreme Court of Canada, the removal of a child from a parent's custody adversely impacts the psychological integrity of that parent causing distress, in New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), 1999 CanLII 653 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46.

> The Supreme Court of Canada found the right to security of the person encompasses psychological integrity and may be infringed by state action which causes significant emotional distress:

> Moreover, it was held that the loss of a child constitutes the kind of psychological harm which may found a claim for breach of s.7. Lamer J., for the majority, held: I have little doubt that state removal of a child from parental custody pursuant to the state's parens patriae jurisdiction constitutes a serious interference with the psychological integrity of the parent…As an individual's status as a parent is often fundamental to personal identity, the stigma and distress resulting from a loss of parental status is a particularly serious consequence of the state's conduct.
>
> The Court went on to state that there are circumstances where loss of a child will not found a prima facie breach of s.7, including when a child is sent to prison or conscripted into the army. Clearly, these circumstances can be distinguished from the removal of a child from his/her home due to the government's failure to provide adequate funding and services (see Wen:de at, pp.96-97) (emphasis ours).
>
> The federal funding formula, directive 20-1, impacts a very vulnerable segment of our society, Aboriginal children. The protection of these children from state action, infringing on their most fundamental rights and freedoms, is clearly in line with the spirit of ss.7 and 15 of the Charter. Research conducted on the issue of child welfare plainly shows differentiation in the quality of services provided on and off reserve and to aboriginal and non-aboriginal children. This type of differentiation is unacceptable in a society that prides itself on protection of the vulnerable. (Wen:de at, pp.96-97) (emphasis ours).

[168] Furthermore, compelling evidence in other reports filed in evidence also discusses the psychological damage, pain and suffering endured by First Nations children and their families:

> WE BEGIN OUR DISCUSSION of social policy with a focus on the family because it is our conviction that much of the failure of responsibility that contributes to the current imbalance and distress in Aboriginal life centres around the family. Let us clarify at the outset that the failure of responsibility that we seek to understand and correct is not a failure of Aboriginal families. Rather, it is a failure of public policy to recognize and respect Aboriginal culture and family systems and to ensure a just distribution of the wealth and power of this land so that Aboriginal nations, communities and families can provide for themselves and determine how best to pursue a good life. (see RCAP, vol. 3, at, p. 8).
> Many experts in the child welfare field are coming to believe that the removal of any child from his/her parents is inherently damaging, in and of itself…. The effects of > apprehension on an individual Native child will often be much more traumatic than for his non-Native counterpart. Frequently, when the Native child is taken from his parents, he is also removed from a tightly knit community of extended family members and neighbours, who may have provided some support. In addition, he is removed from a unique, distinctive and familiar culture. The Native child is placed in a position of triple jeopardy (see RCAP, Gathering strength, vol. 3, at, pp. 23-24).

[169] The Panel finds there is absolutely no doubt that the removal of children from their families and communities is traumatic and causes great pain and suffering to them:

> At our hearings in Kenora, Josephine Sandy, who chairs Ojibway Tribal Family Services, explained what moved her and others to mobilize for change:
>
> Over the years, I watched the pain and suffering that resulted as non-Indian law came to control more and more of our lives and our traditional lands. I have watched my people struggle to survive in the face of this foreign law.
>
> Nowhere has this pain been more difficult to experience than in the area of family life. I and all other Anishnabe people of my generation have seen the pain and humiliation created by non-Indian child welfare agencies in removing hundreds of children from our communities in the fifties, sixties and the seventies. My people were suffering immensely as we had our way of life in our lands suppressed by the white man's law.
>
> This suffering was only made worse as we endured the heartbreak of having our families torn apart by non-Indian organizations created under this same white man's law.
>
> People like myself vowed that we would do something about this. We had to take control of healing the wounds inflicted on us in this tragedy.
>
> Josephine Sandy Chair, Ojibway Tribal Family Services Kenora, Ontario, 28 October 1992,
> (see RCAP, Gathering strength, vol. 3, at, p. 25) (emphasis ours).

[171] More recently, the Panel made findings that support the findings for pain and suffering of First Nations children and their families when the families are torn apart:

> Ms. Marie Wilson, one of the three Commissioners for the TRC mandated to facilitate truth-telling about the residential school experience and lead the country in a process of ongoing healing > and reconciliation, swore an affidavit that was filed into evidence in the motions' proceedings. She affirms that she personally bore witness to fifteen hundred statements made to the TRC. Many were from those who grew up as children in the foster care system as it currently exists. She also heard from hundreds of parents with children taken into care. Over and over again, she states the Commissioners heard that the worst part of the Residential schools was not the sexual abuse but rather the rupture from the family and home and everything and everyone familiar and cherished. This was the worst aspect and the most universal amongst the voices they heard. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 122).

>
> Ms. Wilson notes in her affidavit that children removed from their parents to be placed in foster care shared similar experiences to those who went to residential schools. The day they remember most vividly was the day they were taken from their home. She mentions, as the Commissioners have said in their report, that child welfare may be considered a continuation of or, a replacement for the residential school system. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 123).
>
> Ms. Wilson affirms that they, (the TRC), intentionally centered their 5 first calls to Action specifically on child welfare. This was to shed a focused and prominent light on the fact that the harms of residential schools happened to children, that the greatest perceived damage to them was their removal from their home and family; and that the legacy of residential schools is not only continuing but getting worse, with increasing numbers of child apprehensions through the child welfare system. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, para. 124).

[184] The evidence is ample and sufficient to make a finding that each First Nations child who was unnecessarily removed from their home, family and community has suffered. Any child who was removed and later reunited with their family has suffered during the time of separation and from the lasting effects of trauma from the time of separation.

[185] The evidence is ample and sufficient to make a finding that each parent or grandparent who had one or more children under her or his care who was unnecessarily removed from their home, family and community has suffered. Any parent or grandparent if the parents were not caring for the child who had one or more children removed from them and later reunited with them has suffered during the time of separation. The Panel intends to compensate one or both parents who had their children removed from them and, if the parents were absent and the children were in the care of one or more grandparents, the grandparents caring for the children should be compensated. While the > Panel does not want to diminish the pain experienced by other family members such as other grandparents not caring for the child, siblings, aunts and uncles and the community, the Panel decided in light of the record before it to limit compensation to First Nations children and their parents or if there are no parents caring for the child or children, their grandparents.

>
> [186] The Panel also recognizes that the suffering can continue even when families are reunited given the gravity of the adverse impacts of breaking apart families and communities.
> [187] The Panel addressed the adverse impacts to children throughout the Decision. The Panel found a connection between the systemic racial discrimination and the adverse impacts and that those adverse impacts are harmful to First Nations children and their families. All are connected and supported by the evidence. The Panel acknowledged this suffering in its unchallenged Decision. It did not have individual children who testified to the adverse impacts that they have experienced nevertheless the Panel found that they did suffer those adverse impacts and found systemic racial discrimination based on sufficient evidence before it. The adverse impacts identified in the Decision and suffered by children and their families were found to be the result of the systemic racial discrimination in Canada's FNCFCS Program, funding formulas, authorities and practices.

[297] The Tribunal cannot reproduce all its lengthy findings in the Compensation Entitlement Decision, 2019 CHRT 39, and subsequent compensation process rulings. The above excerpts are to emphasize the point that, given the evidence before it, the Tribunal compensated removals of First Nations children as opposed to the time they spent in care. While the Tribunal agrees the systemic and racial discrimination is focused on how the Federal FNCFS Program adversely impacted First Nations children and families on reserve and in the Yukon, the Tribunal did not focus on ISC funded placements. This motion is the first time that the Tribunal heard of this narrower interpretation.

[298] Further, the AFN's submissions in this motion show that they were considered and then removed for reasons that the Tribunal was not able to consider at the time it made its compensation orders. The AFN argues in its supplementary written submissions that the only children entitled to compensation under the Tribunal's orders but not entitled to compensation under the FSA are those children placed into kith placements, being placements with friends. The AFN contends that this was a principled exclusion on the basis that kinship placements were already excluded from the scope of compensation and, to the AFN's mind, there was not a significant difference for First Nations between a kith and kinship placement. Given that the AFN did not see a significant difference between kith and kinship placements, the AFN maintains that it was a principled compromise during the negotiations to exclude kith placements from the scope of compensation under the FSA. The AFN also contends that expert evidence subsequent to the Tribunal approving the Compensation Framework indicates that it is not practical to collect data to enable compensation for children in kith and kinship placements. Using other methods to identify these children would result in retraumatizing them.

[299] The Tribunal does not have sufficient evidence before it to accept the AFN's contention that restricting the scope of compensation to children placed in ISC-funded care would only exclude children placed in kith and kinship care and not other First Nations children removed from their homes, families and communities. The Caring Society correctly indicates that the terminology for different types of placements varies across Canada as different provincial legislation uses different terms.

[300] The Caring Society's interpretation is correct when it submits that the Compensation Framework itself also indicates a broad-based approach. Contrary to the class action Final Settlement Agreement, which privileges using ISC records to determine eligibility, the CHRT Compensation Framework contemplates ISC proactively reaching out to professionals, service providers and provincial/territorial governments to identify beneficiaries (sections 5.3-5.5) and specifically contemplates obtaining assistance from child and family service agencies across the country (section 5.6(c)) and from provincial and territorial governments (section 5.7(a)). The CHRT Compensation Framework further states that the work required for service providers to bring this information forward will be funded by Canada (sections 5.4 and 5.6(b)). The CHRT Compensation Framework stated that the result of the information gathering efforts by ISC, FNCFS Agencies and provincial/territorial governments would be a "Compensation List", being a list of individuals on which there was agreement regarding eligibility for compensation (section 8.3). Individuals not on the Compensation List would still be able to apply to have their claim considered (section 8.7).

[301] The Caring Society's assertion is correct that the detailed process outlined in sections 5.3 to 5.8 to generate section 8.3's CHRT Compensation List, as well as the residual ability to apply for compensation included in section 8.7, would not have been required if compensation was limited to ISC-funded placements. As the AFN has made clear in its submissions, ISC-funded placements can be identified by ISC data alone, and do not require access to the wide array of sources identified in the CHRT Compensation Framework. The Tribunal agrees this in and of itself is evidence of the Compensation Framework's broad approach to implementing the Tribunal's orders. This approach was agreed to by the Caring Society and the AFN, and by Canada subject to its objections in its judicial review.

[302] Further, the Tribunal has insufficient evidence to understand how many children would be excluded by limiting compensation to those First Nations children placed in ISC-funded care. While the Tribunal would be concerned even if it is a small number of children who would be excluded, the Tribunal did not have an opportunity to assess how many children were at risk of being excluded.

[303] The AFN and Canada support their request to use ISC-funded placements as a measure of eligibility because of the challenges identifying First Nations children in other types of placements. As noted consistently in its retention of jurisdiction, the Tribunal is open to addressing issues that arise in implementing its orders. However, the nature of this motion did not allow the Tribunal to test the evidence relating to the challenges asserted by the AFN. The timelines required for this motion to meet the AFN and Canada's deadlines in the Federal Court were such that procedural fairness did not allow the other parties to test the AFN's assertion that it would not be feasible to identify affected First Nations children outside of ISC-funded placements. There was not enough time for the other parties to conduct a detailed cross-examination of the AFN's witnesses and for the other parties to call their own evidence, which may have included expert evidence. This is particularly true given that the more detailed information provided by the AFN was filed as a result of the Panel's follow-up questions after the hearing.

[304] As such, the Tribunal is not in a position based on the current evidentiary record to make a determination of how significant the challenges are in compensating First Nations children who were in non-ISC funded placements.

[305] It is unfair to those victims/survivors whose rights are now advocated by the Caring Society to remove compensation from them without adjudication and findings of the difficulties in locating them. The evidence raised in response to the Panel Chair's questions do not allow the Panel to make the appropriate findings at this time. The Panel welcomes a further consideration by way of a motion of this discrete issue and any other interpretation issues, such as the issue of biological parents, that appear to be contentious.

[306] Of note, at the time of the compensation hearing that led to the Compensation Decision, 2019 CHRT 39, the AFN, joined by other First Nations parties, urged the Tribunal demonstrate courage and to order compensation even if it could be difficult to locate beneficiaries. The First Nations parties argued that the difficulty of identifying victims should not prevent the Tribunal from making orders. This is what the Tribunal did:

> [188] The Panel need not hear from every First Nations child to assess that being forcibly removed from their homes, families and communities can cause great harm and pain. The expert evidence has already established that. The CHRA regime is different than that of a Court where a class action may be filed. The CHRA model is based on a human rights approach that is purposive and liberal and that is aimed at vindicating the victims of discriminatory practices whether considered systemic or not (see section 50 (3) (c) of the CHRA). We are talking about the mass removal of children from their respective Nations. (see 2018 CHRT 4 at, paras. 47, 62, 66, 121, and 133). The Tribunal's mandate is within a quasi-constitutional statute with a special legislative regime to remedy discrimination. This is the first process to employ when deciding issues before it. If the CHRA and the human rights case law are silent, it may be useful to look to other regimes when appropriate. In the present case, the CHRA and human rights case law voice a possible way forward. The novelty and unchartered territory found in a case should not intimidate human rights decision-makers to pioneer a right and just path forward for victims/survivors if supported by the evidence and the Statute. As argued by the Commission, sufficiency of evidence is a material consideration.

[307] As it will be explained below, the Tribunal did not have any indication the parties would adopt this interpretation. This is confirmed by the finalization of the Draft Compensation Framework which will be further addressed below.

[308] Moreover, the question of other factors that play a role in removals was addressed by this Panel in the Compensation Entitlement Decision, 2019 CHRT 39:

> [177] Also, to the question what if the child was unnecessarily removed as a result of multiple factors and not solely because of Canada's actions? The Panel answers that while the Panel acknowledges that child welfare issues > are multifaceted and may involve the interplay of numerous underlying factors (see for example, 2016 CHRT 2 [Merit] Decision at, para. 187) this does not alleviate Canada's responsibility in the suffering of First Nations children and their families who bore the adverse impacts of Canada's control over the provision of child and family services on First Nations reserves and in the Yukon by the application of the funding formulas under the FNCFS Program.

[309] The Tribunal focused on the adverse impacts of the Federal Program causing harm to First Nations children and families and not whether the First Nations child was placed in ISC funded care. What happens if as a result of the Federal Program, a First Nations child is removed and placed in care but not funded by ISC? The Tribunal was not confronted with this question until now and, therefore, could not have made any order with this rationale in mind.

[310] The Tribunal confirms the proper characterization of the Tribunal's orders is held by the Caring Society as summarized below. Notably, the Caring Society's accurate understanding of the Tribunal's rulings and the absence of a disagreement on the interpretation until now even when the parties were working collaboratively on the compensation process suggests the issue became one when choices were made on who should be removed under the FSA to ensure sufficient funds were there for the other categories of victims/survivors and regardless of binding orders from this Tribunal.

[311] In January 2022, the Caring Society wrote to the AFN and advised the AFN it would not agree to a reduction of compensation for children victims/survivors who were entitled to the maximum compensation under the Tribunal's orders. The Caring Society also wrote that any adult victims (i.e., parents and caregiving grandparents) eligible to receive $40,000 in compensation per 2019 CHRT 39 and 2021 CHRT 7 shall not have their entitlement unduly infringed save and except in circumstances where class action counsel and Canada can demonstrate that lower amounts are just compensation for the infringement of dignity and wilful and reckless discrimination found by the Tribunal, (see letter of January 21, 2022, exhibit A, to the affidavit of Jasmine Kaur, dated August 5, 2022).

[312] The AFN and Canada did not seek prior clarification from the Tribunal on this point even though the parties came back to the Tribunal to request an amendment to the end date for compensation and other long-term reform orders.

[313] However, the Tribunal has indicated in its letter-decision that it is open to clarify this order should the parties wish to obtain clarification and if changes are needed. This should be dealt with after a motion with proper notice and new evidence is provided in order to ensure fairness to the victims/survivors.

[314] The Panel agrees with the Caring Society that there appears to be a fundamental misunderstanding regarding the scope of Canada's discriminatory conduct in this case: the Tribunal ordered compensation for Canada's conduct (including the under-funding of prevention services and least disruptive measures) incentivizing children being unnecessarily moved from their home, family and community during child welfare involvement. The case did not address whether a child was placed in care funded by ISC after their removal.

The Tribunal never limited Canada's liability, and children's eligibility, based on whether a child's placement after removal was funded by ISC. Canada's funding of actual maintenance costs contributed to the systemic racial discrimination by creating an incentive to place children in care but did not limit discrimination to those children placed in care funded by ISC. The Panel's experience throughout has been to focus on the harm experienced by the affected children based on Canada's discriminatory and underfunded provision of child and family services.

[315] This was addressed in 2019 CHRT 39:

> [180] Those formulas are structured in such a way that they promote negative outcomes for First Nations children and families, namely the incentive to take children into care. The result is many First Nations children and families are denied the opportunity to remain together or be reunited in a timely manner (see 2016 CHRT 2 [Merit] Decision at, paras. 111; 113; 349).
> [181] The Panel already found the link between the removal of children and Canada's responsibility in numerous findings including the following: "Yet, this funding formula continues. As the Auditor General puts it, "Quite frankly, one has to ask why a program goes on for 20 years, the world changes around it, and yet the formula stays the same, preventative services aren't funded, and all these children are being put into care." (see 2016 CHRT 2 Decision at, para. 197).

[316] In 2019 CHRT 39 at para. 168, the Tribunal found “experts in the child welfare field are coming to believe that the removal of any child from his/her parents is inherently damaging in and of itself […] The effects of apprehension on an individual Native child will often be much more traumatic than for his non-Native counterpart.”

[317] The Tribunal recognized that removing a child from their family is always a harmful event and particularly problematic when it could have been prevented with appropriate services. The Tribunal found that the discriminatory underfunding of prevention services increased the likelihood of children being unnecessarily removed from their homes (2016 CHRT 2 at paras 314 and 346; 2019 CHRT 39 at paras 165 and 177). This initial removal was discriminatory regardless of whether the child’s subsequent placement was funded by ISC.

[318] The Tribunal agrees with the Caring Society, the insidious nature of the discrimination spread throughout the continuum of child and family services: from the moment a referral was received to the long-term placement of a child, and all the services (or lack of services) in between. One of the critical findings of the Tribunal was its determination that the failure to equitably fund prevention services and least disruptive measures led to higher rates of children having to unnecessarily leave their homes, (2016 CHRT 2 at paras 314 and 346; 2019 CHRT 39 at paras 165 and 177).

[319] The Tribunal agrees with the Caring Society that it never squarely defined the meaning of “in care” in its reasons because such a definition was never needed, as the systemic discrimination acutely arose from the discriminatory underfunding and lack of preventative services and least disruptive measures that led to the removal. This discrimination was further exacerbated by Canada’s funding models that covered the actual costs of maintenance, further incentivizing the removal of First Nations children to be placed in foster care and other state funded placements. But the systemic discrimination was never confined in the way that is now being suggested in this motion – First Nations children who were removed were harmed and experienced an infringement of their human rights and dignity when they were deprived to receive preventative services and least disruptive measures due to Canada’s discriminatory conduct.

[320] The Tribunal will not revisit all its findings as this is not a review of its previous decisions nor should a collateral attack occur as part of this motion. The appropriate way is to bring a motion to allow the Tribunal to consider new information and evidence and determine if an amendment is warranted in light of the legal analysis provided above and continued below.

[321] The Tribunal will now turn to the parties' work on the Compensation Framework and how the Tribunal interpreted such work.

[322] As explained above, the Tribunal in order to issue the consent order in 2021 CHRT 7 considered the Compensation Framework and accompanying schedules. This included schedule B: Taxonomy of compensation categories for First Nations Children, Youth and Families: Canadian Human Rights Tribunal Ruling 2019 CHRT 39 (the Taxonomy). The Compensation Framework references the Taxonomy and explains its role in the compensation process and in locating the potential beneficiaries:

> a) The Taxonomy was designed for child and family services providers to assist in the process of identifying and locating potential beneficiaries; however, a feasibility investigation is underway to determine if, and how, it can assist other service providers to identify beneficiaries.
> b) Canada will fund any adaptations required to apply this Taxonomy to meet the needs of specific service provider communities, as determined by the independent experts who drafted the taxonomy in Schedule "B".
>
> c) Identifying children who were necessarily and unnecessarily removed will likely require assistance from child and family service agencies across the country. The Taxonomy is intended to guide their review of individual records in their possession so as to expedite the process of identifying and locating potential beneficiaries and ultimately validation of claims for compensation.
>
> 5.6 The report entitled "Canadian Human Rights Tribunal (CHRT) Ruling 2019 CHRT 39: Taxonomy of compensation categories for First Nations children, youth and families" dated November 2019 and authored by Marina Sistovaris, PhD, Professor Barbara Fallon, PhD, Marie Saint Girons, MSW and Meghan Sangster, Med, MSW of the Policy Bench: Fraser Mustard Institute for Human Development will assist in the identification of potential beneficiaries (the "Taxonomy"). The Taxonomy is attached as Schedule "B".

[323] The Taxonomy was also found to be in line with the Tribunal's reasons and orders and therefore was accepted by the Tribunal before it rendered its last ruling on compensation in 2021 CHRT 7.

[324] The Taxonomy is informative in many aspects and supports the Tribunal's reasons and orders. The Taxonomy's purpose is as follows:

> The purpose of this briefing note is to: (1) develop a taxonomy of compensation categories; and (2) frame questions that will help guide individuals appointed by the Canadian Human Right Tribunal (CHRT) to carry out the process of identifying individuals eligible to receive compensation according to the conditions set out by 2019 CHRT 39. The development of compensation categories and framing of questions involved:
>
> a) a content review of the 2019 CHRT 39 ruling;
>
> b) mapping out the compensation categories, identifying common themes and defining key terms and concepts;
>
> c) reviewing provincial and territorial child welfare legislation, identifying and defining key terms and concepts;
>
> d) analyzing and synthesizing information concerning the 2019 CHRT 39 ruling and child welfare legislation in Canada; and
> e) framing questions corresponding to the compensation categories.

[325] The Taxonomy clearly follows the Tribunal's reasons and orders and takes into account the subsequent compensation rulings that were issued as clarification:

> 2.0 Background
>
> On September 6, 2019, the CHRT issued the eighth non-compliance order—2019 CHRT 39—concerning compensation for First Nations children, youth and families negatively impacted by Canada's child welfare system. The CHRT found that Canada's "willful and reckless conduct" and discriminatory child welfare practices have contributed to the ongoing pain and suffering of First Nations children, families and communities. According to the Tribunal's ruling, the Government of Canada is required to pay First Nations children, youth and families the maximum amount of compensation permitted under the 1985 Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA) who were: unnecessarily placed in care since January 1, 2006; necessarily placed in care but outside of their extended families since January 1, 2006 or denied or delayed receiving services between December 12, 2007 and November 2, 2017 as a result of the Government of Canada's discriminatory application of Jordan's Principle.

(emphasis added).

[326] The Taxonomy document is also instructive on the categories of beneficiaries covered under the Tribunal's orders. Again, the Tribunal upon review of the taxonomy document did not identify discrepancies, contradictions or concerns:

> 4.0 Compensation Categories
>
> Three central compensation categories are extrapolated from the 2019 CHRT 39 ruling:
>
> > Category 1: Compensation for First Nations Children and their Parents or Grandparents in Cases of Unnecessary Removal of a Child in the Child Welfare System;
> >
> > Category 2: Compensation for First Nations Children in Cases of Necessary Removal of a Child in the Child Welfare System
> >
> > Category 3: First Nations Children and their Parents or Grandparents in Cases of Unnecessary Removal of a Child to Obtain Essential Services and/or Experienced Gaps, Delays and Denials of Services that Would Have Been Available under Jordan's Principle.
>
> These have been further divided into subcategories, for which the eligibility requirements are explained below. Each category is detailed in the taxonomy document.

[327] Further, the taxonomy document also describes out-of-home care placements and includes kinship care and a variety of placements:

> 5.9 Out-of-Home Care/Placement
>
> Out-of-Home Care/Placement: "[E]ncompasses the placements and services provided to children and families when children are removed from their home due to abuse and/or neglect" (Child Welfare Information Gateway, n.d.: Overview Out-of-Home Care). Placement outcomes include:
>
> > a) "Kinship Out of Care: An informal placement has been arranged within the family support network; the child welfare authority does not have temporary custody.
> >
> > b) Customary Care: [A] model of Indigenous child welfare service that is culturally relevant and incorporates the unique traditions and customs of each First Nation.
> > c) Kinship in Care: A formal placement has been arranged within the family support network; the child welfare authority has temporary or full custody and is paying for the placement.

> d) Foster Care (Non-Kinship): Include any family-based care, including foster homes, specialized treatment foster homes, and assessment homes.
>
> e) Group Home: Out-of-home placement required in a structured group living setting.
>
> f) Residential/Secure Treatment: Placement required in a therapeutic residential treatment centre to address the needs of the child." (Fallon et al., 2015, p. 105).

Out-of-home placement can sometimes lead to reunification, adoption, or legal guardianship:

> Reunification: "[T]he return of children to their family following placement in out-of-home care" (Canadian Child Welfare Research Portal, n.d., Reunification).
>
> Adoption: "The social, emotional, and legal process through which children who will not be raised by their birth parents become full and permanent legal members of another family while maintaining genetic and psychological connections to their birth family" (Child Welfare Information Gateway, n.d., Glossary).
> Legal guardianship: "Guardianship is most frequently used when relative caregivers wish to provide a permanent home for the child and maintain the child's relationships with extended family members without a termination of parental rights. Caregivers can assume legal guardianship of a child in out-of-home care without termination of parental rights, as is required for an adoption." (Child Welfare Information Gateway, n.d., Guardianship).

[328] The Tribunal agrees with the parties who submit the Compensation Framework is more akin to a reference document and, therefore, the Tribunal's orders prevail. However, the Tribunal made its orders in 2021 CHRT 7 and incorporated the Compensation Framework in its orders after finding it was in line with its findings and orders. The Compensation Framework is therefore highly relevant to determine if the non-ISC funded placements were included in the Tribunal's orders. While the Compensation Framework can be further amended and is less static than the formal entitlement and quantum orders made by this Tribunal, it is a clear indication of what the Tribunal considered at the time it made its orders. The fact that the AFN and Canada now limit its meaning and value to support carving out certain children does not change what the Tribunal considered at the time it made its compensation orders. Moreover, if the Compensation Framework referring to the taxonomy document ought to be set aside for the purposes of analyzing the compensation and related beneficiaries, there was no need for the parties to wait for its finalization after the Tribunal clarified definitions and categories. This is not the logic that was followed in this case regardless of what the AFN and Canada are now stating. The Tribunal was asked to clarify a number of orders and definitions for the parties to be able to finalize the Compensation Framework. The parties requested those clarifications and advised the Tribunal this would assist in finalizing the Compensation Framework. The Tribunal ordered the parties to develop a compensation process. The Compensation Framework is part of that process. Denying it now to justify the FSA is of no help. The Compensation Framework needed to be finalized before developing a guide for compensation distribution which is one of the final stages of the compensation process. This guide was not developed given that Canada judicially reviewed the Tribunal's compensation rulings. Back-peddling to erase this to support disentitlements is of no use and is completely rejected here. A better view of this, is if new evidence which is properly tested demonstrates impossibilities or serious impracticalities for this category of beneficiaries, then, further order requests in keeping with the best interests of those children, could potentially be made given this evidence was not available at the time the Tribunal made its orders.

[329] Further, the Tribunal considered the Framework and how it described removals of children in broad and non-exhaustive terms. This was found in line with the Tribunal's findings and orders:

> 4.2.1. "Necessary/Unnecessary Removal" includes:
>
> > a) children removed from their families and placed in alternative care pursuant to provincial/territorial child and family services legislation, including, but not limited to, kinship and various custody agreements entered into between authorized child and family services officials and the parent(s) or caregiving grandparent(s);
> >
> > b) children removed due to substantiated maltreatment and substantiated risks for maltreatment; and
> > c) children removed prior to January 1, 2006, but who were in care as of that date.

[330] The Framework explains how the description above applies to the compensation process and identification of potential beneficiaries of the Tribunal's compensation:

> 4.2. For greater certainty, the following definitions apply for the purpose of identifying beneficiaries:

[331] To be clear, the Panel agrees with the AFN that compensation is linked to the systemic discrimination found by this Tribunal in the provision of services through the Federal FNCFS Program. However, the nuance newly made by the AFN and Canada does not reflect the spirit of the Tribunal's rulings. It transforms the focus from what led to the removals to once removed who pays for this child's care.

B. Estates of caregiving parents and grandparents

[332] Estates of deceased caregiving parents and grandparents in the FSA are not entitled to direct financial compensation unless the caregiver passes away after submitting an application for compensation. In contrast, the Tribunal's orders provide compensation to the estates of eligible caregivers regardless of when they passed.

[333] This is a clear derogation from the Tribunal's orders. As such, the key consideration is whether the Tribunal is prepared to accept this derogation, either by amending its orders or granting the AFN and Canada's request to find the FSA satisfies the Tribunal's orders notwithstanding this clear derogation.

[334] The parties to the FSA indicate that they are seeking to achieve proportional compensation commensurate to harm suffered within a historically large, but fixed settlement amount. To achieve this, one area where the parties have taken a more limited approach to compensation than what was ordered by the Tribunal is with respect to the estates of deceased class members: only the deceased members of the Removed Child, Jordan's Principle and Trout Child classes as described in the FSA are entitled to compensation. The AFN and Canada submit in the joint motion that the fundamental principles guiding the parties was that, where compromise is necessary, compensation for children must be given priority. The parties are mindful of the Panel's observation that "the discriminatory practices at stake involved the forced separation of families and communities, and could therefore have intergenerational impacts." Although there are limits on which estates of class members will be eligible for compensation, safeguarding compensation for deceased members of the child classes allows compensation to still flow through to the heirs of those children who were the youngest victims of the discriminatory practices.

[335] The FSA establishes a mechanism for those who do not receive direct compensation to benefit from the terms of the FSA by way of the establishment of a Cy-près fund of $50 million. The First Nations-led Cy-près Fund will be endowed with $50 million.

[336] The FSA contemplates that some members of the various family classes may not receive direct compensation but will benefit from the Cy-près Fund.

[337] The Tribunal, encouraged by the AFN, already rejected in its Compensation Decision that compensation be paid into a support fund in lieu of direct financial compensation and found this should be paid in addition to financial compensation.

[338] The FSA disentitles the estates of deceased caregiving parents and grandparents to direct financial compensation.

[339] Canada opposed paying compensation to estates. The Tribunal rejected this position as part of its Compensation Decision as it would have allowed Canada to benefit from delaying compensation to victims of its discrimination which is not consistent with the objectives of the CHRA.

[340] The Tribunal understands why the AFN made this choice and that this choice is a possible option when negotiating a settlement. However, entitlement orders were already made by this Tribunal after evidence-based findings and orders. Agreeing with the AFN's choice would collaterally attack the Tribunal's findings and orders that granted compensation to the estates of deceased parents or grandparents. When the Tribunal entitled those estates to compensation, it did so in light of the evidence and found the orders were warranted under the CHRA, quasi-constitutional legislation that confers discretion to Tribunal members to order compensation if justified. This is made even stronger when those orders were found reasonable by the Federal Court. The fact that a cap has now been placed for compensation by Canada and the need to include class action victims/survivors who were outside these proceedings to allow Canada to settle all claims related to its widespread systemic discrimination does not trump the Tribunal's orders. Canada cannot contract out from its obligations under the CHRA and Tribunal orders by simply stating this is the AFN's choice. Allowing this would transform the human rights regime and usurp the Tribunal and reviewing Court's roles. Moreover, this is the AFN's choice because of the added class actions and the fixed funds. Notably, the AFN requested compensation for estates of deceased parents and grandparents. The Tribunal considered their submissions alongside the other parties' submissions and considered the evidence and found this was warranted.

[341] The AFN and Canada have not convinced the Tribunal that its previous orders can be amended to reduce compensation or disentitle victims. Since orders are not simple recommendations, they cannot be disregarded. This could undermine the human rights process and the previous orders made in this case including the orders made in March 2022 that support an end date for compensation. There is a fundamental difference between settlements which may require compromise for financial or other reasons and the Tribunal proceedings. At the Tribunal, when a respondent advances financial hardship, it is allowed to present such arguments and supporting evidence as part of an undue hardship defence under section 15 (2) of the CHRA. The Tribunal considers the evidence and arguments of all parties and determines if the complaint is substantiated or if the respondent's defences stand and the complaint is dismissed. This is done through tested and weighed evidence and thorough consideration of the law, the arguments and all materials. Such a defence is not easy to make since it has to be demonstrated with the evidence. This goes to say that the Tribunal makes decisions based on facts, law and evidence. Of note, the Tribunal already found that Canada did not advance such a defence in this case.

[342] This is an important reason why the Tribunal is not convinced by the AFN and Canada's arguments on this point. Canada cannot indirectly do what it could not do before the Tribunal.

[343] Furthermore, settlements often occur prior to orders being made and if orders have already been made, settlements must not find ways to evade the orders.

[344] While estates are not people, the heirs of those estates are and they were signaled by the Tribunal's decision subsequently upheld by the Federal Court that they were entitled to compensation. It is unfair to now remove this from them because of financial choices resulting from merging proceedings and imposing a financial cap. These arguments are insufficient to justify an amendment to the Tribunal's orders on this point. As it will be revisited below, the Tribunal cannot amend its orders to reduce compensation or to disentitle victims/survivors. The Tribunal could accept variations of its orders if it does not remove gains for victims/survivors or a different compensation process and if supported by the evidence, which is a key consideration for this Tribunal for any order.

[345] Finally, while the Tribunal recognizes the importance of respecting the inherent rights of self-governing First Nations who decide for themselves, which has been honored for the reform aspect of these proceedings and also reflected as part of the Tribunal in 2018 CHRT 4 orders, in terms of compensation, the Tribunal would have more latitude if it was not asked to reduce or revoke individual rights of victims/survivors.

[346] There is a real difficulty to have a complainant requesting orders, leading evidence and then changing its mind in part because a respondent controls the process in limiting the amounts of funds for multiple proceedings against it without regard for previous orders.

[347] When the AFN requested the Tribunal's compensation orders it did so on behalf of self-governing First Nations supported by evidence and resolutions.

[348] The Tribunal found it had resolutions and were mandated to request the orders. The Tribunal notes that the AFN also brought these complaints and actively advocated for the individual compensation the Tribunal ordered. It did this on the basis of resolutions by the Chiefs-in-Assembly. Now the AFN changed its mind and now asks this Tribunal to honor a First Nations-led process that rescinds some First Nations Peoples rights because of compromise.

[349] If honoring the inherent right of self-government of First Nations under the CHRA means that we must honour the First Nations who change their minds after orders are made with disregard to the evidence that led to those orders, the Tribunal believes it should be clearly expressed in legislative amendments because it is counterintuitive to the current human rights regime and the legitimacy of the Tribunal's mandate. Otherwise, Tribunal orders must be seen as binding and victims/survivors regardless of their national origin must be able to rely on these orders once they are made. Again, changing one's mind in this case after orders are made is less an issue if rights are not infringed upon and if the evidence supports it and the retention of jurisdiction allows it.

[350] For the above reasons, the Tribunal cannot find the FSA fully satisfies the Tribunal's orders for this category of victims. Moreover, the Tribunal cannot amend its orders to reflect the FSA as it would be rescinding its findings and orders making them meaningless, non-authoritative and fleeting. Further, the arguments in support of the amendments have not convinced the Tribunal that these amendments are justified or that they can be done in this human rights framework.

C. Certain caregiving parents and grandparents will receive less compensation

[351] The AFN indicates there are two points where the removed child family class may deviate from the Tribunal's Compensation Framework. First, caregiving parents and grandparents will receive additional compensation up to $60,000 in the event they had multiple children removed rather than multiples of $40,000.

[352] The second change is that if there is an unexpected number of claimants, compensation may be reduced to ensure that all caregiving parent and grandparent victims receive compensation.

[353] The maximum compensation of $60,000 similarly ensures there are enough funds to compensate all eligible caregiving parents and grandparents.

[354] Further, family class members who are not eligible for direct compensation can still benefit from the Cy-près fund.

[355] Again, the AFN clearly admits a derogation from the Tribunal's orders and the main reason is to ensure there are sufficient funds available for everyone in light of the fixed amount of funds for compensation in the FSA.

[356] The Tribunal's orders account for the compound effect on a caregiving parent or grandparent who has already experienced the pain and suffering of the removal of a child and now experiences the egregious harm of losing another one or more children as a result of the systemic racial discrimination. The FSA reduces the amount of compensation for those victims/survivors who were retraumatized and suffered greatly. Losing more than one child heightens the presence of a willful and reckless behavior; it does not reduce it. The Tribunal emphasized that, given this was the worst-case scenario, maximum compensation should be paid for the removal of each child. While the harm suffered warrants more than $40,000 per child removed, the CHRA places a cap on compensation. The FSA chips away at the heart of the willful and reckless discriminatory practice found and the orders that signal to Canada that its behavior was devoid of caution and caused compounded harm to parents and grandparents in removing more than one child.

[357] Those findings were made after carefully considering the evidence and submissions and nothing in this joint motion changes this. While the Tribunal understands the need for compromise as part of the settlement negotiations, the result is that the Tribunal orders that recognized this category of victims/survivors will be significantly reduced not based on evidence but rather to ensure everyone can receive some compensation within the fixed pot of compensation funds.

[358] The Tribunal appreciates that the AFN wanted to prioritize children in the FSA. However, this choice between parent or grandparent and child does not form part of the Tribunal's compensation orders. Under the Tribunal compensation process no one needs to yield compensation to the other. Moreover, the FSA needed to adopt such an approach given the broader number of victims/survivors and the fixed pot of compensation funds. This was not a consideration before the Tribunal when it made its compensation orders. Again, Canada did not make an undue hardship cost defence to limit compensation.

[359] This is the equivalent of asking the Tribunal to change its findings concerning the harms suffered by the parents and grandparents who saw multiple children removed. Similar to the reasons stated above, this is akin to a collateral attack to the Tribunal's compensation decisions. Furthermore, as it will be explained below, amendments cannot be made to reduce the entitlements that were made by this Tribunal based on evidence and the law. Even if we were wrong on this point, no convincing evidence was presented to justify such an amendment.

[360] Again, for the above reasons, the Tribunal cannot find the FSA fully satisfies the Tribunal's orders for this category of victims/survivors.

D. Some Jordan's Principle victims/survivors may receive less compensation

[361] The AFN contends that the process for compensating Jordan's Principle victims generally follows the principles identified by the Tribunal. The FSA aims to ensure that children who suffered discrimination and were objectively impacted are compensated through a process that is objective and efficient and the definition of essential services is reasonable. The process focuses on establishing a confirmed need for an essential service that was the subject of a delay, denial or service gap. Those claimants who are most impacted will receive at least $40,000 while those who are less seriously impacted will receive up to $40,000. The FSA dedicates a budget of $3 billion to the Jordan's Principle child class. The larger budget estimated for the Jordan's Principle class despite the smaller projected size of that class accounts for the intention to ensure—to the extent possible in a class of unknown size—payment of $40,000 to those Jordan's Principle survivors who would have benefitted from a $40,000 payment under the Tribunal's Compensation Order.

[362] The AFN also submits the FSA and the claims process described therein which is to be developed by the parties generally follow the principles established by the Tribunal and set criteria that are amenable to objective implementation. The goal in the FSA is to ensure that those children who suffered discrimination and were objectively impacted are compensated consistent with the Tribunal's reasoning that the compensation process should be objective and efficient, and the definition of essential services must be reasonable. The process primarily focuses on a confirmed need for an essential service that was the subject of a delay, denial or service gap within the bounds of reasonableness.

[363] Notably, the AFN submits this accounts for the significant uncertainty in the class size and is expected to result in children who were eligible for Jordan's Principle compensation under the Tribunal's orders receiving at least $40,000.

[364] The framework to determine what is an essential service will be developed with the assistance of experts.

[365] The starting point is the list of services currently eligible for Jordan's Principle funding. The process aims to treat children as significantly impacted if there is evidence to support such a conclusion. The process is designed to be flexible so that it can consider services that are essential for a particular child but are not generally essential services. The process does not require interviews or examinations of claimants. There is a recognition that the type of documentation required to support a claim might vary.

[366] The AFN explains that only caregiving parents and grandparents of Jordan's Principle and Trout class children who suffered a significant impact will receive compensation. This narrowed eligibility occurred because the number of caregiving parents and grandparents was unknown. Caregivers who do not receive a direct benefit would nonetheless benefit from the Cy-près fund.

[367] There is no dispute on the fact that this also is a derogation from the Tribunal's orders. The AFN clearly submits this approach departs from the Tribunal's orders.

[368] There are outstanding items in the FSA to be determined on which the plaintiffs are actively in conversations with a First Nations-led Circle of Experts. These include finalizing the Jordan's Principle assessment methodology. Members of the Jordan's Principle Class and the Trout Child Class will be determined based on their "Confirmed Need" for an "Essential Service."

[369] Under the Tribunal's approach, all First Nations children eligible for compensation related to Jordan's Principle are entitled to $40,000 in compensation. However, under the FSA, only children who experienced a "Significant Impact" will be guaranteed to receive $40,000, although they may receive more than this. The concept of a "Significant Impact" is set out in the Framework of Essential Services.

[370] The definition of a "Significant Impact" will evidently determine whether First Nations children will be guaranteed at least $40,000 under the FSA or whether they may be in a category that could receive less than $40,000. "Significant Impact" is defined in the Framework of Essential Services, which was developed after the FSA and made public on August 19, 2022. The Framework of Essential Services defines a service as “essential” if the claimant’s condition or circumstances required it and the delay in receiving it, or not receiving it at all, caused material impact on the child.

[371] Canada disagrees with the Caring Society that this motion is premature because there are steps yet to be taken leading to the implementation of the settlement, primarily dealing with the details of the Jordan’s Principle assessment methodology and the distribution protocol, which is scheduled to be reviewed by the Federal Court on December 20, 2022.

[372] Canada submits that it is clear from the explanation set out in the September 6, affidavit of Janice Ciavaglia and attached report that the parties are proceeding on a phased basis that includes ongoing consultation with experts, rights holders and claimants in order to ensure that when finalized and approved by the Court, there will be broad acceptance by First Nations and claimants of the process. Canada supports this approach and submits that the motion is not premature as the interests of potential claimants will be adequately considered by the Federal Court in its review of the methodology and protocol.

[373] The Tribunal agrees with the Caring Society that it is impossible at the current point in time to know whether the implementation of Jordan’s Principle under the FSA will result in the First Nations children identified under the Tribunal’s orders receiving $40,000 under the FSA. This remains a source of uncertainty and there is little evidence of whether Jordan’s Principle eligibility under the FSA will be interpreted in such a manner that it provides the victims/survivors under the Tribunal’s orders the full entitlement they would have received under those orders.

[374] While the Tribunal understands the rationale for the FSA’s phased approach on this aspect, the Tribunal is at a very different stage in the proceedings and has a different mandate and uses a different approach under the CHRA. The Tribunal makes findings based on the evidence before it. The Tribunal ensured it remained seized of the compensation aspects that are not finalized which required additional evidence. For the compensation process as a whole under the Compensation Framework, the Tribunal remains seized of all its compensation decisions, including to ensure the implementation of the Compensation Framework.

[375] The FSA sets out future work that is required before there can be certainty regarding which victims/survivors under the Tribunal compensation orders will be eligible under the FSA. While the way the parties to the FSA are proceeding may be appropriate under the Federal Court process, the Tribunal is asked to accept the end of its jurisdiction on the compensation issue without having the full picture or evidence on this point as opposed to the Federal Court who will supervise the implementation of the FSA.

[376] Further, the Tribunal's role includes making findings on the evidence presented and, on this point, it is difficult to make proper findings to fully assess this important category which indicates that the request may be premature for this Tribunal for this category.

[377] In order to be eligible for a guaranteed $40,000 Jordan's Principle compensation under the FSA, First Nations children must have both experienced a denial or delay in receiving an essential service and have experienced a "significant impact" because of the delay or denial. Article 6.06(3) of the FSA indicates that a "significant impact" will be defined in the Framework of Essential Services:

> 3) The Framework of Essential Services will establish a method to assess two categories of Essential Services based on advice from experts relating to objective criteria:
>
> > (a) Essential Services relating to Children whose circumstances, based on an Essential Service that they are confirmed to have needed, are expected to have included significant impact ("Significant Impact Essential Service"); and
> > (b) Essential Services that are not expected to have necessarily related to significant impact ("Other Essential Service").

[378] Nonetheless, the Framework on Essential Services does not provide further guidance on a "significant impact" and what is required to engage the higher level of compensation. Neither is "Significant Impact" a defined term in the FSA. Without this information, individual claimants cannot determine whether they could be entitled to more or less compensation under the FSA than they would be eligible to obtain under the Tribunal's orders.

[379] The uncertainties in benefits from the outstanding definition of an “essential service” reflects the early stages of a negotiated settlement. That is appropriate for an attempt to settle a class action in the early stages but it is not appropriate for the current Tribunal process where entitlements to compensation have already been determined based on the evidence. Moreover, this does not harmonize well with a Tribunal that has already made findings on evidence and corresponding orders. Further, as mentioned above, this may depart from the Tribunal’s orders for this category and therefore cannot be considered to fully satisfy the Tribunal’s orders. As for the request for amendment of the Tribunal’s orders to reflect this departure, the request is premature since there are uncertainties at this time, the amendments are understandably not well defined by the AFN and Canada given the uncertainties and, finally, there is a real potential for reduction in compensation for some victims and disentitlements for others which is not permissible.

E. Conclusion on Derogations

[380] While it is obvious that one of the reasons the AFN and Canada are proposing compromising the compensation ordered to victims/survivors in this case is the fixed amount of funds Canada provided to resolve this issue, the Tribunal is not suggesting that Canada should provide unlimited funding. The compensation orders require finite compensation to a finite class of victims/survivors. While the exact number of victims/survivors eligible for compensation is not known, it is not an unlimited number.

[381] The Tribunal’s intent was never to allow parties to bargain away the compensation. Given the serious discrimination in this case, the Tribunal intended to provide the maximum compensation to recognized victims/survivors under the Tribunal’s orders and allow them to avail themselves of other recourses should they wish to do so, which would potentially allow them to obtain more than what is possible under the CHRA limit of $40,000 in compensation. The FSA, while advantageous for the majority of victims/survivors, it reduces this already low amount for other victims. The core message of the Tribunal’s Compensation Decision was received by the AFN and Canada for most children but not for the caregiving parent and grandparent victims, including their estates. Nevertheless, the Tribunal found they are entitled to the maximum compensation permissible under the CHRA.

[382] Finally, once the evidence before the Tribunal establishes pain and suffering, remedies must follow. Compromises and caps on fixed funds in negotiations do not change this proposition.

[383] This Tribunal previously found "when evidence establishes pain and suffering, an attempt to compensate for it must be made'' (see Grant v. Manitoba Telecom Services Inc., 2012 CHRT 10, at para. 115, emphasis added). In 2015 CHRT 14 at para. 124, the Tribunal relying on this principle found that

> Dr. Blackstock experienced feelings of shame and humiliation resulting from this public professional rejection, in front of the Chiefs of Ontario whom she was seeking to advise, are understandable and warrants some form of compensation. … $10,000 constitutes a reasonable award for the prejudice Dr. Blackstock experienced.

[384] Overall, the Tribunal awarded $20,000 in compensation to Dr. Blackstock for being retaliated against by Canada in this very case. This must be kept in perspective when assessing compensation when parents or grandparents, living or deceased, experienced the painful experience of having children removed from their homes when they could have remained with appropriate prevention services in place and the application of appropriate measures. This is what the Tribunal has done in its compensation decisions.

VI. Opting-out provision

[385] Article 11 of the FSA does not specify the opting out deadline, however, Canada in its submissions indicated the opt out process approved by the Federal Court gives claimants until February 19, 2023, to opt out. Claimants will have the ability to become aware of the full details of the methodology approved by the Court before making the decision as to whether to opt out.

[386] Canada further submits that since acceptance by the Tribunal of the settlement as satisfying its order is a pre-condition to implementation of the settlement, claimants will also be aware of the decision made by the Tribunal before they must determine whether to opt out of the settlement.

[387] The Tribunal finds this point raised by Canada reinforces the importance of victims/survivors having adequate time to consider the FSA and the Tribunal's decision on this motion and previous compensation decisions with the benefit of an appropriate opt-out period.

[388] The Tribunal agrees with the Caring Society that under the FSA, victims/survivors will need to opt-out of the class action within a short time frame. Further, the short time to make an opt out decision, particularly for child victims, is made more challenging because the FSA has incomplete definitions of terms and criteria that will directly affect compensation entitlements. This situation places some victims/survivors in an unfair position wherein they are being forced to make a decision to opt out without knowing what they can receive under the FSA versus their entitlement to human rights compensation pursuant to the Tribunal's orders. The unfairness deepens as the FSA seems to force victims/survivors to opt out of both avenues of compensation if they are dissatisfied with the class action deal struck at the Federal Court. Such an opt-out scheme would place victims/survivors who are receiving less than their CHRT entitlement of $40,000 in an untenable situation whereby they either accept reduced entitlements under the FSA or opt-out of the FSA to be left to litigate against Canada from scratch. Such a proposal deepens the infringement of dignity for victims/survivors and may revictimize them and is therefore inconsistent with a human rights approach. This is concerning.

[389] Moreover, the evidence in these proceedings has demonstrated many times that some First Nations often lack capacity by no fault of their own to respond rapidly to deadlines. For example, in 2020 CHRT 24, the Chiefs of Ontario objected to a firm, 13-month, deadline imposed by Canada to submit claims for retroactive reimbursement of Band Representative Services and a firm deadline for current-year claims for Band Representative Services. COO argued this period was too short. This Tribunal agreed with the COO.

[390] This is even more of an issue for individual victims/survivors given the incomplete information provided to the public by the AFN and Canada on the Tribunal's compensation orders.

VII. Informing the public about the FSA

[391] As part of its answers to the Caring Society's cross-examination questions, the AFN provided a link to its website and compensation information page on at least two occasions: August 23, 2022 and August 29, 2022.

[392] On August 23, 2022, the AFN provided Ms. Janice Ciavaglia's answers to the First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada's cross-examination questions in relation to her affidavit affirmed on July 22, 2022. The AFN organized the questions and answers in a clear chart and in item number 36, the AFN wrote as follows:

> Question 36: What will AFN's messaging be to those removed children who are eligible under the Tribunal's Compensation Entitlement Order and Compensation Framework Order but are not eligible for direct compensation under the FSA?
>
> Answer: I object to this question on the basis of relevance. However, in the interest of moving this motion along, I will answer it.
>
> The AFN has taken active steps to keep its constituents, including potential class members, aware of the class action proceeding to date, including through traditional media, the AFN's social media, and through the AFN-led website www.fnchildcompensation.ca.

[393] On August 29, 2022, the AFN provided a response to the Caring Society's follow-up questions to Ms. Ciavaglia. The AFN's response is reproduced below:

> Question 1: In response to your answers to Questions #50 and #51, can you confirm whether the FSA's eligibility for Jordan's Principle includes "products and supports" as set out by the Tribunal in 2020 CHRT 15 and the Compensation Framework Order or whether eligibility will be restricted to "a service" as set out in the FSA definition of "Essential Service"?
>
> Answer: "Essential Service" includes the provision of a product or service, and is not restrictive. The examples listed in the appendix to the parties' agreed upon Framework of Essential Services, for example # 2 and 3, illustrate the breadth of the term (http://www.fnchildcompensation.ca/wp-content/uploads/2022/08/Framework-of-Essential-Services-August-19-2022.pdf).

[394] The above made the AFN compensation webpage and information part of the evidence before the Tribunal. The Panel consulted this webpage as part of its deliberations for the Federation of Sovereign Indigenous Nations' interested party status request motion. The Tribunal referred to the link and contents in 2022 CHRT 26.

[395] The Panel printed the information on the compensation webpage at the time it made its letter-decision in case the contents would be modified and updated later. For ease of reference, the relevant information is reproduced below.

[396] The Panel understands that these public communications solely advise the public how the FSA improves the Tribunal's orders and not where deviations or, more importantly, disentitlements are made in the FSA. The Panel has underlined important sections of the AFN's public message below.

> Background
>
> Since 1998, the AFN has engaged with Canada to address significant deficiencies and inequities inherent in the funding from the Government of Canada for the FNCFS Program, and the adverse impacts on the First Nations children and families involved with the FNCFS Program. The AFN has also been advocating for the full and proper application of Jordan's Principle to ensure that all First Nations children have access to the supports and services they need, no matter where they live.
>
> The AFN and First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada (Caring Society) filed a human rights complaint with the CHRT in 2007. The complaint was substantiated by the CHRT in 2016 and Canada was ordered to reform the FNCFS Program and fully implement Jordan's Principle to eliminate its discriminatory practices.
>
> The AFN was the only Party to the CHRT litigation who requested that compensation be paid directly to survivors. The CHRT agreed with the AFN that compensation was required and ultimately awarded $40,000, the maximum amount for pain and suffering under the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA), to First Nations who faced discrimination in Canada's underfunding of the FNCFS Program and the narrow application of Jordan's Principle. The Government of Canada issued an appeal of the CHRT's Compensation Order, which remains active.
> On January 28, 2020, the AFN and the representative plaintiffs, including Ashley Dawn Louise Bach, Karen Osachoff, Melissa Walterson, Noah Buffalo-Jackson, Carolyn Buffalo, and Dick Eugene Jackson, filed a proposed class action, dating back to 1991 ("AFN Class Action"). The AFN Class Action sought compensation for First Nations children and family members harmed by Canada's discrimination under the FNCFS Program and narrow application of Jordan's Principle. The AFN, Moushoom class counsel and Canada have engaged in negotiations over the last two years.

While the CHRT's compensation orders were profound, the maximum amount of compensation under the CHRA is limited to $40,000. The AFN sought to increase both the number of survivors eligible for compensation and the amount of compensation that they may receive, and achieved this by expanding on the CHRT's compensation orders in a number of ways.

First, the CHRT imposed a cut-off point at which a child must have been in care to be eligible for compensation, which is January 1, 2006. The eligibility period under the Class Action begins on the date at which the discriminatory funding system was implemented by Canada: April 1, 1991. It also extends the date of eligibility for Jordan's Principle claimants to the same date, in recognition of the longstanding and persistent gaps in services and supports for First Nations children. This extends the period for compensation by an additional 15 years.

The second extension relates to the whether a child was placed outside of their community. The CHRT compensation order required that a child had to be "placed outside their homes, families and communities" in order to be eligible for compensation. The Final Settlement Agreement includes all First Nations children who were removed under the FNCFS Program, regardless if they were placed within or outside of their community.

The third expansion is the inclusion of enhancement factors to ensure that individuals who experienced the greatest harm as a result of Canada's discrimination are provided with additional compensation. Under the Final Settlement Agreement, Survivors will be entitled to a $40,000 base payment and additional monetary enhancements based on their individual circumstances, which include:

- the age when an individual was removed from their home
- the age at which they exited care
- the amount of time an individual spent in care
- the number of times they were placed in care
- if an individual was removed to receive an essential service
- if an individual was removed from a northern or remote community
- if an individual was subjected to a delay, denial or service gap that resulted in significant harm

Finally, the AFN advocated for additional supports for survivors that are not contemplated under the CHRT's Compensation Order, including mental wellness supports for Survivors, financial literacy and coaching, family and community unification supports, and more. The Final Settlement Agreement is the first of its kind as it is First Nations driven, and First Nations will oversee the implementation of the agreement.

> The AFN will continue to provide updates at fnchildcompensation.ca. The AFN has also established an Information Desk which can be reached at 1-888-718-6496 or fnchildcompensation@afn.ca.
> We acknowledge that this process may bring up strong emotional responses; support from the Hope for Wellness Helpline is available now at 1-855-242-3310.

[397] This public information available on the AFN's website does not inform the victims/survivors or their families that they may see their compensation reduced or completely removed. For some under Jordan's Principle, there are uncertainties that remain at the time the Tribunal makes this ruling.

[398] Any reasonable person reading this information would think they are entitled to $40 thousand as a minimum and that the FSA ONLY improves on the Tribunal's orders. This is clearly misleading and lacking in transparency. This could also mean that no one would oppose the FSA.

[399] The Tribunal found no information on the AFN website or filed in evidence that clearly informed members of the public that some of the compromises led to reductions or disentitlements of compensation for some victims/survivors recognized in the Tribunal's orders. The Tribunal was provided with insufficient information as part of this motion that would provide insurances that those who would disagree could opt-out and would have sufficient time to do so.

[400] This is even more concerning when the opt out provision ends as early as February 2023 as per the FSA and, if the Tribunal declares that the FSA satisfies its compensation orders, such individuals would not be able to pursue compensation under the Tribunal's orders.

[401] Further, a media article was filed by the Caring Society as part of the evidence: "Ottawa releases early details of landmark $40B First Nations child welfare agreement, reports on Canada's statement on the FSA", (see Exhibit B to Dr. Blackstock's affidavit dated August 30, 2022). The Tribunal may consider this information given section 50(3)(c) of the CHRA.

[402] Notably, there is no indication Indigenous Services Minister Patty Hadju advised the public that compromises were made and compromises that led to compensation reductions or disentitlements had to be done to achieve a settlement.

[403] The Minister stated: "Our expectation is that $40,000 is the floor and there may be circumstances where people are entitled to more," said Indigenous Services Minister Patty Hajdu.

[404] Any reasonable person reading her statement may think the FSA ONLY enhances the compensation ordered by this Tribunal, not that it diminishes it for some.

[405] Nowhere does the Minister say this may not be the case for all the victims/survivors who form part of the Tribunal's orders. This is still a misleading statement even when setting aside the contested non-ISC funded removed children category.

[406] This information and the Caring Society's arguments on this point were not successfully challenged by Canada as part of this motion.

[407] Media and public information displayed on websites for the purposes of public information on compensation need to inform on the whole truth including how the FSA deviates from the Tribunal's orders to allow the victims/survivors and those who assist them to make an informed decision. There is no issue with highlighting the improvements. The concerning part is omitting that some of the people who are entitled to compensation under this Tribunal's orders may see their compensation reduced or taken away under the FSA.

[408] Given the large number of victims/survivors who were disentitled by the AFN and Canada are children or are deceased, proceeding with speed does not ensure fairness to those victims/survivors. The Tribunal under the CHRA must balance expeditiousness with the principles of fairness and natural justice therefore this is a concern for the Tribunal. This justifies an extension of the opt-out period beyond February 2023.

[409] Furthermore, the Tribunal considered the letter from Windsor Law Class Action Clinic (the Clinic), filed in evidence as exhibit E to Dr. Blackstock's affidavit dated August 30, 2022.

[410] The Class Action Clinic has relevant Expertise in terms of class actions:

> The Class Action Clinic's central mission is to serve the needs of class members across Canada. Launched in October 2019, we are the first not-for-profit organization designed to provide class members summary advice, assistance with filing claims in settlement distribution processes, and representation in court proceedings. The Clinic is also dedicated to creating greater awareness about class actions through public education, outreach, and research. The Clinic does not initiate or conduct class actions, and it is not funded by either the plaintiffs' or defence bar, or any industry group. Its sole purpose is to help individual class members, and in doing so, better fulfill the access to justice promise of the class action regime. A more complete description of our services can be found on the Clinic's website: www.classactionclinic.com.
>
> The Clinic is directed by Jasminka Kalajdzic, an Associate Professor of Law at the University of Windsor, and one of Canada's leading class action scholars. She was co-lead researcher with Prof. Catherine Piché of the Law Commission of Ontario's Class Action Project. Andrew Eckart, formerly a class action litigator, serves as the full-time Staff Lawyer and oversees the work of law student case workers. Mr. Eckart also represents Clinic clients in court proceedings.
>
> Since 2021, the Clinic has represented objecting class members in several class action settlements. Justice Belobaba described the Clinic as making a "valuable contribution" in settlement approval hearings and encouraged the Clinic, on the record, to continue this work.

[411] The Clinic provided wise points for consideration which were not accepted by class action counsel:

> Class members are entitled to sufficient time to review a proposed settlement of this complexity and magnitude, to seek advice and clarification regarding its contents, and to make an informed decision about participating in settlement approval hearings. Class members also need the additional time to adequately prepare their objections (if any) and present their views to the court. This right of review is not perfunctory; besides the right to opt-out of a class action, the right to object to a proposed settlement is the only other participatory right a class member has in a class action. Bancroft-Snell v. Visa Canada Corporation, 2019 ONCA 822 at para 3.
> A review of a few other class actions highlights the importance of class member participation in and notification of a settlement approval hearing. The parties in the Indian Residential School Settlement Agreement, for example, held nine settlement approval hearings, Canada-wide from late August 2006 to mid-October 2006 (over a period of two and a half months). In the Sixties Scoop Class Action, notice of the settlement approval hearings was disseminated as early as mid-January 2018 in advance of the mid-May 2018 hearings (five months).

Unlike these examples, we understand that the current make-up of the class in this case includes people who are still minors, making the issue of timing critical. In our view, this aspect alone necessitates more, not less, time for class members to seek assistance, review, and assess the provisions of the FSA before the Settlement Approval Hearing.

The right to adequate notice is even more important in class actions involving trauma survivors. Tight timelines have the potential to place unnecessary stresses on an already marginalized and vulnerable population. Class members in this case, First Nations youth subjected to trauma, are highly vulnerable to re-victimization and re-traumatization.

Class members reviewing and then deciding whether to object to the FSA must process traumatic experiences perpetuated by government systems. Asking survivors of trauma to do this in the very short time of one month or to not object at all disregards their healing and needs. To systemically disadvantage traumatized class members runs counter to the broader narrative of reconciliation at the heart of the First Nations Youth Class Action.

Our concerns regarding re-traumatization are heightened given that the majority of the class is made up of people who suffered while they were, or still are, minors. Survivors of childhood trauma are at the highest risk of developing complex trauma. Moreover, minors likely need significant support throughout the process that could further interfere with their ability to object in the 31 days between the issuance of Notice and the Settlement Approval Hearing.

While we recognize that the six-month opt-out period in this case greatly benefits class members, allowing for objections to the FSA for only a small fraction of that time impedes class members' ability to meaningfully flag areas of concern, particularly with respect to the claims process.

We have significant concerns that the FSA may fall short of providing access to justice that is so highly deserved for these class members who have suffered from decades of discriminatory and shameful underfunding of services by Canada. The size of the settlement and its impact on so many people who have been systematically marginalized and traumatized requires us all to analyze the FSA thoroughly and with a critical lens.

We commend the parties for crafting an FSA that includes the participation of Indigenous consultants in developing the claims process; provides a lengthy claims period; provides rights of appeal; institutes a system of "navigators" to provide assistance with claims; and does not revert any of the $20 billion to the defendant. Yet we remain concerned that claims of efficiency, expediency, and cost-effectiveness will prevent some class members from receiving their entitlement to compensation. The purpose of a class action settlement like this is not to achieve rough justice, but rather to ensure that all those who are entitled to compensation are able to access it.

(emphasis ours).

[412] The Tribunal agrees with the Clinic's comments above. The Tribunal recognizes that AFN class counsel stated at the hearing that everywhere in Canada people have told them to move forward with compensation now, to get it done now. While this is not evidence, the Tribunal does not doubt it's true. What the Tribunal is more concerned about is how the message is communicated to those who were considered beneficiaries of the Tribunal's orders who have now been removed from the FSA. Moreover, it is ideal if compensation moves ahead in the near future, however, as mentioned above, akin to the CHRA analysis, expeditiousness must be exercised alongside rules of fairness and natural justice. This is the Tribunal's focus as per its quasi-constitutional statute.

VIII. The United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (UNDRIP) and Free, Prior and Informed Consent (FPIC), Self-government, AFN resolutions

[413] As previously said in the letter-decision, FPIC is not determinative in disposing of this motion. The AFN also commented on the issue of FPIC and, in response to the Panel's follow-up questions, clarified that this was in response to the Caring Society's comments and encouraged the Panel not to get distracted by this question as it was not necessary to embark on such an analysis. Further, the parties did not provide extensive submissions and supporting documentation to allow the Tribunal to settle this complex question. Upon consideration the Panel agrees with the AFN and finds it is not central to determining the essential aspects of this motion.

[414] While the Tribunal requested further submissions on FPIC and UNDRIP after the hearing in light of the AFN raising collective rights during oral submissions, the Tribunal ultimately concludes that it is not necessary to address this issue to dispose of this motion.

[415] Given these aspects are not determinative of this motion, the Tribunal will not embark in a full discussion on FPIC's application in Canada or the AFN's governance. Rather, it will elaborate on the contextual and noteworthy elements to explain why it does not find these elements determinative of this motion except for the opting out portion.

[416] Nevertheless, the Tribunal considered the issues and will elaborate on the reasons provided in the letter-decision here.

[417] The United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (UNDRIP), GA Res. 61/295, UN GAOR, 61st Sess., Supp. No 49 Vol III, UN Doc A/61/49 (2007) is an international instrument adopted by the United Nations on September 13, 2007, to enshrine the existing inherent rights that "constitute the minimum standards for the survival, dignity and well-being of the indigenous peoples of the world." (Article 43). The UNDRIP protects collective rights that may not be addressed in other human rights legislation that emphasize individual rights, and it also safeguards the individual rights of Indigenous People.

[418] The UNDRIP stipulates that all Peoples have the right to self-determination, this is partly expressed in the principle known as Free, Prior and Informed Consent (FPIC).

[419] Free, prior and informed consent is a human rights norm grounded in the fundamental rights to self-determination and to be free from racial discrimination guaranteed by the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, (see, A/HRC/39/62, para.3). The provisions of the UNDRIP, including those referring to free, prior and informed consent, do not create new rights for Indigenous Peoples, but rather provide a contextualized elaboration of general human rights principles and rights as they relate to the specific historical, cultural and social circumstances of Indigenous Peoples (see A/HRC/9/9, para. 86). Free, prior and informed consent is also grounded in the human rights framework devised to dismantle the structural bases of racial discrimination against Indigenous Peoples, (see, A/HRC/39/62, para.9).

[420] According to section 32 of UNDRIP, free, prior and informed consent (FPIC) is required prior to the approval and/or commencement of any project that may affect the lands, territories and resources that Indigenous Peoples customarily own, occupy or otherwise use in view of their collective rights to self-determination and to their lands, territories, natural resources and related properties.

[421] UN human rights bodies have recognized that FPIC is essential to protect a wide range of Indigenous Peoples' fundamental rights, including the right to culture, the right to food and the right to health.

[422] UNDRIP contains five specific references to free, prior and informed consent (see arts. 10, 11, 19, 29 and 32), providing a non-exhaustive list of situations when such consent should apply.

[423] Free, prior and informed consent may be required for adoption and implementation of legislative or administrative measures (See, A/HRC/39/62) and also Article 19 which states:

> States shall consult and cooperate in good faith with the Indigenous Peoples concerned through their own representative institutions in order to obtain their free, prior and informed consent before adopting and implementing legislative or administrative measures that may affect them.

[424] UNDRIP states that any limitations on rights, including FPIC, must be "determined by law and in accordance with international human rights obligations," "non-discriminatory" and "strictly necessary solely for the purpose of securing due recognition and respect for the rights and freedoms of others and for meeting the just and most compelling requirements of a democratic society" (art. 46(2) of UNDRIP).

[425] Moreover, the Tribunal has relied on UNDRIP in past rulings and found it is an important instrument to consider in a human rights analysis in First Nations cases especially in this one involving mass removals of First Nations children from their homes, communities and Nations. The Tribunal found that national legislation such as the CHRA must be interpreted so as to be harmonious with Canada's commitments expressed in international law including the UNDRIP, (2018 CHRT 4 at para. 81).

[426] Canada has moved forward from only accepting the UNDRIP without reserve to adopting the UNDRIP into domestic law by way of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Act, SC 2021, c 14. There is no doubt that UNDRIP and FPIC apply to the state of Canada. Canada cannot shield its responsibilities to First Nations rights holders especially when rights holders voice their disagreements on issues affecting them. On this point, the Tribunal agrees with the Caring Society.

[427] The above demonstrates the evolving views on the application of FPIC from strictly land and natural resources issues to a broader spectrum of issues concerning Indigenous Peoples and their involvement and participation in important decisions that concern them. Therefore, the Tribunal agrees with the Caring Society that FPIC is not strictly a lands and natural resources process and therefore rejects the AFN's argument on this point.

[428] The Tribunal agrees with the AFN that FPIC is not entirely settled in Canadian law and finds that, even between different First Nations, perspectives vary on this issue. This is also exemplified in these proceedings where BC Chiefs signatories at the First Nations Summit Chiefs in Assembly adopted resolutions #0622.22 and #0622.23 have expressed that:

> Chiefs in British Columbia have not seen the Final Agreement on Compensation and are therefore unable to exercise free, prior, and informed consent on any changes to the compensation orders. Their right to FPIC was not respected in the FSA and That the First Nations Summit Chiefs in Assembly call upon the AFN to conduct any negotiations with Canada on any matters arising from 2016 CHRT 2 and subsequent orders affecting First Nations children, youth, and families in British Columbia in an open and transparent manner consistent with free, prior and informed consent of First Nations in British Columbia.

[429] The AFN does not view FPIC as applying here. The Tribunal does not propose to resolve this complex issue here.

[430] Further, the Tribunal agrees that the AFN is not a state and that FPIC does not impose these obligations on the organization but rather on Canada as a state. The Tribunal also agrees with UNDRIP that Indigenous Peoples have the right to make their own decisions, and to engage with other governments and processes through the systems of governance and decision-making that they have freely chosen for themselves. Such essential dimensions of self-determination are clearly affirmed in UNDRIP (see e.g., articles 3, 5, 18 and 19). Federal, provincial and territorial governments cannot ignore the decisions made by Indigenous Peoples. Neither can they tell Indigenous Peoples how these decisions should be made.

[431] Furthermore, consistent with the right to self-determination, indigenous peoples have always had the inherent power to make binding agreements between themselves and other polities. The contemporary concept and practice of mutually negotiated, consensual agreement among indigenous peoples and State governments is deeply grounded in the historic treaty-making process that characterized indigenous-State relations for several hundred years in many regions of the world and persists in many places where those treaties remain the law of the land, even if they have often been dishonoured. Historically and today, it can be challenging for indigenous peoples to negotiate with States under conditions of colonization and the many other limitations that often characterize the situation of indigenous peoples around the world, (See, A/HRC/39/62, para. 4).

[432] The Tribunal agrees with these principles and believes they apply to Canada in its dealings with First Nations. The Tribunal therefore agrees with the Caring Society's argument on this point.

[433] "States are obligated not just to respect, but also to protect, promote and fulfil human rights, and this obligation applies with respect to the rights of indigenous peoples." (See, Human Rights Council, Report of the Special Rapporteur on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, James Anaya: Extractive Industries and Indigenous Peoples, U.N. Doc A/HRC/24/41 (1 July 2013), at para. 44, online: Human Rights Council https://www.refworld.org/docid/522db2b54.html

[434] The Tribunal also has recognized Indigenous rights as human rights in previous rulings.

[435] Taking into consideration the specific needs of First Nations children, families and communities were core findings made by this Tribunal. Further, the Tribunal has continually emphasized in its findings and orders the principle of substantive equality and the importance of taking into account the specific needs of children, families, communities and Nations to give full meaning to this principle. This is an obligation for Canada.

[436] However, the Tribunal's understanding of the AFN's mandate has always been to advance the rights and interests of their members who are First Nations rights holders who provide direction to the Assembly by way of Chiefs-in-Assembly resolutions. This ensures the views of rights-holders and the specific needs of communities are respected and expressed. In a previous hearing, counsel for the AFN explained that he viewed the AFN like the United Nations. The Panel liked the analogy of sovereign nations meeting to make decisions that concern them. The Panel understood that the Chiefs-in-Assembly resolutions adequately reflect this and ensure an effective process to express their consent after meaningful consultation. Chiefs-in-Assembly resolutions are referenced in previous decisions. This was given considerable weight by the Panel when accepting the AFN's past submissions given the representativity of First Nations through the resolutions made by Chiefs-in-Assembly. In all of the previous rulings made by the Panel, there never was a situation where the Tribunal received evidence of other First Nations disagreeing with the AFN's requested orders. Usually, the AFN provides Chiefs-in-Assembly resolutions which bring assurances to the Panel that the rights-holders agree with the requested orders. This is an efficient way to proceed instead of hearing from each of the over 600 First Nations in Canada who are members of the AFN, which could paralyze the Tribunal's proceedings. Further, the AFN Resolutions are the essential mechanism by which First Nations provide specific mandates and direction to the AFN.

[437] Furthermore, the Tribunal's Compensation Decision (2019 CHRT 39), at paragraph 34 clearly relies on the Assembly of First Nations' resolution: Special Chiefs Assembly, Resolution No. 85/2018, December 4, 5 and 6, 2018 (Ottawa, ON) re Financial Compensation for Victims of Discrimination in the Child Welfare System. Moreover, the Tribunal's finding that, pursuant to AFN resolution 85/201, the AFN is empowered to speak on behalf of First Nations children that have been discriminated against by Canada was upheld by the Federal Court (2021 FC 969 at para. 160).

[438] The Tribunal accepts the AFN's explanation that the AFN Executive are "First Nations leadership", being comprised of Regional Chiefs duly elected by the First Nations in each region across Canada and the National Chief who is elected by all the First Nations across Canada. Under the AFN's Charter, the Executive Committee is empowered to take positions on behalf of First Nations consistent with their properly delegated mandates from the Chiefs-in-Assembly. The approval of the FSA was within their delegated purview.

[439] A question remains as to why an important question such as compensation and the FSA was not addressed in a resolution from the Chiefs-in-Assembly. While the AFN indicates the Chiefs-in-Assembly were presented with the FSA and that no objection to the FSA was raised by the Chiefs-in-Assembly at the annual general assembly which immediately followed the FSA's execution, the FSA was already signed at the time that it was presented. Paragraph 52 makes it clear that the FSA was executed on June 30, 2022, prior to the annual general assembly.

[440] The AFN states that the Chiefs-in-Assembly did not object to the FSA. However, little is said on the absence of a resolution from the Chiefs-in-Assembly or the resolutions signed by the BC Chiefs. While the Panel agrees with the AFN that requiring all First Nations to agree may jeopardize any agreement, a resolution from the Chiefs-in-Assembly recognizes this reality and provides some assurances to the Panel on such important questions.

[441] In this case, the Panel does not have a resolution on the FSA from the AFN in the evidence and the Panel has resolutions voted on by some First Nations who have expressed concerns about the FSA to the AFN. Upon a full consideration of the issues since the recent interested party request ruling and, given that the Tribunal's approval of the FSA could result in ceasing the Tribunal's supervision of the financial compensation aspect of the case if the Tribunal later declares the FSA fully satisfies the Tribunal's orders, the opting-out process for First Nations at the Federal Court does not assist the Tribunal in making a determination in this motion. While the Tribunal recognizes the AFN's right to proceed via executive committee decisions and that First Nations rights-holders may agree with this process as part of the AFN charter and rules, the BC resolutions filed in evidence suggest otherwise for some rights-holders. If the AFN now proceeds by way of executive resolutions for important decisions such as the FSA with the agreement of rights holders, the Tribunal would appreciate having a better understanding of this process and how the AFN proposes the Tribunal should deal with those concerns raised by First Nations rights-holders. In this motion, the AFN did not provide a comprehensive response to assist the Tribunal on this issue.

[442] Over the last decade, no First Nations non-party has opposed the AFN decisions as part of these proceedings. Moreover, many resolutions from the Chiefs-in-Assembly were filed in evidence for the Panel to consider. Therefore, the need to question what rights-holders' views were on important issues such as the FSA was not present before this motion and may not reoccur after it. In sum, the Tribunal's questions and concerns arose out of the new evidence presented in this motion, the arguments presented and the change in the AFN's process in front of this Tribunal to not provide resolutions from Chiefs-in-Assembly for such a major issue. Moreover, some compromises in the FSA do not align with the previous Chiefs-in-Assembly resolution no.85/2018 seeking the maximum compensation under the CHRA. Given this resolution, it is reasonable to expect a new or an amended resolution supporting the compromises, namely reductions and disentitlements for some victims/survivors.

[443] The Tribunal also had First Nations rights holders in mind when it wrote in 2018 CHRT 4:

> [443] The Panel encourages Canada in the future to provide evidence to the Tribunal if a province, territory or First Nation resists or acts as a roadblock to Canada's implementation of the Panel's rulings. This will assist the Panel in understanding their views and Canada's efforts to comply with our orders and, will provide context and may refrain us to make orders against Canada. Absent this evidence, the Panel makes orders to eliminate the discrimination in the short term while understanding the importance of the Nation-to-Nation relationship.

[444] A Nation-to-Nation relationship is not solely the relationship between the AFN and Canada; it is a relationship between First Nations and Canada.

[445] Further, the evidence that some First Nations were calling upon Canada to immediately pay the compensation owed to eligible victims/survivors and provide necessary supports pursuant to Canadian Human Rights Tribunal orders did not come as a result of Canada or the AFN's evidence to inform the Tribunal that not all were in agreement with the FSA but rather it was advanced by the Caring Society:

> That the First Nations Summit Chiefs in Assembly affirm that:
> > a. the Assembly of First Nations (AFN) and Canada are not authorized to seek a reduction in the compensation amounts for eligible victims who are members of First Nations in British Columbia or modify the compensation framework agreement and compensation entitlement order as set out in 2019 CHRT 39 and 2021 CHRT 7 without the free, prior, and informed consent of First Nations in British Columbia;

> b. the AFN and Canada are not authorized to make representations to the Tribunal or any other body implying the consent of First Nations in British Columbia without our free, prior, and informed consent on the Final Agreement and any motions, or any relief made to the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal or Federal Court.

[446] This Tribunal ensured the different perspectives of First Nations rights-holders would be respected and also discussed this in 2018 CHRT 4:

> [66] This being said, the Panel fully supports Parliament's intent to establish a Nation-to-Nation relationship and that reconciliation is Parliament's goal (see Daniels v. Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development, [2016] 1 SCR 99), and commends it for adopting this approach. The Panel ordered that the specific needs of communities be addressed and this involves consulting the communities. However, the Panel did not intend this order to delay addressing urgent needs. It foresaw that while agencies would have more resources to stop the mass removal of children, best practices and needs would be identified to improve the services while the program is reformed, and ultimately child welfare would reflect what communities need and want, and the best interest of children principle would be upheld. It is not one or the other; it is one plus the other.
> (emphasis changed)

[447] Moreover, the orders in this same ruling reflect the Tribunal's desire to respect First Nations self-governance and self-determination.

[448] Canada also has a duty to consult and must act honorably in all its dealings with First Nations, Inuit and Metis Peoples (Aboriginal Peoples). Those principles were discussed in the Merit Decision and will not be revisited here. Suffice is to say that Canada has many legal obligations in Canadian law to ensure it consults First Nations who are affected by its actions and decisions.

[449] The evidence in this motion includes resolutions from BC First Nations who disagreed with some aspects of the FSA as discussed above and were requiring further consultation which Canada cannot ignore.

[450] Moreover, after the motion hearing, in response to follow-up questions from the Tribunal, further resolutions were filed as Exhibit "C" to the affidavit of Doreen Navarro with the Tribunal and accepted into the evidentiary record. The BC Assembly of First Nations had their Annual General Meeting on September 21, 22, & 23, 2022 and adopted Resolution 33/2022 that was signed by First Nations Chiefs. The subject of the resolution was Compensation For Children And Families Who Suffered Discrimination In The Delivery Of First Nations Child & Family Services And Jordan's Principle Services.

[451] Notably, the context leading to the resolution is summarized as follows by the BCAFN:

> Canada and counsel for both class actions announced an Agreement in Principle on the compensation on December 31, 2021, with an intent to develop a Final Settlement Agreement to resolve the compensation issue for both the human rights damages and the class actions; The AFN Chiefs did not pass any resolutions supporting the Agreement in Principle on compensation or authorizing negotiators the deviate from the CHRT orders on compensation or from the AFN's resolution calling for the maximum allowable amount for every victim of discrimination under the FNCFS program; The First Nations Summit passed a resolution on June 16, 2022 (FNS Resolution #0622.23) affirming that the AFN and Canada are not authorized to modify the CHRT's compensation entitlement order without the free, prior and informed consent of First Nations in British Columbia; On June 30, the AFN, class action parties and the Government of Canada reached a Final Settlement Agreement on compensation and immediately (without seeking the free, prior and informed consent of First Nations or their chiefs) filed a motion with the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal seeking an expedited hearing regarding the Tribunal's compensation orders; Article 10 of the Final Settlement Agreement on compensation requires the AFN, among other things, "to take all reasonable steps to publicly promote and defend the Agreement"; At the Tribunal hearing, which took place on September 15 and 16, 2022, the Caring Society argued that the Final Settlement Agreement negatively impacts the rights of a number of children and families by reducing or eliminating their right to CHRT compensation and by waiving their rights to litigate against Canada for the harms they experienced flowing from Canada's discrimination—even if they receive no financial compensation under the Final Settlement Agreement; During the Tribunal hearing on September 16, 2022, AFN legal counsel was asked by the Tribunal if there were any objections to the Final Settlement Agreement by First Nations or others, and though they were in possession of the FNS resolution the AFN counsel did not disclose the FNS's objections in answer to the question. Chiefs in British Columbia have not been consulted on the Final Settlement Agreement and are therefore unable to exercise free, prior, and informed consent on any changes to the CHRT compensation orders.

[452] This led to the resolution that reads as follows:

THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED THAT:

> 1. The BCAFN Chiefs-in-Assembly call upon Canada to immediately pay the CHRT-ordered compensation in the amount of $40,000 plus interest owed to eligible victims and provide necessary supports pursuant to the CHRT orders;
>
> 2. The BCAFN Chiefs-in-Assembly affirm that AFN negotiators are not authorized to seek a reduction in the compensation amounts for eligible victims who are members of BC First Nations and must respect the compensation framework agreement and compensation entitlement order as set out in 2019 CHRT 39 and 2021 CHRT 7;
>
> 3. The BCAFN Chiefs-in-Assembly express concern regarding the AFN's agreement to Article 10 in the Final Settlement Agreement as it abrogates the AFN's duty to represent the interests of First Nations as authorized by the AFN Chiefs in Assembly and direct that the AFN:
>
> > a. withdraw its consent to this section of the agreement or in the alternative
> >
> > b. fully disclose this obligation to First Nations governments, First Nations experts, the Courts and Tribunal, and the public and that an independent panel of experts and lawyers be appointed by the BCAFN to examine the Final Settlement Agreement and inform positions arising from it; The BCAFN Chiefs-in-Assembly affirm that the AFN is not authorized to sign provisions such as Article 10 of the Final Settlement Agreement on behalf of BCAFN Chiefs-in-Assembly without their free, prior, and informed consent;
>
> 5. The BCAFN Chiefs-in-Assembly direct the AFN negotiators to seek the free, prior and informed consent of BC First Nations Chiefs before making any legal representations on any Final Agreement on Compensation that may have an impact on First Nations children, youth and families in British Columbia; and The BCAFN Chiefs-in-Assembly direct that any negotiations with Canada or class action counsel on any matters arising from 2016 CHRT 2 and subsequent orders or legal proceedings affecting BC First Nations children, youth, and families must be conducted in an open and transparent manner consistent with free, prior and informed consent of First Nations.

[453] Of note, the resolution is signed by Terry Teegee, who is a BC Regional Chief who is also part of the AFN Executive Committee. While the BC Chiefs did not testify at the hearing, the Tribunal finds this official resolution signed by a Regional Chief carries weight and is relevant and reliable evidence. Moreover, the resolution is attached to an affidavit filed in evidence.

[454] The Tribunal heard extensive evidence at the hearing on the merits about the FNCFS Program in British Colombia and made findings that will not be revisited here. However, this is to say that the Tribunal is aware of the fact there are a large number of First Nations and First Nations agencies in BC that benefit from the Tribunal's findings and orders.

[455] Finally on this point, the Panel does not believe that this ruling should be interpreted to preclude self-government or other agreements in the future or as a refusal of this motion based on an AFN executive decision rather than a Chiefs-in-Assembly resolution. While the Tribunal had questions in light of what is explained above, this is not determinative in this motion.

[456] The real difficulty in this joint motion is the fact that entitlements orders were already made for victims/survivors by this Tribunal, the orders were upheld by the Federal Court and the compromises were made subsequently.

A. Individual rights versus collective rights

[457] The Tribunal understood that the AFN was arguing that the Tribunal should consider First Nation collective rights in preference to individual rights at the oral hearing prompting follow-up questions from the Tribunal. However, the AFN subsequently clarified its comments and the Tribunal does not believe that this issue must be resolved as part of these proceedings and, more importantly, while the Tribunal agrees these rights must be balanced, the issue is not determinative of this motion. Further, the parties post-hearing submissions on this issue were brief and, given this was not determinative of this motion, the Tribunal did not require additional submissions.

[458] The UNDRIP recognizes collective rights and protects collective identities, assets and institutions, notably culture, internal decision-making and the control and use of land and natural resources. The collective character of Indigenous rights is inherent in Indigenous culture and serves as a rampart against disappearance by forced assimilation.

[459] Free, prior and informed consent operates fundamentally as a safeguard for the collective rights of Indigenous Peoples. Therefore, it cannot be held or exercised by individual members of an Indigenous community. UNDRIP provides for both individual and collective rights of Indigenous Peoples. Where UNDRIP deals with both individual and collective rights, it uses language that clearly distinguishes “indigenous peoples” from “individuals.” Understandably, however, none of the provisions of UNDRIP dealing with free, prior and informed consent (arts. 10, 11, 19, 28, 29 and 32) make any reference to individuals. To “individualize” these rights would frustrate the purpose they are supposed to achieve, (see, A/HRC/39/62, para.13).

[460] The AFN submits that First Nations collective rights arise from the fact that they are Peoples under customary international law. The criteria defining what constitutes “a people” in customary international law are as follows: first, a group must be a social unit with a clear identity and characteristics of their own; second, the group must have a relationship with a territory and, finally, the group must claim to be something more than simply an ethnic, linguistic or religious minority.

[461] Current international law operates on two levels. On the first level, international law influences how the states of the world interact. Similar to domestic law, the second level of international law is concerned with the relationship between a state and persons within its territory. International law with respect to the second level focuses on human rights abuses and the mistreatment of individuals. The Tribunal agrees with this characterization.

[462] The Tribunal also agrees with the AFN that the status of First Nations collective rights ought to be determined in other fora, where the full scope and context of the nature and source of First Nation rights can be weighed and determined. Much is at stake and the AFN urges this Panel to restrict its ruling to the issue before it – whether the FSA satisfies this Panel’s compensation orders.

[463] However, the Tribunal disagrees with the assertion from the AFN that by solely focusing on the rights of First Nations through a human rights lens, the Caring Society demotes the status of First Nations as Peoples to that of a minority population within the Canadian state.

[464] The Tribunal agrees with the Caring Society's views that Individual and collective rights are not mutually exclusive in nature. Individual human rights (including the right to effective remedies) and a collectivity's rights can and should co-exist.

[465] One of the most compelling arguments on this point was advanced by the Caring Society in explaining the Tribunal's approach in this case. Individuals experienced widespread and deep levels of discrimination by Canada, which also had an impact on rights-holding collectives. In approaching remedies, the Tribunal broadened the consultation required of Canada beyond the Commission, to ensure that the voices of First Nations and those with significant expertise could be heard via representative organizations in order to inform immediate and long-term relief. The Tribunal has also created provisions in its orders for individual First Nations to negotiate more specific arrangements with Canada. Importantly, the Tribunal has created space for particular First Nations interests to participate on discrete questions through its use of the "interested party" mechanism in the Tribunal's Rules. The Tribunal believes this is an accurate interpretation of what has occurred in these proceedings.

[466] Finally, this issue will not be resolved as part of this motion and as previously said, is not determinative of this motion.

IX. The request to amend the Tribunal's compensation orders to reflect the terms of the FSA is denied [467] The request to amend the Tribunal's compensation orders to reflect the terms of the FSA is denied.

[468] The Tribunal found this decision very difficult since it was given the hard choice to approve the FSA as it is or amend its orders to reflect the changes in the FSA or reject it and deny timely compensation to a large number of victims/survivors which is not the Tribunal's goal or desire. Some of those changes improve, enhance and broaden the Tribunal's orders above what is permitted under the CHRA and the Tribunal is pleased with this outcome. The Tribunal is in favor of compensation being distributed sooner rather than later. However, some of those changes are detrimental for some and undermine the Tribunal's orders.

[469] Canada argues that if the excessively formalistic and limited interpretation of the authority of the Tribunal argued for by the Caring Society and the Canadian Human Rights Commission were accepted by the Tribunal, it would arguably become impossible for parties to negotiate a settlement which differed in any particular way from a prior Tribunal order. This would leave the Tribunal hamstrung and unable to endorse the very thing the dialogic approach and Justice Favel's reasons seek to encourage.

[470] The Tribunal understands this legitimate preoccupation and can confirm this is not the case here. There are other major differences between the FSA and the Tribunal's orders that the Tribunal is willing to accept if all recognized victims/survivors in the Tribunal's orders are included in the FSA. For example, ending the Tribunal's jurisdiction on compensation by changing who exercises the supervisory role of the compensation process for a single process supervised by the Federal Court. There are other differences in the FSA that the Tribunal also accepts such as the broadened categories of entitled victims/survivors and the increased quantum of compensation above the $40,000 statutory limit. While the CHRA does not allow the Tribunal to amend its orders to reflect this change, the Tribunal can declare/find the FSA fully satisfies the Tribunal's orders on this point. The Tribunal does not insist on an exact copy of its rulings. Rather, it insists on the respect of final orders on quantum and categories of victims/survivors eligible to compensation under the Tribunal's orders.

[471] If all the legally recognized victims/survivors as part of the Tribunal's orders who are the only ones who currently benefit from evidence-based Tribunal findings following adjudication were included in the FSA, the Tribunal could have granted this motion and recognized it fully satisfies the Tribunal's orders.

[472] The Tribunal's main reason not to endorse the FSA is that it derogates from the Tribunal's existing orders in reducing compensation to some victims/survivors to accommodate the fixed quantity of funds under the FSA and the much larger number of victims/survivors in the class actions competing for these funds. No substantive findings or orders have been made concerning the victims in the class actions, yet in the FSA some displace some of the victims/survivors whose rights have been vindicated in these proceedings.

[473] If this is permitted, what message would be sent by the very Tribunal who has a mandate to ensure the protection of the most vulnerable victims/survivors who have now been recognized? Further, how is this a reasonable and legal outcome?

[474] The Tribunal is not a political body in charge of making financial and political choices between people. Once it has reviewed the evidence and made findings and found that orders are warranted, the Tribunal cannot change its mind and rescind this unless it made an error, a reviewing Court overturns a finding or new and compelling evidence justifies it. Consistent with the reasons and case law analyzed above, the AFN and Canada must not be allowed to reopen a final order on quantum in the context of this motion. The Tribunal has not been presented with any evidence of any error in concluding that the victims/survivors in this case suffered the most egregious harms and are entitled to the $40,000 in recognition of their pain and suffering and Canada's willful and reckless conduct, this being the maximum that the Tribunal is allowed to award under the CHRA.

[475] Even if the Tribunal were to leave aside the question of the non-isc children and Jordan's Principle categories, the Tribunal cannot find that the FSA fully satisfies its orders given the other 2 derogations explained above. Moreover, the Tribunal cannot amend its orders to reduce or disentitle the victims/survivors to account for the reasons put forward by the AFN and Canada.

[476] The AFN and Canada provided meaningful arguments imported from the class action process; some have been addressed above. The Tribunal will address other important ones in turn here.

A. The Compromise factor in reaching the FSA and human rights lens [477] The parties to the FSA submit that every settlement requires compromise. The Tribunal does not dispute that.

[478] The AFN submits that this Panel has jurisdiction to accept all compromises made by the parties to the negotiations, provided any given compromise was made on a principled and rational basis. The Tribunal agrees that the compromises were made on a principled and rational basis for First Nations. The issue is Canada and the AFN's decision to proceed in negotiations with the assumption that it was acceptable to reduce and disentitle victims/survivors already recognized by the Tribunal in its orders. While it is a practical reality of negotiations that they require compromise, that does not elevate the obligation to compromise in settlement negotiations to the same legal force as binding orders issued pursuant to the CHRA.

[479] The AFN and Canada rely on a recent Federal Court decision and submit that no settlement is perfect, (see Tk'emlúps te Secwépemc First Nation v. Canada, 2021 FC 988 at para. 64). The Tribunal accepts this assertion. Further, the AFN and Canada add that this settlement, however, represents the significant efforts of the parties to engage in the dialogic approach, as encouraged by the Federal Court. Settlements necessarily include balancing of benefits and compromises, and in this case the benefits are clear.

[480] That the FSA has clear benefits is generally true. However, the Tribunal finds whether it is more advantageous depends on which side of the fence you are on as a victim/survivor. For some of the victims/survivors whose rights were recognized by the Tribunal's findings and orders who may now see their compensation reduced or taken away, unfortunately, this is not true and the FSA provides no benefit. The Tribunal's first duty is to the victims/survivors it already recognized and their best interests.

[481] The Tribunal agrees with the AFN that the amounts payable to individuals will be meaningful and the total compensation is historic and reflects the magnitude of the harms. The nuance here for this Tribunal is the fact that some compromises to entitlements were made to account for the fixed amount of compensation agreed to by Canada which suggests the magnitude of the harms may be greater than the impressive $20 billion amount of compensation.

[482] Furthermore, the AFN and Canada have not convinced the Tribunal that compromise is part of the human rights analysis here once orders have been made or that compromise outweighs the need to preserve the victims/survivors' rights recognized in orders in the Tribunal's proceedings. In other words, the role of compromise in litigation does not extend to derogating from binding Tribunal orders.

[483] If Canada had struck an agreement with the Caring Society and disregarded pleas from the AFN to not reduce compensation to the victims/survivors and disregard hard-fought gains, the AFN could raise this injustice and would be right to do so.

B. New information namely the FSA since the Tribunal rendered its orders [484] The AFN submits the Tribunal can consider the FSA and can amend its orders to reflect the FSA. The Tribunal for the above-mentioned reasons partly agrees. Again, the Tribunal does not believe it can modify final orders on quantum for the categories already recognized in its orders. Moreover, insufficient evidence was led or submissions provided in terms of what those amendments should look like. The Tribunal agrees with the Caring Society that the AFN and Canada failed to specify the amendments they seek. This lack of specificity undermines procedural fairness. Moreover, this does not allow the Tribunal to reduce or disentitle compensation to victims/survivors already included in the Tribunal's orders.

C. The remedy is forthcoming to the victims

[485] The FSA would proceed more expeditiously if no one judicially reviews this ruling, which is unlikely given the opposing views. Furthermore, the expeditiousness is at the expense of fairness for the victims/survivors in these proceedings. The parties decided to put on hold the last elements of the Tribunal's compensation process to develop the FSA. While the Tribunal understands this, it is not a delay attributable to the Tribunal. The parties can develop the guide for compensation distribution in a short timeframe and submit it to the Tribunal for approval. This could expedite compensation. In terms of Canada's appeal of the compensation decisions and the potential for years before the remedy is forthcoming, the Tribunal notes that this could have been avoided in not removing victims/survivors recognized in the Tribunal's orders from the FSA. Second, there is no guarantee that further delays would not occur with the FSA given the parties who oppose it in these proceedings and the risk of judicial review on either side.

D. The broader scope and enhanced compensation for some victims/survivors [486] The broader scope and enhanced compensation for some victims/survivors is the most compelling rationale for endorsing the FSA. The Tribunal is entirely in favour of this expansion and recognizes its advantages. This is why the Tribunal seriously considered approving the FSA and found this decision to be a challenging one.

[487] While all compelling and important factors to consider, the Tribunal has a human rights focus. It cannot support reduced or eliminated compensation to victims already recognized in the Tribunal's orders. This negative message is contrary to the Tribunal's function under the CHRA to ensure the discrimination found is eliminated and does not reoccur and ensuring the victims/survivors are made whole. These enhancements, no matter how laudable and desirable, do not give the Tribunal authority to reduce or eliminate compensation to victims/survivors currently recognized under the Tribunal's orders.

[488] The AFN and Canada submit that in such circumstances, the Federal Court considers whether the settlement is fair and reasonable and whether it is in the best interests of the class as a whole. This can involve considering the settlement terms and conditions, the likelihood of success or recovery through litigation, the future expense and duration of further litigation, the dynamics of settlement negotiations and positions taken therein, the risks of not unconditionally approving the settlement, and the position of the representative plaintiffs. Of particular significance are the litigation risks of not approving the agreement and the view of the representative plaintiffs.

[489] The Tribunal mentioned above that it is not bound by a class action analysis. While some of the criteria above may be instructive, the Tribunal is governed by the legal framework explained in this ruling.

[490] Further, the AFN's request to proceed expeditiously did not allow the parties or the Tribunal in these proceedings to ask questions to the adult representative plaintiffs to understand their perspective and for this Tribunal to make findings. The AFN offered to introduce the representative plaintiffs at the hearing once the evidence had closed and confirmed it had no intention of having the representative plaintiffs testify at the hearing. The Tribunal enquired if their testimony was requested and offered to schedule hearing dates if this was needed however, the AFN said that it was not.

[491] Further, the AFN and Canada add that this FSA was First Nations led and fosters reconciliation. The Tribunal accepts this and, as explained in this ruling, did consider this in making its decision.

[492] The Tribunal is not stating that it cannot amend its orders if the FSA does not mirror the Tribunal's orders. The Tribunal can amend its orders to clarify, enhance, or reflect the parties' wishes if they consent and do not remove recognized rights.

[493] The Tribunal emphasizes that the CHRA is a restorative piece of legislation.

[494] In fact, special programs are permitted in the CHRA when it has the policy goal to provide equity for some segments of society who are the subject of discrimination (see section 16 of the CHRA). This was discussed in Action travail des femmes and relied upon in the Tribunal's Compensation Decision in 2021 CHRT 6:

> [66] For the SCC, paragraph 2 of the Special Temporary Measures Order, ordering the CN to implement a special employment program, was specifically designed to address and remedy the type of systemic discrimination against women in the case under examination. Therefore, the SCC addressed the specific issue of the scope of the remedial powers established under section 41(2)(a) (now 53(2)(a)) of the CHRA, taking into account the power granted to the Tribunal to order measures regarding the "adoption of a special program, plan or arrangement referred to in subsection 15(1) (now 16(1)), to prevent the same or a similar practice occurring in the future" (Action Travail des femmes, at p. 1139).
> [67] Concurring with the dissenting opinion of Justice MacGuigan of the Federal Court of Appeal in the case under appeal, the SCC held that section 41(2)(a) (now 53(2)(a)) is "designed to allow human rights tribunals to prevent future discrimination against identifiable protected groups" (Action Travail des femmes, at p 1141). In cases of systemic discrimination, the prevention of reoccurrence of discriminatory practices often requires referring to historical patterns of discrimination in order to design appropriate strategies for the future (Action Travail des femmes, at p. 1141). Furthermore, the SCC held that the type of measure ordered by the Tribunal in the case under examination may be the only means to achieve the purpose of the CHRA, that is to combat and prevent future discrimination (Action Travail des femmes, at p. 1141, 1145), (emphasis added).

[68] In these cases, remedy and prevention cannot be dissociated, since "there is no prevention without some form of remedy" (Action Travail des femmes, at p. 1142). Thus, the remedies available under section 53(2)(a) CHRA are directed toward a specific protected group and are not only compensatory in nature, but also prospective. As a result, with a view to achieve the prevention objective of the CHRA, a "special program, plan or arrangement" as referred to in subsection 16 (1) CHRA serves three main purposes: (1) countering the effect of systemic discrimination; (2) addressing the attitudinal problem of stereotyping, and; (3) Creating a critical mass, which may have an impact on the "continuing self-correction of the system" (Action Travail des femmes, at pp 1143-44), (emphasis added).

[69] In sum, while ruling that the Tribunal had the power to order such a special measure, the SCC summarized its findings as follows:

> For the sake of convenience, I will summarize my conclusions as to the validity of the employment equity program ordered by the Tribunal. To render future discrimination pointless, to destroy discriminatory stereotyping and to create the required "critical mass" of target group participation in the work force, it is essential to combat the effects of past systemic discrimination. In so doing, possibilities are created for the continuing amelioration of employment opportunities for the previously excluded group. The dominant purpose of employment equity programs is always to improve the situation of the target group in the future. MacGuigan J. stressed in his dissent that "the prevention of systemic discrimination will reasonably be thought to require systemic remedies" (p. 120). Systemic remedies must be built upon the experience of the past so as to prevent discrimination in the future. Specific hiring goals, as Hugessen J. recognized, are a rational attempt to impose a systemic remedy on a systemic problem. The Special Temporary Measures Order of the Tribunal thus meets the requirements of s. 41(2)(a) of the Canadian Human Rights Act. It is a "special program, plan or arrangement" within the meaning of s. 15(1) and therefore can be ordered under s. 41(2)(a). The employment equity order is rationally designed to combat systemic discrimination in the Canadian National St. Lawrence Region by preventing "the same or a similar practice occurring in the future".
>
> (Action Travail des femmes, at pp 1145-46).

[70] The Panel has relied on several occasions on the principles established by the Supreme Court of Canada in Action Travail des femmes, see for example: 2016 CHRT 2 at para. 468; 2016 CHRT 10, at para. 12-18; 2018 CHRT 4, at para. 21-39; 2019 CHRT 39, at para. 97.

[495] Furthermore, no concept of removing ordered entitlements suggested by the AFN and Canada is found in the CHRA itself, the spirit of the CHRA or a proper human rights analysis. A careful consideration of the Panel's work in this case makes clear the Panel views its role under the CHRA as proactive to eliminate and prevent discrimination, not make orders and take them away.

[496] In 2021 CHRT 6, the Tribunal wrote:

> [61] To the contrary, in the interpretation of the CHRA, it is important to take into account the purpose of the CHRA, that is to extend the present laws in Canada as set forth in section 2 in order to give effect to the principle that every human being should be given equal opportunity to live his or her life without discrimination (Action Travail des femmes, at p 1133). It should be recalled that human rights legislations are intended to give effect to rights of vital importance, ultimately enforceable by a court of law (Action Travail des femmes, at p 1134). As a result, while the meaning of the words of the CHRA is important, rights must be given full recognition and effect (Action Travail des femmes, at p 1134). This is also in line with the federal Interpretation Act, RSC 1985, c I-21, according to which statutes are deemed remedial and thus, must receive a fair, large and liberal interpretation with a view to give effect to their objects and purpose (Action Travail des femmes, at p 1134).
>
> [62] This comprehensive method of interpretation of human rights legislation was first stated in Insurance Corporation of British Columbia v. Heerspink, 1982 CanLII 27 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 145, where Justice Lamer acknowledged the fundamental nature of human rights legislation: they are "not to be treated as another ordinary law of general application. It should be recognized for what it is, a fundamental law" (Action Travail des femmes, at pp 1135-36, citing Heerspink, at p. 158). This principle of interpretation was later confirmed and further articulated in Winnipeg School Division No. I v. Craton, 1985 CanLII 48 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 150, at p. 156, where Justice McIntyre, writing for a unanimous Court, stated that:
>
> > Human rights legislation is of a special nature and declares public policy regarding matters of general concern. It is not constitutional in nature in the sense that it may not be altered, amended, or repealed by the Legislature. It is, however, of such nature that it may not be altered, amended, or repealed, nor may exceptions be created to its provisions, save by clear legislative pronouncement.
> >
> > (cited in Action Travail des femmes, at 1136).

> [65] These principles must equally be applied when interpreting the remedial powers granted to the Tribunal under the CHRA.

[497] An analysis of section 53 of the CHRA where the Tribunal has recognized victims/survivors in its orders and can change its mind later for the reasons advanced in this motion including unproven financial constraints is not appropriate and does not keep with the SCC's reasons in Action Travail des femmes.

[498] The Tribunal cannot make the alternative order requested to amend its previous orders to conform to the FSA or to elevate the FSA over the Tribunal's orders in case of conflict. The Tribunal reaches this conclusion after considering the applicable case law discussed, the CHRA and human rights regime all discussed above, its previous findings and its previous orders.

[499] Moreover, the FSA's legal framework is driven by the current class actions. Canada did not ensure that an appropriate human rights lens respecting its current human rights obligations and binding orders against it in this case was applied to allow it to agree to the FSA.

[500] The Tribunal is fully aware that applying a human rights lens and its statutory powers to the issue does not provide statutory authority to change or amend the Tribunal's orders in removing rights to categories of victims/survivors so that the Tribunal's orders conform to the FSA. This is not permissible by law. The Tribunal is not a political body, it is an adjudicative body deriving its authority from statute and it cannot disturb the legal recourses under the CHRA regime to deny quasi-constitutional rights.

[501] The AFN's argument that this would result in parties never being able to settle litigation outside of the Courts is not accurate. The issue here is this was done after orders were made and resulted in contracting out some of the victims/survivors' human rights to compensation who were already recognized in legal orders amounting to a collateral attack of the Tribunal's quantum and eligibility orders.

[502] The Tribunal cannot overstate the importance of securing victims/survivors' rights across Canada. This requires the Tribunal to ensure that first the victims/survivors in this case and other victims who may include Indigenous Peoples and Nations, can pursue a human rights case under the CHRA through to a final resolution with fair recourse. Victims/survivors must be able to rely on the finality of findings of discrimination and compensation ordered by the Tribunal. Human rights are fundamental rights that are not intended to be bargaining chips that parties can negotiate away. Similar to how human rights legislation establishes minimum standards parties cannot contract out of, the Tribunal's compensation orders generate binding compensation obligations on Canada. Canada cannot contract out of these obligations through an alternative proceeding.

[503] The case is quite different with long-term reform where not all issues have been adjudicated by the Tribunal. The Tribunal supports First Nations-led solutions to eliminate discrimination if the evidence advanced proves to eliminate the systemic discrimination found in an effective and sustainable manner that responds to the specific needs of First Nations children, families and also communities. The Tribunal reminds the parties that it is a Tribunal created by statute with a mandate to eliminate discrimination in Canada once findings are made, always based on evidence and not opinion. The Tribunal is still seized of the matter and will need to make findings before ending its jurisdiction to ensure the racial and systemic discrimination is eliminated and does not reoccur. The First Nations parties' expertise is key in this important task.

[504] Moreover, the CHRA does not grant fleeting rights: once entitlements are recognized under the CHRA, they cannot be removed. Once a finding and a compensation order is made to vindicate rights, they may not be revoked absent an order from a reviewing court.

[505] The Tribunal does not believe it has a legal basis for granting all the amendments requested by the AFN and Canada or for finding that the FSA fully satisfies the Tribunal's compensation orders. Granting the requested orders would disentitle certain victims/survivors from compensation under the Tribunal's orders.

[506] The Tribunal is nonetheless urged to accept the FSA even if it is not identical to the Tribunal's orders because it would provide expedited compensation to the victims/survivors being compensated under the FSA. However, this is subject to the Tribunal's conditions below on the opt-out provision and the FSA including all the victims/survivors recognized in the Tribunal's orders.

X. Conclusion

[507] The Tribunal finds as follows:

[508] The Tribunal is not functus to consider if the FSA fully satisfies the Tribunal's orders.

[509] The Tribunal finds the FSA substantially satisfies the Tribunal's orders. The FSA can potentially fully satisfy the Tribunal's orders if it is amended to include all the categories of victims/survivors and the compensation amounts included in the Tribunal's orders and to include the possibility for them to opt-out of the FSA in a manner that is fully responsive and rectifies the areas of concerns mentioned above.

[510] The Tribunal cannot declare or find the FSA fully satisfies the Tribunal's orders given that some victims/survivors who were recognized by and awarded compensation by this Tribunal have been removed or provided with reduced compensation. The Tribunal's orders were upheld by the Federal Court. The evidence currently before the Tribunal does not permit a finding that the FSA fully satisfies the Tribunal's orders. This difficulty is more than technical; it is a real legal one.

[511] The Tribunal finds the FSA respects numerous and many important components of the Tribunal's compensation orders such as not retraumatizing victims, avoiding children testifying and using a culturally appropriate process. The Panel generally accepts the FSA and finds it more advantageous on many aspects and understands the principled choices made by First Nations. The Panel also sees great value in having one process supervised by the Federal Court for the compensation issue. The Panel would likely have approved a settlement along the lines of the FSA if it had been asked to do so prior to issuing its Compensation Entitlement Decision or if all victims/survivors already recognized by the Tribunal's orders were included.

[512] The Tribunal always contemplated adding more categories of compensable victims and was open to doing so if it was needed and supported by the evidence but the AFN declined this option in its submissions given that they had concerns that the compensation process with Canada would reach an impasse. The compensation orders were still judicially reviewed. The Tribunal never envisioned removing recognized categories of victims/survivors after it made its findings and orders based on evidence of harm. After the Tribunal makes an order entitling a category of victims/survivors to compensation, those orders have finality and the only options for removing the entitlement is through judicial review. While the Tribunal agrees it did not have the FSA before it at the time it made its orders, the Tribunal finds no legal basis justifying the denial of compensation to categories of victims/survivors recognized by this Tribunal. Moreover, the Tribunal would review the victims/survivors' eligibility for compensation if directed by the reviewing court.

[513] The Tribunal stresses this context to emphasize that it urged the parties to negotiate an agreement on compensation to avoid making very specific orders that First Nations later argue against. This can easily be avoided with deals in earlier stages of proceedings where no compensation has been ordered. The purpose of the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction on compensation was always to clarify, add and refine the orders. It was never to reduce, disentitle or remove victims/survivors from the purview of its orders. A careful reading of the Tribunal's decisions makes this clear.

[514] The FSA is driven both by the class action cases and class action law. It does not apply a human rights lens and does not uphold Canada's human rights obligations under the Tribunal's orders. While the AFN in its submissions urges the Tribunal to consider a class action lens, the AFN has not persuaded the Tribunal why the Tribunal should apply this lens instead of an assessment based on existing human rights jurisprudence, especially as articulated in earlier decisions in this case. Even if the Tribunal were to use a class action lens, the AFN and Canada have not sufficiently explained how the factors that apply to a class action analysis would be applicable in the current context where many of the beneficiaries of the class action have an existing entitlement to compensation under valid Tribunal orders. While these orders are under judicial review, this is considerably different from the most typical class action context where none of the class action beneficiaries have any legal entitlement to compensation at the time of a settlement approval hearing. Further, the AFN does not sufficiently address how the class action framework applies when considering victims/survivors who would lose entitlement to compensation that they are currently owed by Canada.

[515] Furthermore, the Tribunal believes that Justice Favel's comments on reconciliation cannot be interpreted to disentitle victims/survivors who were recognized by this Tribunal.

[516] The Tribunal does not believe it has a legal basis for granting the amendments requested by the AFN and Canada or for finding that the FSA fully satisfies the Tribunal's compensation orders. Granting the requested orders would reduce or disentitle certain victims/survivors from compensation under the Tribunal's orders. In addition, in requesting an amendment, Canada and the AFN have not addressed how the Tribunal would proceed given that it is being asked to amend its orders to reflect the FSA which includes, laudably, compensation in excess of what the Tribunal can order under the CHRA. The Tribunal is nonetheless urged to accept this position because it would provide expedited compensation to the victims/survivors being compensated under the FSA. However, the Tribunal is not persuaded the expedited compensation would actually occur given the possibility of challenging the Tribunal's decision on this joint motion by way of judicial review and the possibility the FSA class action settlement is not approved in the Federal Court. Therefore, there is a risk of providing a false hope to those entitled to compensation under the FSA about the timeframe in which they would receive compensation.

[517] This does not dispose of the Tribunal's retained jurisdiction to ensure systemic discrimination is eliminated. Canada cannot contract out the Tribunal's quasi-constitutional responsibility to eliminate the discrimination found and prevent similar discriminatory practices from arising. It has to occur after an evidence-based finding that satisfies the Tribunal that discrimination is eliminated and prevented from reoccurring or on consent of all, not just some, parties in the Tribunal proceedings and based on compelling evidence that the systemic racial discrimination will be eliminated. The Tribunal urges Canada in the spirit of reconciliation to remove the pressure on victims/survivors and First Nations and extend its December 30, 2022, deadline to the agreements to at least March 2023. The Tribunal has requested a minimum of 60 business days to consider outstanding aspects of the long-term reform and will take the appropriate time needed to consider the matter.

[518] The AFN in its oral arguments at the September 2022 hearing submitted that discrimination continues. This can be revisited in the long-term issue.

XI. Order

A. The Tribunal grants the motion in part and Declares/Finds [519] The FSA substantially satisfies the Tribunal's orders and, given that the Tribunal cannot order non-parties to negotiate or amend the FSA, recommends:

A. Canada negotiates with the class action and Tribunal parties and allocates funds to cover all victims entitled to compensation under the Tribunal decisions. The amounts already ordered by the Tribunal should be the floor.

B. For example, Canada can pay compensation funds of $20 billion or more if insufficient into a trust within 21 days following the letter-decision in order to generate interest until the time it is ready to roll out compensation in order to compensate human rights victims who were included in the Tribunal's orders but excluded under the FSA.

C. If the Federal Court does not approve the FSA, the funds could revert to Canada.

D. This may not be sufficient to cover the excluded categories. The parties to the FSA may need to consider other options.

E. If all the victims/survivors identified and the compensation amounts in the Tribunal's orders are accounted for in the FSA and there is a possibility for them to opt-out of the FSA in a manner that rectifies the areas of concern mentioned above, the Tribunal will be able to find the FSA fully satisfies the Tribunal's orders.

[520] Alternatively:

A. Given the real potential for delaying compensation from additional litigation and judicial reviews that may arise from either side as a result of this joint motion, the Tribunal recommends removing the Tribunal approval from the FSA and make the necessary amendments to settle all three class actions and move forward at the Federal Court for approval and pay compensation in early 2023 to victims/survivors covered in the class actions. The parties to these proceedings can finalize their unfinished work in a timely manner and come back before the Tribunal to start distributing compensation to victims/survivors in the near future. Again, the Federal Court approved the Panel's compensation decisions and determined that they were reasonable, this is a compelling reason supporting our reasons in this decision. This alternative can be achieved regardless of Canada's judicial review at the Federal Court of Appeal.

B. Furthermore, the Tribunal notes the comments from the parties during the hearing that they are not yet in a position to distribute compensation under the Tribunal's orders and the Compensation Framework. The Tribunal reminds the parties that, > absent a stay of the orders, the parties have an obligation to continue to address outstanding compensation issues so that they are in a position to set the earliest implementation date possible.

[521] The Tribunal's role includes all Peoples in Canada and must protect victims/survivors especially children. The Tribunal signals to all victims/survivors in Canada that once your rights have been recognized and vindicated, they cannot be taken from you by respondents, third parties or the same Tribunal who has vindicated your rights unless ordered by higher Courts.

[522] The Tribunal believes that the great work accomplished by the parties in these proceedings and the parties to the FSA can be kept alive and move forward if all victims/survivors are included or if the Tribunal's full approval is no longer required.

XII. Retention of jurisdiction

[523] The Tribunal retains jurisdiction on the compensation issue within the scope explained in this ruling and will revisit its retention of jurisdiction as the Tribunal sees fit in light of the upcoming evolution of this case or once the individual claims for compensation have been completed.

[524] This does not modify the Tribunal's previous decisions/rulings and orders or the retention of jurisdiction on long-term relief, reform or other previous decisions/rulings and orders in this case.

I. Introduction

[1] This is a good day for human rights, First Nations children and families in Canada and a significant step towards reconciliation. The Panel congratulates the parties and all people involved in reaching this milestone and more importantly, the Panel recognizes the First Nations children and families who were harmed as a result of Canada's discriminatory practices and whose lives are paving the way for justice. This is the largest settlement of its kind in Canadian history. Sadly, this stems from the magnitude of harms that were inflicted upon First Nations children, families, communities and Nations. Canada ought to bear this in mind as an important reminder so as to never repeat history. The cycle of harm must be broken.

> "History will judge us by the difference we make in the everyday lives of children."
> — Nelson Mandela

[2] The Panel honors the First Nations leadership in Canada who voiced the importance of not leaving anyone behind and the First Nations parties' courage for leading further negotiations. It took great leadership for the Assembly of First Nations (AFN) and Canada to collaborate and arrive at the previous historic Final Settlement Agreement (FSA). It took even greater leadership from the AFN and Canada's Ministers and their teams to receive the Tribunal's criticism of some aspects of the FSA (for example, leaving out some of the victims/survivors already recognized by this Tribunal), consult the Chiefs-in-Assembly, bring the Caring Society back to the negotiation table and arrive at this transformative and unprecedented Revised Settlement Agreement.

[3] The Tribunal declined to fully endorse the previous FSA because it did not fully satisfy the compensation orders the Tribunal found the victims/survivors were entitled to under the Canadian Human Rights Act, RSC 1985 c H-6. The Tribunal in rejecting the previous FSA was really hoping for a better outcome as a result of further negotiations. The Tribunal believes that even if this took many additional months to arrive to this Revised Settlement, it was well worth it for the victims/survivors of human rights violations.

[4] According to the parties, this is the largest compensation settlement in Canadian history so far and it now includes a commitment from the Minister of Indigenous Services to request an apology from the Prime Minister. The Tribunal believes this was an example of grace under pressure and commends the parties to the Revised Agreement and everyone involved for this outstanding achievement that will provide some measure of justice to First Nations children and families who have unjustly suffered because of their race instead of being treated honorably and justly.

[5] First Nations children ought to be honored for who they are - beautiful, valuable, strong and precious First Nations persons. Governments, leaders and adults in any Nation have the sacred responsibility to honor, protect and value children and youth, not harm them.

[6] Complete justice will be achieved when First Nations children will have an opportunity equal with other individuals to make for themselves the lives that they are able and wish to have when systemic racial discrimination no longer exists. The compensation in this case is only one component. The Tribunal, assisted meaningfully by the parties, has always focused on the elimination of the systemic racial discrimination found and the need to prevent similar practices from arising. The Tribunal has found this requires a complete reform. Making available to First Nations children and communities the rights, opportunities and privileges they have been denied and ensuring Canada ceases the discriminatory practices at issue in this case requires a transformation that will protect generations to come. This continues to be the Tribunal's focus.

[7] The Panel is grateful for the Commissions' human rights centered contributions and for the Caring Society's courageous leadership ensuring that no child is left behind and that no one loses entitlement to compensation ordered by the Tribunal. The Panel also commends the First Nations Chiefs-in-Assembly at the AFN for their leadership in adopting a resolution in the spirit of reconciliation and prompting further negotiations on compensation to ensure that no child is left behind.

[8] The Panel recognizes the valuable contributions of the Chiefs of Ontario and the Nishnawbe Aski Nation.

[9] The Panel also recognizes Amnesty International's past contributions on this important issue of compensation.

[10] Finally, the Panel recognizes the AFN's and the Caring Society's instrumental role in an effort to obtain meaningful compensation for First Nations children and families.

[11] The Panel wishes to recognize and honor the true overcomers and heroes in this case, the First Nations children and families.

[12] The Panel Chair speaks peace to every First Nations child, youth and young adult's heart in Turtle Island (Canada) and, to all First Nations individuals and their Communities and Nations.

[13] The Panel is pleased that Canada demonstrated effective leadership in going back to negotiations and for doing the right thing in reincluding the victims/survivors that were left out of the previous settlement agreement (2022 FSA).

[14] The work is not finished, there is much more to do. Compensation is but one aspect of this case. Racial and systemic discrimination must be eliminated and similar practices must not arise or be perpetuated.

[15] Finally, while there is more to do, this milestone deserves to be celebrated as it will be transformative for thousands of First Nations children and families.

A. Context

[16] In 2016, the Tribunal released First Nations Child and Family Caring Society of Canada et al. v. Attorney General of Canada (for the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada), 2016 CHRT 2 [Merit Decision] and found that this case is about children and how the past and current child welfare practices in First Nations communities on reserves, across Canada, have impacted and continue to impact First Nations children, their families and their communities. The Tribunal found that Canada racially discriminated against First Nations children on reserve and in the Yukon in a systemic way not only by underfunding the First Nations Child and Family Services Program (FNCFS) but also in the manner that it designed, managed and controlled it. One of the worst harms found by the Tribunal was that the FNCFS Program failed to provide adequate prevention services and sufficient funding. This created incentives to remove First Nations children from their homes, families and communities as a first resort rather than as a last resort. Another major harm to First Nations children was that zero cases were approved under Jordan's Principle given the narrow interpretation and restrictive eligibility criteria developed by Canada. The Tribunal found that beyond providing adequate funding, there is a need to refocus the policy of the program to respect human rights principles and sound social work practice in the best interest of children. The Tribunal established Canada's liability for systemic and racial discrimination and ordered Canada to cease the discriminatory practice, take measures to redress and prevent it from reoccurring, and reform the FNCFS Program and the 1965 Agreement in Ontario to reflect the findings in the Merit Decision. The Tribunal determined it would proceed in phases for immediate, mid-term and long-term relief and program reform and financial compensation so as to allow immediate change followed by adjustments and finally, sustainable long-term relief. This process would allow the long-term relief to be informed by data collection, new studies and best practices as identified by First Nations experts, First Nations communities and First Nations Agencies considering their communities' specific needs, the National Advisory Committee on child and family services reform and the parties.

[17] The Tribunal also ordered Canada to cease applying its narrow definition of Jordan's Principle and to take measures to immediately implement the full meaning and scope of Jordan's Principle. Jordan's Principle orders and the substantive equality goal were further detailed in subsequent rulings. In 2020 CHRT 20 the Tribunal stated that:

> Jordan's Principle is a human rights principle grounded in substantive equality. The criterion included in the Tribunal's definition in 2017 CHRT 14 of providing services "above normative standard" furthers substantive equality for First Nations children in focusing on their specific needs which includes accounting for intergenerational trauma and other important considerations resulting from the discrimination found in the Merit Decision and other disadvantages such as historical disadvantage they may face. The definition and orders account for First Nations' specific needs and unique circumstances. Jordan's Principle is meant to meet Canada's positive domestic and international obligations towards First Nations children under the CHRA, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the *Convention on the > Rights of the Child and the UNDRIP to name a few. Moreover, the Panel relying on the evidentiary record found that it is the most expeditious mechanism currently in place to start eliminating discrimination found in this case and experienced by First Nations children while the National Program is being reformed. Moreover, this especially given its substantive equality objective which also accounts for intersectionality aspects of the discrimination in all government services affecting First Nations children and families. Substantive equality is both a right and a remedy in this case: a right that is owed to First Nations children as a constant and a sustainable remedy to address the discrimination and prevent its reoccurrence. This falls well within the scope of this claim. (emphasis changed)

[18] Consequently, the Tribunal determined all the above need to be adequately funded. This means in a meaningful and sustainable manner so as to eliminate the systemic discrimination and prevent it from reoccurring.

[19] The Tribunal issued a series of rulings and orders to completely reform the Federal First Nations Child and Family Services Program. In 2019, the Tribunal ruled and found Canada's systemic and racial discrimination caused harms of the worst kind to First Nations children and families. The Tribunal ordered compensation to victims/survivors and, at the request of the complainants and interested parties, the Tribunal made binding orders against Canada to provide compensation to victims/survivors. The Tribunal then issued a series of compensation process decisions at the parties' requests and this process came to an end in late 2020 when Canada decided to judicially review the Tribunal's compensation decisions and halt the completion of the compensation process's last stages which would have allowed distribution of the compensation to victims/survivors.

[20] The Tribunal announced in 2016 that it would deal with compensation later, hoping the parties would resolve this before the Tribunal ruled and made definitive orders. The Tribunal can clarify its existing compensation orders but it cannot completely change them in a way that removes entitlements to victims/survivors. The approach to challenge these key determinations is through judicial review.

[21] The Tribunal encouraged the parties for years to resolve compensation issues.

[22] The Panel was clear in 2016 CHRT 10 that it hoped that reconciliation could be advanced through the parties resolving remedial issues through negotiations rather than adjudication (para. 42). The Panel noted in 2016 CHRT 16 that some of the parties cautioned the Tribunal about the potential adverse impacts that remedial orders could have (para. 13). Accordingly, the Tribunal strongly encouraged the parties to negotiate remedies, including on the issue of compensation. The Tribunal offered to work with the parties in mediation-adjudication to help the parties craft remedies that would best satisfy their needs and most effectively provide redress to victims. Only Canada declined.

[23] The issue left unresolved, the Tribunal was obligated to rule on compensation and the compensation process. In addressing compensation, the Tribunal was required to make challenging decisions addressing novel issues. Canada advanced multiple arguments opposing compensation. The Tribunal has made legal findings based on the evidence and linking the evidence to harms justifying orders under the CHRA. This exercise is made by the Tribunal who exercise a quasi-judicial role under quasi-constitutional legislation. The Tribunal, guided by all the parties in this case, including the AFN, made bold and complex decisions in the best interests of First Nations children and families. The Tribunal's decisions have been upheld by the Federal Court. Now that the Tribunal has issued those compensation decisions on quantum and categories of victims, they are no longer up for negotiation. They are a baseline. Negotiation involves compromise, which can sometimes result in two steps forward and one step back and this may be found acceptable by the parties to the negotiation. However, negotiation cannot be used to take a step backwards from what the Tribunal has already ordered.

[24] Once it found systemic discrimination, the Panel worked with rigor to carefully craft sound findings of fact and law that recognized fundamental rights for First Nations children and families in Canada and protect and vindicate those rights.

[25] Indeed, on September 6, 2019, the Tribunal rendered its decision on compensation (2019 CHRT 39), wherein it ordered Canada to compensate and pay interest to: (i) certain victims of discrimination under the FNCFS Program who were removed from their homes, families and communities; (ii) their parents or caregiving grandparents and, (iii) certain victims of Canada's discriminatory application of Jordan's Principle. Included in the decision were First Nations children on-reserve and in the Yukon who were unnecessarily removed from their homes and communities from 2006 onwards (later confirmed to include children in out-of-home placements on January 1, 2006), and First Nations children who were denied the essential services needed, or received the essential services after an unreasonable delay, because the Government of Canada failed to meet the legal requirements of Jordan's Principle (the "Compensation Entitlement Order").

[26] The Tribunal ordered Canada to consult with the Caring Society and the AFN to develop a compensation distribution framework to arrive at a final order for the distribution of the compensation ordered.

[27] On October 4, 2019, Canada applied for judicial review of the Compensation Entitlement Decision and sought a stay of the Tribunal's proceedings. After the Federal Court dismissed the stay motion on November 27, 2019, Canada agreed to work with the Caring Society and the AFN on the framework.

[28] On February 21, 2020, the Caring Society, the AFN, and Canada submitted a first draft compensation framework to the Tribunal (the "Compensation Framework"). From February 2020 to December 2020, the Caring Society, the AFN and Canada worked to finalize the Compensation Framework. While many aspects of the compensation framework were the result of negotiation and consensus, certain issues were resolved through adjudication before the Tribunal.

[29] The Tribunal ultimately addressed the issues raised before it by the parties and issued further orders clarifying various elements of its Compensation Entitlement Order, including: the age of majority, eligibility for those who remained in care as at Jan 1, 2006 and the eligibility for the estates of deceased victims (2020 CHRT 7); the definitions of "service gap", "essential service" and "unreasonable delay" for the purpose of Jordan's Principle compensation (2020 CHRT 15); the definition of a "First Nations child" in relation to eligibility under Jordan's Principle (2020 CHRT 20); and that compensation owing to minor beneficiaries and those without legal capacity be held in trust (2021 CHRT 6).

[30] On February 12, 2021, the Tribunal approved the final Compensation Framework as revised by the parties (2021 CHRT 7). While this Order substantively addressed aspects of the distribution process for compensation, the parties understood that a significant amount of future work would be required by the parties to address items which included, but were not limited to, how eligibility would be determined, the operation of the implementation process and the continued role of the Tribunal. This work remained subject to Canada's judicial review of the Compensation Entitlement Order and the Tribunal's orders regarding eligibility under Jordan's Principle (2020 CHRT 20 and 2020 CHRT 36), as addressed in Federal Court File Nos. T-1621-19 and T-1559-20.

[31] The judicial reviews were heard on June 14-18, 2021. On September 29, 2021, the Federal Court dismissed Canada's applications in their entirety (2021 FC 969).

[32] On October 29, 2021, Canada appealed the Federal Court's order (2021 FC 969) upholding the Compensation Entitlement Decision to the Federal Court of Appeal (Federal Court of Appeal File No. A-290-21).

The Class Actions and Procedural History of the Revised Final Settlement Agreement

[33] On March 4, 2019, a class action was commenced in the Federal Court seeking compensation for First Nations children who suffered comparable discrimination related to a lack of prevention services leading to the placement of First Nations children in out-of-home care as well as the discriminatory application of Jordan's Principle, beginning on April 1, 1991 (Federal Court File No. T-402-19) ("Moushoom Class Action").

[34] On January 28, 2020, a proposed class action was filed by the AFN and other representative plaintiffs seeking compensation for removed First Nations children and those who experienced discrimination under Jordan's Principle (Federal Court File No. T-141-20) ("AFN Class Action"). A separate class action involving Canada's discrimination in the provision of essential services, products and supports prior to December 2007 was commenced on July 16, 2021 by the AFN and the representative plaintiff Zacheus Trout (Federal Court File No. T-141-20) ("Trout Class Action").

[35] The Moushoom Class Action and the AFN Class Action were consolidated on July 7, 2021 and certified on November 26, 2021 (2021 FC 1225). The Trout Class Action was certified on February 11, 2022 (together, the three class actions are referred to as the "Federal Court Class Actions").

[36] On December 31, 2021, the parties to the to the Federal Court Class Actions concluded an Agreement-in-Principle ("AIP") addressing compensation. On June 30, 2022, a final settlement agreement was reached (the "2022 FSA") and in July 2022, the AFN and Canada brought a motion to the Tribunal seeking a declaration that the 2022 FSA was fair, reasonable, and satisfied the Compensation Entitlement Order and all related clarifying orders (the "Joint Motion"). In the alternative, AFN and Canada sought an order varying the Compensation Entitlement Order, the Compensation Framework Order and other compensation orders, to conform to the 2022 FSA.

[37] The Panel agreed the victims/survivors have been waiting long enough and emphasized that they could have been compensated at any time since the Tribunal's decision in 2016 and even more so after the Compensation Decision in 2019.

[38] The Tribunal heard the Joint Motion in September 2022 and dismissed the Joint Motion by letter decision on October 25, 2022, with full reasons set out in 2022 CHRT 41 and can be accessed online at: https://canlii.ca/t/k08tm.

[39] The Tribunal in 2022 CHRT 41 on the Joint Motion found that the 2022 FSA substantially satisfied the Compensation Entitlement Order. However, the Tribunal identified three (3) key areas where the 2022 FSA departed from the compensation orders, disentitled or reduced entitlements for certain victims already entitled to compensation which, as it will be explained below, was contrary to human rights principles carefully applied in the Tribunal's findings on compensation and corresponding orders. These derogations included the following:

> (a) children removed from their homes, families and communities and placed in non-ISC funded placements were improperly excluded from receiving compensation (2022 CHRT 41 at paras. 283-331);
>
> (b) the estates of deceased caregiving parents and grandparents were excluded from receiving compensation, which was not in keeping with 2020 CHRT 7 (2022 CHRT 41 at paras. 332-350);
>
> (c) certain caregiving parents and grandparents would receive less compensation either in circumstances of multiple removals or if there was an unexpected number of claimants which required a reduction in compensation > to the class to ensure that all caregiving parent and grandparent victims received compensation (2022 CHRT 41 at paras. 351-360).

[40] The Tribunal also raised concerns regarding eligibility under Jordan's Principle and the uncertainties introduced in the 2022 FSA regarding the class action approach, with questions around the meaning of "significant impact" and the definition of "essential service". The Tribunal determined that uncertainty existed with respect to whether the implementation of Jordan's Principle under the 2022 FSA would result in the victims identified by the Tribunal receiving $40,000.

[41] The Tribunal also expressed concern about the opt-out regime in the 2022 FSA (2022 CHRT 41 at paras. 385-390).

[42] The Tribunal said in 2022 CHRT 41 at paragraph 10:

> that the same Panel that made those liability findings against Canada is asked to let go of its approach to adopt a class action approach serving different legal purposes. The Panel was conscious that class actions were forthcoming and made sure in its compensation decision they were not hindered by the Tribunal's compensation process. Now it is the Tribunal's decisions that are being hindered by the FSA applying an early-stage class action lens. Indeed, the parties did not finalize the compensation distribution process to allow for the distribution of funds for the compensation already ordered by this Tribunal in 2019. They pursued another approach instead that did not fully account for the CHRA regime and the Tribunal's orders.

[43] Notably, in 2022 CHRT 41 at paragraph 169, the Tribunal stated the question of quantum of compensation was never up for discussion and no suggestion was made by the Tribunal or the parties to modify the quantum of compensation or to reduce or disentitle categories already recognized by the Tribunal in its compensation orders. In fact, this aspect was final and supported by findings and reasons and sent a strong deterrent message to Canada and a message of hope to the victims/survivors whose rights were vindicated by those findings and corresponding orders. Further, the Tribunal's reasons illustrate the significant difference between systemic human rights remedies and those flowing from tort law. The Tribunal noted the important purpose of individual compensation for victims of discrimination:

> was necessary to deter the reoccurrence of the discriminatory practice or of similar ones, and more importantly to validate the victims/survivors' hurtful experience resulting from the discrimination.
> (2019 CHRT 39 at para 14).

[44] The Tribunal reiterated that in the Compensation Entitlement Decision, 2019 CHRT 39, at para. 206, the Tribunal also made clear that its obligations are to safeguard the human rights of the victims/survivors it identified, irrespective of any proposed class proceedings:

> The fact that a class action has been filed does not change the Tribunal's obligations under the Act to remedy discrimination and if applicable, as it is here, to provide a deterrent and discourage those who discriminate, to provide meaningful systemic and individual remedies to a group of vulnerable First Nations children and their families who are victims/survivors in this case.

[45] The Tribunal in its reasons rejecting the 2022 FSA, the Tribunal mentioned that it is responsible for applying the CHRA and the human rights framework reflected in that legislation.

[46] Moreover, in 2022 CHRT 41, the Tribunal reasoned as follows:

> More importantly, the Tribunal frowns on reducing compensation or disentitling victims/survivors once they have been vindicated at the Tribunal and upheld by the Federal Court. This dangerous precedent would send a very negative message to victims/survivors in this case and other human rights cases in Canada and could potentially become a powerful deterrent to pursue human rights recourses under the CHRA. Victims/survivors would never have the peace of mind that their substantiated complaints and awarded remedies would be forthcoming to them if, at any time before remedies are implemented, these remedies can be taken away from them without the need for a successful judicial review (See at, para. 259).
>
> This is even more troubling when we consider the nature of the complaints before the Tribunal in this case. The very nature of human rights rests upon the protection of vulnerable groups. From the beginning the Tribunal found and wrote that this case is about children and the Tribunal's mandate to eliminate discrimination and prevent similar practices from arising. Permitting reductions or disentitlements of compensation for victims/survivors who have been recognized in evidence-based findings and corresponding orders does not breathe life into human rights. Rather, it takes its breath away, (See at, para. 260).
>
> This cannot be how the human rights regime is administered in Canada (See at, para. 261).

> Once rights have been recognized and vindicated (which is no small task for complainants and victims who often face powerful respondents challenging their claim at every turn), they > are no longer up for debate by outside actors or respondents who may disagree with the orders made against them and therefore cannot contract out of their human rights obligations under the CHRA (See 2022 CHRT 41. at, para. 236).
>
>
> The Tribunal cannot overstate the importance of securing victims/survivors' rights across Canada. […] Human rights are fundamental rights that are not intended to be bargaining chips that parties can negotiate away. Similar to how human rights > legislation establishes minimum standards parties cannot contract out of, the Tribunal's compensation orders generate binding compensation obligations on Canada. Canada cannot contract out of these obligations through an alternative
>
> Proceeding, (See 2022 CHRT 41, at, para. 502).

[47] The Tribunal urged the parties to this proceeding and the parties to the Federal Court Class Actions to work together to allocate additional funds to cover all victims/survivors entitled to compensation as already ordered by the Tribunal and to uphold the human rights regime in a manner that respects and acknowledges those orders and the pain and suffering of all victims/survivors identified by the Tribunal in its previous reasons and orders.

[48] On December 7, 2022, the First Nations-in-Assembly unanimously adopted Resolution 28/2022 regarding compensation for the victims of Canada's discrimination. Resolution 28/2022 included the following critical direction:

> Support compensation for victims covered by the 2022 FSA on compensation and those already legally entitled to $40,000 plus interest under the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal (CHRT) compensation orders to ensure that all victims receive compensation for Canada's wilful and reckless discrimination.
>
> Support the principles on which the FSA is built, including taking a trauma-informed approach, employing objective and non-invasive criteria, and ensuring a First Nations-driven and culturally informed approach to compensation individuals.
>
> Continue to support the Representative Plaintiffs and all victims of Canada's discrimination by ensuring that compensation is paid out as quickly as > possible to all those who can be immediately identified and to continue to work efficiently to compensate those who may need more time.

[49] With the guidance set out by the Tribunal in 2022 CHRT 41 and the direction and support provided by First Nations leadership, the parties to the Federal Court Class Actions and the Caring Society engaged in negotiations resulting in the Revised Agreement. The Revised Agreement was approved by the First Nations-in-Assembly on April 4, 2023, and executed by the parties to the Federal Court Class Actions on April 19, 2023. As the Caring Society was not a party to the Federal Court Class Actions, the AFN, the Caring Society and Canada executed Minutes of Settlement in this proceeding on April 19, 2023.

B. Issue to be decided by this Tribunal

[50] The parties submitted the following notice of motion to the Tribunal:

> MOTION FOR APPROVAL OF THE REVISED COMPENSATION FINAL SETTLEMENT AGREEMENT and CONSENT RELIEF OF THE ASSEMBLY OF FIRST NATIONS, FIRST NATIONS CHILD AND FAMILY CARING SOCIETY OF CANADA and ATTORNEY GENERAL OF CANADA
>
> THIS CONSENT MOTION IS MADE under Rule 3 of the Tribunal's Rules of Procedure (Proceedings Prior to July 11, 2021) and is for orders under paragraph 53(2)(b) of the Canadian Human Rights Act (the "CHRA") and under Rule 1(6) and 3(2)(d) and pursuant to the Tribunal's continuing jurisdiction in this matter. …
> AND TAKE NOTICE THAT THIS CONSENT MOTION IS FOR orders confirming that the revised First Nations Child and Family Services, Jordan's Principle and Trout Class Final Settlement Agreement (the "Revised Agreement"), made respecting Federal Court File Nos. T-402-19 (Moushoom et al v Attorney General of Canada), T-141-20 (Assembly of First Nations et al v His Majesty the King) and T-1120-21 (Trout et al v Attorney General of Canada) dated April 19, 2023, fully satisfies the Tribunal's Compensation Orders (2019 CHRT 39, 2020 CHRT 7, 2020 CHRT 15, 2021 CHRT 6, 2021 CHRT 7 and 2022 CHRT 41) in this proceeding.

[51] The parties jointly submit that the Revised Agreement presented to the Tribunal on this motion heeds the Tribunal's guidance and the direction from the First Nations-in-Assembly: the derogations have been remedied; the uncertainties in relation to eligibility under Jordan's Principle have been addressed; the approach to compensation in relation to the estates of parents/caregiving grandparents has been varied to ensure a better outcome for children impacted by Canada's discrimination; and compensation to parents and caregiving grandparents under Jordan's Principle has been aligned with the spirit and intent of the Tribunal's finding in this case. The Assembly of First Nations, the Caring Society, the Human Rights Commission, the Chiefs of Ontario, the Nishnawbe Aski Nation and Canada consent to this motion. The Revised Agreement can be consulted online at: https://afn.bynder.com/m/21fa33f66e9b73d1/original/04-2023-Compensation-Final-Settlement-Agreement-April-17-with-schedule

C. Decision

[52] After careful consideration, the Panel agrees.

The joint motion is allowed.

D. Legal framework

[53] The Tribunal relies on the same legal framework detailed in length in its reasons in 2022 CHRT 41 to support the finding that it has jurisdiction to determine if the Revised Settlement fully satisfies the Tribunal's compensation orders. The Panel outlined the proper approach to reviewing a request for a consent order in 2020 CHRT 36 at para. 51:

> The first step for this consent order is to do the analysis under section 53 of the CHRA in order to determine if the consent order sought is within the Tribunal's authority under the Act. If the answer is negative, the analysis stops there and the Tribunal cannot make such an order. If the answer is affirmative, the Tribunal then determines if the consent order sought is appropriate and just in light of the specific facts of the case, the evidence presented, its previous orders and the specifics of the consent order sought.

[54] Moreover, the legal framework pertaining to the requested orders will be addressed in turn in the analysis below.

E. Analysis

(i) Has the Revised Agreement addressed the Tribunal's concerns raised in 2022 CHRT 41 and does it now fully satisfy the Tribunal's orders?
